LITURGY denotes all the ceremonies in general belonging to Divine service. The word comes from the Greek, leitourgia, public service, or public ministry; formed of leitros, public, and ergon, work. In a more restrained signification, liturgy is used among the Romanists to signify the mass; and among us the common prayer. All who have written on liturgies agree that, in primitive days, Divine service was exceedingly simple, clogged with very few ceremonies, and consisted of but a very small number of prayers; but, by degrees, they increased the number of ceremonies, and added new prayers, to render the office more awful and venerable to the people. At length, things were carried to such a pitch that a regulation became necessary; and it was found needful to put the service, and the manner of performing it, into writing; and this was what they called a liturgy. Liturgies have been different at different times and in different countries. We have the liturgy of St. Chrysostom, of St. Peter, the Armenian liturgy, Gallican liturgy, etc. "The properties required in a public liturgy," says Paley, "are these: it must be compendious; express just conceptions of the Divine attributes; recite such wants as a congregation are likely to feel, and no other; and contain as few controverted propositions as possible." The liturgy of the Church of England was composed A. D. 1547, and established in the second year of King Edward VI. In the fifth year of this prince, it was reviewed, because some things were contained in that liturgy which showed a compliance with the superstitions of those times; and exceptions were taken against it by learned men at home, and by Calvin abroad. Some alterations were made in it, which consisted in adding the general confession and absolution, and the communion service, to begin with the commandments. The use of oil in confirmation and extreme unction was left out, and also prayers for souls departed, and what related to a belief of the real presence of Christ in the eucharist. The liturgy, so reformed, was established by the acts of 5th and 6th of Edward VI., chap. 1. However, it was abolished by Queen Mary, who enacted that the service should stand as it was commonly used in the last year of King Henry VIII. That of Edward VI. was reestablished, with some few alterations, by Elizabeth. Some further alterations were introduced, in consequence of the review of the Common Prayer Book, by order of King James, in the first year of his reign, particularly in the office of private baptism, in several rubrics, and other passages, with the addition of five or six new prayers and thanksgivings, and all that part of the catechism which contains the doctrines of the sacraments. This Book of Common Prayer, so altered, remained in force from the first year of King James to the fourteenth of Charles II. The last review of the liturgy was in the year 1661. It is an invidious cavil, says Dr. Nichols, that our liturgy was compiled out of popish books. Our reformers took nothing from them, but what was taken before from the oldest writers. We have many things out of the Greek liturgies of Basil and Chrysostom; more out of the litanies of Ambrose and Gregory; very much out of the ancient forms of the Church dispersed in the works of the fathers, who wrote long before the Roman Breviary and Canon of the Mass. Our reformers added many prayers, and thanksgivings, and exhortations, to supply the defect. [The liturgy of the Methodist Episcopal Church is a judicious abridgment of the English liturgy; Mr. Wesley having omitted some ambiguous and redundant portions. It never, however, was popular among American Methodists, who at present use no more of it than the ordination, communion, baptismal, matrimonial, and burial services.]

LIZARD, לִזְרָד. Levit. xi. 30. All interpreters agree that the original word here signifies a sort of lizard. Bochart takes it for that kind which is of a reddish color, lies close to the earth, and is of a venomous nature.

LOCUST, אֲרֵבָה. The word is probably derived from רִבָּה, which signifies to multiply, to become numerous, etc.; because of the immense swarms of these animals by which different countries, especially in the east, are infested. See this circumstance referred to, Judges vi. 5; vii. 12: Psalm cv. 34: Jer. xlv. 23; li. 14: Joel i. 4: Nahum iii. 15: Judith ii. 19, 20; where the most numerous armies are compared to the arbeh, or locust.

The locust, in entomology, belongs to a genus of insects known among naturalists by the name of grylli. The common great brown locust is about three inches in length, has two antennæ about an inch long, and two pairs of wings. The head and horns are brown; the mouth, and insides of the larger legs, bluish; the upper side of the body, and upper wings, brown; the former spotted with black, and the latter with dusky spots. The back is defended by a shield of a greenish hue; the under wings are of a light brown hue, tinged with green, and nearly transparent. The general form and appearance of the insect is that of the grasshopper so well known in this country. These creatures are frequently mentioned in the Old Testament. They were employed as one of the plagues for the punishment of the Egyptians; and their visitation was threatened to the Israelites as a mark of the Divine displeasure. Their numbers and destructive powers very aptly fit them for this purpose. When they take the field they always follow a leader, whose motions they invariably observe. They often migrate from their native country, probably in quest of a greater supply of food. On these occasions they appear in such large flocks as to darken the air; forming many compact bodies or swarms, of several hundred yards square. These flights are very frequent in Barbary, and generally happen at the latter end of March or beginning of April, after the wind has blown from the south for some days. The month following, the young brood also make their appearance, generally following the track of the old ones. In whatever country they settle, they devour all the vegetables, grain, and, in fine, all the produce of the earth; eating the very bark off the trees: thus destroying at once the hopes of the husbandman, and all the labors of agriculture; for though their voracity is great, yet they contaminate a much greater quantity than they devour; as their bite is poisonous to vegetables, and the marks of devastation may be traced for several succeeding seasons. There are various species of them, which consequently have different names; and some are more voracious and destructive than others, though all are most destructive and insatiable spoilers. Bochart enumerates ten different kinds which he thinks are mentioned in the Scripture. [See A. Clarke on Joel i., ii.]

Writers in natural history bear abundant testimony to the scriptural account of these creatures. Dr. Shaw describes at large the numerous swarms and prodigious broods of those locusts which he saw in Barbary. Dr. Russel says, "Of the noxious kinds of insects may well be reckoned the locusts, which sometimes arrive in such incredible multitudes, that it would appear fabulous to give a relation of them; destroying the whole of the verdure wherever they pass." Captain Woodroffe, who was for some time at Astrachan, a city near the Volga, sixty miles to the north-west of the Caspian Sea, in latitude 47°, assures us, that, from the latter end of July to the beginning of October, the country about that city is frequently infested with locusts, which fly in such prodigious numbers as to darken the air, and appear at a distance as a heavy cloud. As for the Mosaic permission to the Jews of eating the locusts, Lev. xi. 22, however strange it may appear to the mere English reader, yet nothing is more certain than that several nations, both of Asia and Africa, anciently used these insects for food; and that they are still eaten in the east to this day. Niebuhr gives some account of the several species of locusts eaten by the Arabs, and of their different ways of dressing them for food. "The Europeans," he adds, "do not comprehend how the Arabs can eat locusts with pleasure; and those Arabs who have had no intercourse with the Christians will not believe, in their turn, that these latter reckon oysters, crabs, shrimps, cray-fish, etc., for dainties. These two facts, however, are equally certain." Locusts are often used figuratively, by the prophets, for invading armies; and their swarms aptly represented the numbers, the desolating march of the vast military hordes and their predatory followers, which the ancient conquerors of the east poured down upon every country they attacked.

LOG, Lev. xiv. 12, a Hebrew measure for things liquid, containing five-sixths of a pint.

LOLLARDS, the supposed followers of Walter Lollard, or rather of Walter the Lollard, who, according to Dr. Mosheim, was a Dutchman of remarkable eloquence and piety, though tinged with mysticism, and who, for teaching sentiments contrary to the Church of Rome, and nearly corresponding with those of Wycliffe, was burned alive at Cologne in 1322. But before this there existed, in different parts of Germany and Flanders, various societies of Cellites, to whom the term Lollards was applied, and who were protected by the magistrates and inhabitants, on account of their usefulness to the sick, and in burying the dead. They received the name Lollards, from the old German or Belgic word lullen, (Latin, lallo,) "to sing with a low voice," "to lull to sleep," (whence lullaby,) because when they carried to the grave, the bed of death, such as died of the plague, which at that period ravaged all Europe, they sang a dirge or hymn, probably in a soft and mournful tone. These Lollards obtained many papal grants, by which their institution was confirmed, their persons exempted from the cognizance of the inquisitors, and subjected entirely to the jurisdiction of the bishops; and, at last, for their further security, Charles, Duke of Burgundy, in 1472, obtained a bull from Pope Sixtus IV., by which they were ranked among the religious orders, and delivered from the jurisdiction of their bishops; which privileges were yet more extended by Pope Julius II., in 1506.

In England the followers of Wycliffe were called Lollards by way of reproach, either on account of the humble offices of the original Lollards, (the Cellites,) or from the attachment of the Wycliffites to singing hymns. Their enemies probably meant to describe them as poor melancholy creatures, only fit to sing psalms at a funeral. [See CELLITES.]

LOOKING-GLASS. Moses states that the women who waited all night at the door of the tabernacle, cheerfully offered their looking-glasses, to be employed in making a brazen laver for the purification of the priests. Exod. xxxviii. 8. These looking-glasses were doubtless of brass, since the basin here mentioned, and the basis thereof, were made from them. The ancient looking-glasses were mirrors, not made of glass, as ours, but of brass, tin, silver, and a mixture of brass and silver, which last were the best and most valuable. [Job xxxvii. 18.]

LORD'S DAY. See SABBATH.

[LORD'S PRAYER. Tertullian says this is the legitimate and ordinary prayer, and none others ought to supersede it. Cyprian calls it our public and common prayer. Origen says it was prescribed for all Christians. It was not allowed to be used by catechumens, on the ground that they could not call God, Father. The Methodist Episcopal Church—like many other Churches—requires its ministers to use it on every occasion of public worship. Some think it is not so much a form as a model of prayer; but it appears to be both: in Matthew, Christ says, "After this manner pray ye;" in Luke, "When ye pray, say, Our Father," etc.]

LORD'S SUPPER, an ordinance instituted by our Saviour in commemoration of his death and sufferings. The institution of this sacrament is recorded by the first three evangelists, and by the Apostle Paul, whose words differ very little from those of his companion St. Luke; and the only difference between St. Matthew and St.

Mark is, that the latter omits the words, "for the remission of sins." There is so general an agreement among them all, that it will only be necessary to recite the words of one of them: "Now, when the even was come, he eat down with the twelve," to eat the passover which had been prepared by his direction; "and as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat: this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Matt. xxvi. 20, 26-28. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper being thus instituted, was adopted by all the early Christians, with very few exceptions; and no modern sect rejects it, except the Quakers and some mystics, who make the whole of religion to consist of contemplative love.

In the early times of the gospel, the celebration of the Lord's Supper was both frequent and numerously attended. Voluntary absence was considered as a culpable neglect; and exclusion from it, by the sentence of the Church, as a severe punishment. Every one brought an offering proportioned to his ability: these offerings were chiefly of bread and wine; and the priests appropriated as much as was necessary for the administration of the eucharist. The clergy had a part of what was left for their maintenance; and the rest furnished the repast called ἀγάπη, or love-feast, which immediately followed the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and of which all the communicants, rich and poor, partook. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper greatly resembled the religious feasts to which the Jews were accustomed. At those feasts they partook of bread and wine in a serious and devout manner, after a solemn blessing or thanksgiving to God for his manifold mercies. This was particularly the case at the feast of the passover, which our Saviour was celebrating with his apostles when he instituted this holy sacrament. At that feast, they commemorated the deliverance of their own peculiar nation from the bondage of Egypt; and there could not be a more suitable opportunity for establishing an ordinance which was to commemorate the infinitely more important deliverance of all mankind from the bondage of sin. The former deliverance was typical of the latter; and instead of keeping the Jewish passover, which was now to be abrogated, they were to commemorate Christ, their passover, who was sacrificed for them: the bread broken was to represent his body offered upon the cross; and the wine poured out was to represent his blood, which was shed for the salvation of men. The nourishment which these elements afford to our bodies is figurative of the salutary effects which the thing signified has upon our souls. And as the celebration of the passover was not only a constant memorial of the deliverance of the Israelites out of the land of Egypt, but also a symbolical action, by which they had a title to the blessings of the old covenant, so the celebration of the Lord's Supper is not only a constant memorial of the death of Christ, but also a pledge or earnest to the communicant of the benefits promised by the new covenant. As the passover was instituted the night before the actual deliverance of the Israelites, so the Lord's Supper was instituted the night before the redemption of man was accomplished by the crucifixion of the blessed Jesus. It is to be partaken of by all who look for remission of sins by the death of Christ; we are not only to cherish that trust in our minds, and express it in our devotions, but we are to give an outward proof of our reliance upon the merits of his passion as the means of our salvation, by eating that bread, and drinking that wine, which are typical representations of the body and blood of Christ, "who by his one oblation of himself once offered, made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world." See SACRAMENT.

LOT, the son of Haran, and nephew to Abraham. He accompanied his uncle from Ur to Haran, and from thence to Canaan; a proof of their mutual attachment, and similarity of principles respecting the true religion. With Abraham he descended into Egypt, and afterward returned with him into Canaan; but the multiplicity of their flocks, and still more the quarrels of their servants, rendered a friendly separation necessary. When God destroyed the cities of the plain with fire and brimstone, he delivered "just Lot" from the conflagration, according to the account of the divine historian. The whole time that Lot resided there was twenty-three years. During all this period he had been a preacher of righteousness among this degenerate people. In him they had before their eyes an illustrious example of the exercise of genuine piety, supported by unsullied justice and benevolent actions. And doubtless it was for these purposes that Divine Providence placed him for a time in that city. The losses which Lot sustained on this melancholy occasion were very great: his wife, property, and all the prospects of the future settlement of his family blasted. Pity must therefore draw a friendly veil over the closing scene of this man of affliction; and let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall into deeds more reprehensible than those of Lot, without having equal trials and sufferings to plead in his favor. Respecting his wife, whether grieving for the loss of her property, or inwardly censuring the severity of the Divine dispensation, or whether moved by unbelief or curiosity, cannot now be known; but, looking back, she became a pillar of salt. Gen. xix. 26. It would be endless to present the reader with all the opinions on this subject. Some contend that nothing more is meant than that she was suffocated: others, that a column or monument of metallic salt was erected upon her grave: others affirm that she became encrusted with the sulphur, inasmuch that she appeared like an Egyptian mummy, which is embalmed with salt. Our Lord warns his disciples to remember Lot's wife in their flight from Jerusalem, and not to imitate her tardiness. Luke xvii. 32. [See DEAD SEA and PILLAR OF SALT.]

LOT, any thing cast or drawn in order to determine any matter in question. Proverbs xviii. 18. We see the use of lots among the Hebrews in many places of Scripture: God commands, for example, that lots should be cast upon the two goats which were offered for the sins of the people, upon the solemn day of expiation, to know which of the two should be sacrificed, and which liberated. Lev. xvi. 8-10. He required also that the land of promise should be divided by lot as soon as it was conquered; which command Joshua accordingly executed, Num. xxvi. 55, 56; xxxiii. 54; xxxiv. 13, etc.: Josh. xiv.-xvi.; hence the term "lot" is used for an inheritance—"Thou maintainest my lot;" and figuratively for a happy state or condition. The priests and Levites had their cities appointed by lot. Lastly, in the time of David, the four and twenty classes of the priests and Levites were distributed by lot, to determine in what order they should wait in the temple. 1 Chron. vi. 54, 61; xxiv. 5; xxv. 8. In the division of the spoil, after victory, lots were likewise cast, to give every man his portion. Obadiah 11: Nahum iii. 10, etc. In the New Testament, after the death of Judas, lots were cast to decide who should occupy the place of the traitor. Acts i. 26. From the above instances, it is clear that when men have recourse to this method, the matter ought to be of the greatest importance, and no other apparent way left to determine it; and the manner of making the appeal should be solemn and grave, if we would escape the guilt of taking the name of God in vain. It unquestionably implies a solemn appeal to the Most High to interpose by his decision; and so every thinking man will be very careful that he has a true and religious ground for so serious a proceeding; and few if any cases can now occur in which it can have any justification. The ancient manner of casting lots was either in some person's "lap," or fold of the robe; into a helmet, or urn, or other vessel, in which they might be shaken before they were drawn or cast.

[The lot was sometimes used in the appointment of bishops in the early Church. The Moravians still use it in the case of marriage and on other occasions.]

[LOVE, אהבה, ἀγάπη. "An affection of the mind excited by beauty and worth of any kind, or by the qualities of an object which communicate pleasure, sensual or intellectual." This definition by Dr. Webster is satisfactory—as far as it goes. "The ancient author of a manuscript lexicon in the late French king's library," says Dr. Clarke, "under the word ἀγάπη, has the following definition: A pleasing surrender of friendship to a friend—an identity or sameness of soul." When love has reference to some excellency in the object, it is called esteem, or complacency, Ps. cxix. 97: 1 Thess. v. 13: when it is evinced in an inclination to seek the welfare of others, it is called benevolence, or grace, Eph. ii. 4-7: Titus iii. 4: when it arises from a sense of benefits received, it is called gratitude—this is love for love. 1 John iv. 19. God loves the whole world with a love of benevolence; John iii. 16: he loves his saints with a love of complacency. Ps. cxlviii. 11: Zeph. iii. 17. It is our duty to love God with a love of complacency, because of his excellences, Ps. xcvi. 9, 10; and with a love of gratitude, because of his benevolence toward us.

Ps. xxxi. 23. We must love our fellow-beings with complacency, gratitude, or benevolence, according to their character, conduct, and condition—not even excepting our enemies. Matt. v. 43-48. This subject is ably presented in Dr. Clarke's Notes on Matt. xxii. 37-40, and 1 Cor. xiii. See CHARITY AND LOVE to GOD.]

[LOVE, FAMILY OF. See DAVIDISTS and FAMILISTS.]

LOVE-FEASTS. It is Godwin's opinion, that the agapæ, or love-feasts, of the primitive Christians, were derived from the חגות, or feasts upon the sacrifices, at which the Jews entertained their friends, and fed the poor. Deut. xii. 18; xxvi. 12. There were also feasts of much the same kind in use among the Greeks and Romans. The former were wont to offer certain sacrifices to their gods, which were afterward given to the poor. They had likewise public feasts for certain districts, suppose for a town or a city, toward which all who could afford it contributed, in proportion to their different abilities, and all partook of it in common. Of this sort were the συσκοτία of the Cretans; and the φιδιτία of the Lacedæmonians, instituted by Lycurgus, and so called παρὰ τῆς φιλίας, (the λ being changed into δ, according to their usual orthography,) as denoting that love and friendship which they were intended to promote among neighbors and fellow-citizens. The Romans likewise had a feast of the same kind, called charistia; which was a meeting only of those who were akin to each other; and the design of it was, that if any quarrel or misunderstanding had happened among any of them, they might there be reconciled. To this Ovid alludes in the second book of his Fasti:

Et venit ad socios turba propinqua deos.*—V. 617.

[The feasts next in order beloved relatives called charistia, at which the kindred throng assembled under their family household gods.] In imitation either of these Jewish or Gentile love-feasts, or probably of both, the primitive Christians, in each particular Church, had likewise their love-feasts, which were supplied by the contribution of the members, according to their several abilities, and partaken of by all in common. And whether they were converts from among the Jews or Gentiles, they retained their old custom with very little alteration; and as their ἀγάπαι had been commonly annexed to their sacrifices, so they were now annexed to the commemoration of the sacrifice of Christ at the Lord's Supper, and were therefore held on the Lord's day before or after the celebration of that ordinance. It would seem at Corinth, in the apostles' days, they were ordinarily held before; for when the Corinthians are blamed for unworthily receiving the Lord's Supper, it is partly charged upon this, that some of them came drunk to that ordinance, having indulged to excess at the preceding love-feast: "Every one taketh before, πρὸ λαμβάνειν, his own supper, and one is hungry, and another is drunken." 1 Cor. xi. 21. This shows, says Dr. Whitby, that this banquet, namely, the love-feast, was celebrated before the Lord's Supper. But Chrysostom gives an account of it, as being in his time kept after it. It is commonly supposed that when St. Jude mentions certain persons who were spots in the feasts of charity, ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις, verse 12, he means in the Christian love-feasts; though Dr. Lightfoot and Dr. Whitby apprehend the reference in this passage is rather to a custom of the Jews, who, on the evening of their Sabbath, had their κοινωνία, or communion, when the inhabitants of the same city met in a common place to eat together. However that be, all antiquity bears testimony to the reality of the Christian ἀγάπαι, or love-feasts.

The most circumstantial account, says Dr. Townley, of the manner in which the ancient αγαρᾶς were celebrated, is given by Tertullian, in his "Apology," written in the second century: "Our supper," says he, "which you accuse of luxury, shows its reason in its very name, for it is called ἀγάπη, that is, love. Whatever charge we are at, it is gain to be at expense upon the account of piety; for we therewith relieve and refresh the poor. There is nothing vile or immodest committed in it; for we do not sit down before we have first offered up prayer to God. We eat only to satisfy hunger, and drink only so much as becomes modest persons. We fill ourselves in such a manner, as that we remember still that we are to worship God by night. We discourse as in the presence of God, knowing that he hears us. Then, after water to wash our hands, and lights brought in, every one is moved to sing some hymn to God, either out of Scripture, or, as he is able, of his own composing, and by this we judge whether he has observed the rules of temperance in drinking. Prayer again concludes our feast; and thence we depart, not to fight and quarrel; not to run about and abuse all we meet; not to give up ourselves to lascivious pastime; but to pursue the same care of modesty and chastity, as men that have fed at a supper of philosophy and discipline, rather than a corporeal feast." Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Church of Smyrna, in the first century, affords us the additional information, "that it was not lawful to baptize, or celebrate the love-feasts, without the bishop, or minister." Lucian, the epicurean, has also a passage which seems to refer to the αγαρᾶς. He tells us that when Peregrinus, a Christian, was in prison, "you might have seen, early in the morning, old women, some widows, and orphans, waiting at the prison. Their presidents bribed the guards, and lodged in the prison with him. Afterward (that is, in the evening) various suppers (that is, suppers consisting of various dishes, and various kinds of meat brought thither by various persons of the company) were brought in, and they held their sacred conversations, ἑποὶ λόγοι, or their sacred discourses were delivered." Pliny, in his celebrated epistle to Trajan, mentions the "cibus promiscuus et innocuus," "common and harmless meal" of the Christians, which they ate together after the celebration of the eucharist. This primitive practice, though under a simpler form, and more expressly religious, is retained in modern times, only by the Moravians, and by the Wesleyan Methodists.

LOVE TO GOD. To serve and obey God on the conviction that it is right to serve and obey him, is in Christianity joined with that love to God which gives life and animation to service, and renders it the means of exalting our pleasures, at the same time that it accords with our convictions. The supreme love of God is the chief, therefore, of what have sometimes been called our theopathic affections. It is the sum and the end of the law; and though it has been lost by us in Adam, it is restored to us by Christ. When it regards God absolutely, and in himself, as a Being of infinite and harmonious perfections and moral beauties, it is that movement of the soul toward him which is produced by admiration, approval, and delight. When it regards him relatively, it fixes upon the ceaseless emanations of his goodness to us all in the continuance of the existence which he at first bestowed; the circumstances which render that existence felicitous; and, above all, upon that "great love wherewith he loved us," manifested in the gift of his Son for our redemption, and in saving us by his grace; or, in the forcible language of St. Paul, upon "the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness to us through Christ Jesus." Under all these views an unbounded gratitude overflows the heart which is influenced by this spiritual affection. But the love of God is more than a sentiment of gratitude: it rejoices in his perfections and glories, and devoutly contemplates them as the highest and most interesting subjects of thought: it keeps the idea of this supremely beloved object constantly present to the mind: it turns to it with adoring ardor from the business and distractions of life: it connects it with every scene of majesty and beauty in nature, and with every event of general and particular providence: it brings the soul into fellowship with God, real and sensible, because vital: it moulds the other affections into conformity with what God himself wills or prohibits, loves or hates: it produces an unbounded desire to please him, and to be accepted of him in all things: it is jealous of his honor, unwearied in his service, quick to prompt to every sacrifice in the cause of truth and his Church; and it renders all such sacrifices, even when carried to the extent of suffering and death, unreluctant and cheerful. It chooses God as the chief good of the soul, the enjoyment of which assures its perfect and eternal interest and happiness: "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee," is the language of every heart, when its love of God is true in principle and supreme in degree.

If, then, the will of God is the perfect rule of morals; and if supreme and perfect love to God must produce a prompt and unwearied, a delightful subjection to his will, or rather an entire and most free choice of it as the rule of all our principles, affections, and actions; the importance of this affection in securing that obedience to the law of God in which true morality consists is manifest; and we clearly perceive the reason why an inspired writer has affirmed that "love is the fulfilling of the law." The necessity of keeping this subject before us under those views in which it is placed in the Christian system, and of not surrendering it to mere philosophy, is, however, an important consideration. With the philosopher the love of God may be the mere approval of the intellect; or a sentiment which results from the contemplation of infinite perfection, manifesting itself in acts of power and goodness. In the Scriptures it is much more than either, and is produced and maintained by a different process. We are there taught that "the carnal mind is enmity to God," and is not, of course, capable of loving God. Yet this carnal mind may consist with deep attainments in philosophy, and with strongly impassioned poetic sentiment. The mere approval of the understanding, and the susceptibility of being impressed with feelings of admiration, awe, and even pleasure, when the character of God is manifested in his works, as both may be found in the carnal mind which is enmity to God, are not therefore the love of God. They are principles which enter into that love, since it cannot exist without them; but they may exist without this affection itself, and be found in a vicious and unchanged nature. The love of God is a fruit of the Holy Spirit; that is, it is implanted by him only in the souls which he has regenerated; and as that which excites its exercise is chiefly, and in the first place, a sense of the benefits bestowed by the grace of God in our redemption, and a well-grounded persuasion of our personal interest in those benefits, it necessarily presupposes our reconciliation to God through faith in the atonement of Christ, and that attestation of it to the heart by the Spirit of adoption. We here see, then, another proof of the necessary connection of Christian morals with Christian doctrine, and how imperfect and deceptive every system must be which separates them. Love is essential to true obedience; for when the apostle declares love to be "the fulfilling of the law," he declares, in effect, that the law cannot be fulfilled without love; and that every action which has not this for its principle, however virtuous in its show, fails of accomplishing the precepts which are obligatory upon us. But this love to God cannot be felt so long as we are sensible of his wrath, and are in dread of his judgments. These feelings are incompatible with each other, and we must be assured of his reconciliation to us, before we are capable of loving him. Thus the very existence of love to God implies the doctrines of atonement, repentance, faith, and the gift of the Spirit of adoption to believers; and unless it be taught in this connection, and through this process of experience, it will be exhibited only as a bright and beautiful object to which man has no access; or a fictitious and imitative sentimentalism will be substituted for it, to the delusion of the souls of men.

[LUCANISTS, or LUCIANISTS. Followers of Lucanus, or Lucianus, a disciple of Marcion in the second century. Epiphanius says that he abandoned Marcion, teaching that people ought not to marry, for fear of enriching the Creator. He denied the reality of the body of Christ and the immortality of the soul. He wrote numerous fabulous works, as the "History of the Nativity of the Virgin Mary," the "Protevangelion, or Gospel of James," and the "Gospel of Nicodemus."—There were also heretics called Lucianists, who appeared after the Arians, teaching that God was called a Father before he begot the Son, as he always had in himself the power of generation; and in this way they accounted for the eternity of the Son.]

LUCIAN, a philosopher and wit, who appeared as one of the early opposers of the Christian religion and its followers. The hostile sentiments of the heathens toward Christianity, says Dr. Neander, were different according to the difference of their philosophical and religious views. There entered then upon the contest two classes of men, who have never since ceased to persecute Christianity. These were the superstitious, to whom the honoring God in spirit and in truth was a stumbling-stone, and the careless unbeliever, who, unacquainted with all feelings of religious wants, was accustomed to laugh and to mock at every thing which proceeded from them, whether he understood it or not, and at all which supposed such feelings, and proposed to satisfy them. Such was Lucian. To him Christianity, like every other remarkable religious phenomenon, appeared only as a fit object for his sarcastic wit. Without giving himself the trouble to examine and to discriminate, he threw Christianity, superstition, and fanaticism, into the same class. It is easy enough, in any system which lays deep hold on man's nature, to find out some side open to ridicule, if a man brings forward only that which is external in the system, abstracted from all its inward power and meaning, and without either understanding, or attempting to understand, this power. He, therefore, who looked on Christianity with cold indifference, and the profane every-day feelings of worldly prudence, might easily here and there find objects for his satire. The Christian might indeed have profited by that ridicule, and have learned from the children of darkness to join the wisdom of the serpent with the meekness of the dove. In the end the scoffer brings himself to derision, because he ventures to pass sentence on the phenomena of a world of which he has not the slightest conception, and which to his eyes, buried as they are in the films of the earth, is entirely closed. Such was Lucian. He sought to bring forward all that is striking and remarkable in the external conduct and circumstances of Christians, which might serve for the object of his sarcastic railery, without any deeper inquiry as to what the religion of the Christians really was. And yet, even in that at which he scoffed there, was much which might have taught him to remark in Christianity no common power over the hearts of men, had he been capable of such serious impressions. The firm hope of eternal life which taught them to meet death with tranquillity, their brotherly love one toward another, might have indicated to him some higher spirit which animated these men; but instead of this he treats it all as delusion, because many gave themselves up to death with something like fanatical enthusiasm. He scoffs at the notion of a crucified man having taught them to regard all mankind as their brethren, the moment they should have abjured the gods of Greece; as if it were not just the most remarkable part of all this, that an obscure person in Jerusalem, who was deserted by every one, and executed as a criminal, should be able, a good century after his death, to cause such effects as Lucian, in his own time, saw extending in all directions, and in spite of every kind of persecution. How blinded must he have been to pass thus lightly over such a phenomenon! But men of his ready wit are apt to exert it with too great readiness on all subjects. They are able to illustrate every thing out of nothing; with their miserable "nil admirari," they can close their hearts against all lofty impressions. With all his wit and keenness, with all his undeniably fine powers of observation in all that has no concern with the deeper impulses of man's spirit, he was a man of very little mind. But hear his own language: "The wretched people have persuaded themselves that they are altogether immortal, and will live for ever; therefore they despise death, and many of them meet it of their own accord. Their first lawgiver has persuaded them also to regard all mankind as their brethren, as soon as they have abjured the Grecian gods, and, honoring their crucified Master, have begun to live according to his laws. They despise every thing heathen equally, and regard all but their own notions as profaneness, while they have yet embraced those notions without sufficient examination." He has no further accusation to make against them here, except the ease with which they allowed their benevolence toward their fellow-Christians to be abused by impostors, in which there may be much truth, but there is, nevertheless, some exaggeration.

[LUCIFER. לִּלְכִּי. Parkhurst renders, "the bright irradiator," and suggests that the King of Babylon might have assumed this title. It is generally referred, in the primary sense, to the morning star, Venus or Jupiter: the latter agrees with the gender, "Son of the morning." Michaelis, A. Clarke, and others, following the Syriac, derive the word from a root signifying to howl: "Howl, Son of the morning." The King of Babylon might well be called a morning-star, or, according to Michaelis, "a star of the first magnitude," as stars in Scripture represent monarchs, and he was one of surpassing splendor. His overthrow is represented by falling from heaven. Isa. xiv. 12.]

[LUCIFERIANs. Followers of Lucifer, Bishop of Cagliari, in the fourth century. They would not allow any one who had been an Arian to join their communion. They taught that the soul is corporeal and transmitted by ordinary generation. Lucifer was banished by Constantius for his defence of the Nicene faith.]

[LUCIUS. A minister in the Church at Antioch. Acts xiii. 1. He was of Cyrene. Some identify him with LUKE, the evangelist—some with LUCIUS, mentioned Rom. xvi. 21.]

LUDIM. There were two Luds; the one the son of Shem, from whom the Lydians of Asia Minor are supposed to have sprung, and the other the son of Mizraim, whose residence was in Africa. The descendants of the latter only are mentioned in Scripture: they are mentioned by Isaiah, lxi. 19, with Pul, whose settlement is supposed to have been about the island Philoe, near the first cataract of the Nile; by Jeremiah, xli. 9, with the Ethiopians and Libyans; by Ezekiel, xxvii. 10, with Phut, as the mercenary soldiers of Tyre, and, xxx. 5, with the Ethiopians and Libyans; all plainly denoting their African position; but in what particular part of that continent this position was is not known. [Gen. x. 13, 22.]

LUKE. The New Testament informs us of very few particulars concerning St. Luke. He is not named in any of the Gospels. In the Acts of the Apostles, which were, as will hereafter be shown, written by him, he uses the first person plural, when he is relating some of the travels of St. Paul; and thence it is inferred that at those times he was himself with that apostle. The first instance of this kind is in the eleventh verse of the sixteenth chapter: he there says, "Loosing from Troas, we came up with a straight course to Samothracia." Thus, we learn that St. Luke accompanied St. Paul in this his first voyage to Macedonia. From Samothracia they went to Neapolis, and thence to Philippi. At this last place we conclude that St. Paul and St. Luke separated, because, in continuing the history of St. Paul, after he left Philippi, St. Luke uses the third person, saying, "Now when they had passed through Amphipolis," etc., Acts xvii. 1; and he does not resume the first person till St. Paul was in Greece the second time. We have no account of St. Luke during this interval; it only appears that he was not with St. Paul. When St. Paul was about to go to Jerusalem from Greece, after his second visit into that country, St. Luke, mentioning certain persons, says, "These going before tarried for us at Troas; and we sailed away from Philippi." Acts xx. 5, 6. Thus again we learn that St. Luke accompanied St. Paul out of Greece, through Macedonia to Troas; and the sequel of St. Paul's history in the Acts, and some passages in his Epistles—2 Tim. iv. 11: Col. iv. 14: Philemon 24—written while he was a prisoner at Rome, inform us that St. Luke continued from that time with Paul, till he was released from his confinement at Rome; which was a space of about five years, and included a very interesting part of St. Paul's life. Acts xx.-xxviii.

Here ends the certain account of St. Luke. It seems probable, however, that he went from Rome into Achaia; and some authors have asserted that he afterward preached the gospel in Africa. None of the most ancient fathers having mentioned that St. Luke suffered martyrdom, we may suppose that he died a natural death; but at what time, or in what place, is not known. We are told by some that St. Luke was a painter, and Grotius and Wetstein thought that he was in the earlier part of his life a slave; but I find, says Bishop Tomline, no foundation for either opinion in any ancient writer. It is probable that he was by birth a Jew, and a native of Antioch in Syria; and I see no reason to doubt that "Luke, the beloved physician," mentioned in the Epistle to the Colossians, iv. 14, was Luke the evangelist.

Lardner thinks that there are a few allusions to this Gospel in some of the apostolical fathers, especially in Hermas and Polycarp; and in Justin Martyr there are passages evidently taken from it; but the earliest author who actually mentions St. Luke's Gospel is Irenæus; and he cites so many peculiarities in it, all agreeing with the Gospel which we now have, that he alone is sufficient to prove its genuineness. We may however observe, that his testimony is supported by Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, Chrysostom, and many others. Dr. Owen and Dr. Townson have compared many parallel passages of St. Mark's and St. Luke's Gospels; and Dr. Townson has concluded that St. Luke had seen St. Mark's Gospel, and Dr. Owen that St. Mark had seen St. Luke's; but there does not appear to be a sufficient similarity of expression to justify either of these conclusions. There was among the ancients a difference of opinion concerning the priority of these two Gospels; and it must be acknowledged to be a very doubtful point.

There is also great doubt about the place where this Gospel was published. It seems most probable that it was published in Greece, and for the use of Gentile converts. Dr. Townson observes, that the evangelist has inserted many explanations, particularly concerning the scribes and Pharisees, which he would have omitted if he had been writing for those who were acquainted with the customs and sects of the Jews. We must conclude that the histories of our Saviour, referred to in the preface of this Gospel, were inaccurate and defective, or St. Luke would not have undertaken this work. It does not, however, appear that they were written with any bad design; but being merely human compositions, and perhaps put together in great haste, they were full of errors. They are now entirely lost, and the names of their authors are not known. When the four authentic Gospels were published, and came into general use, all others were quickly disregarded and forgotten.

St. Luke's Gospel is addressed to Theophilus; but there was a doubt, even in the time of Epiphanius, whether a particular person, or any good Christian in general, be intended by that name. Theophilus was probably a real person, that opinion being more agreeable to the simplicity of the sacred writings. We have seen that St. Luke was for several years the companion of St. Paul; and many ancient writers consider this Gospel as having the sanction of St. Paul, in the same manner as St. Mark's had that of St. Peter. Whoever will examine the evangelist's and the apostle's account of the eucharist in their respective original works, will observe a great coincidence of expression. Luke xxii. : 1 Cor. xi. St. Luke seems to have had more learning than any other of the evangelists, and his language is more varied, copious, and pure. This superiority in style may perhaps be owing to his longer residence in Greece, and greater acquaintance with Gentiles of good education, than fell to the lot of the writers of the other three Gospels. This Gospel contains many things which are not found in the other Gospels; among which are the following: the birth of John the Baptist; the Roman census in Judea; the circumstances attending Christ's birth at Bethlehem; the vision granted to the shepherds; the early testimony of Simeon and Anna; Christ's conversation with the doctors in the temple when he was twelve years old; the parables of the good Samaritan, of the prodigal son, of Dives and Lazarus, of the wicked judge, and of the publican and Pharisee; the miraculous cure of the woman who had been bowed down by illness eighteen years; the cleansing of the ten lepers; and the restoring to life the son of a widow at Nain; the account of Zaccheus, and of the penitent thief; and the particulars of the journey to Emmaus. It is very satisfactory that so early a writer as Irenæus has noticed most of these peculiarities; which proves not only that St. Luke's Gospel, but that the other Gospels also, are the same now that they were in the second century.

LUNATICS, σληνιαζόμενοι, lunatici, Matt. iv. 24. Thus those sick persons were called, who were thought to suffer most severely at the changes of the moon; for example, epileptical persons, or those who have the falling sickness, insane persons, or those tormented with fits of morbid melancholy. Mad people are still called lunatics, from an ancient, but now almost exploded, opinion, that they are much influenced by that planet. A sounder philosophy has taught us that, if there be any thing in it, it must be accounted for, not in the manner the ancients imagined, nor otherwise than by what the moon has in common with other heavenly bodies, occasioning various alterations in the gravity of our atmosphere, and thereby affecting human bodies. However, there is considerable reason to doubt the fact; and it is certain that the moon has no perceivable influence on our most accurate barometers. It has been the fashion to decry and ridicule the doctrine of demoniacal possessions, and to represent the patients merely as lunatics or madmen. And some think that this is countenanced by the calumny of the unbelieving Jews concerning Christ, "He hath a demon, and is mad," John x. 20; both possession and madness often producing the same symptoms of convulsions, paralysis, etc. Matt. xvii. 15-18. But that they were distinct diseases, may be collected from the following considerations: 1. The evangelists, enumerating the various descriptions of patients, distinguish δαμονιζόμενοι, demoniacs, σληνιαζόμενοι, lunatics, and παραιντικοί, paralytically, from persons afflicted with other kinds of diseases. Matt. iv. 24: Mark i. 34: Luke vi. 17, 18. 2. That a real dispossession took place, seems to follow from the number of these impure inmates. Mary of Magdala, or the Magdalene, was afflicted with seven demons. Mark xvi. 9. "A legion" besought Christ's permission to enter into a numerous herd of two thousand swine; which they did, and drove the whole herd down a precipice into the sea, where they were all drowned. This remarkable case is noticed by the three evangelists most circumstantially. Matt. viii. 28: Mark v. 1: Luke viii. 26. 3. The testimony of the demoniacs to Christ was not that of madmen or idiots. It evinced an intimate knowledge both of his person and character, which was hidden from the "wise and prudent" of the nation, the chief-priests, scribes, and Pharisees. Their language was, "What hast thou to do with us, Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to torment us before the time?" "I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God:" "thou art the Christ, the Son of God, the Son of the most high God." Matt. viii. 29: Mark i. 24; iii. 11: Luke iv. 34-41. And they repeatedly besought him not to torment them, not to order them to depart into the abyss. Luke viii. 28-31. See DEMONIACS.

LUTHERANS, or the LUTHERAN CHURCH, the disciples and followers of Martin Luther, an Augustin friar, who was born at Eisleben, in Upper Saxony, in the year 1483. He possessed an invincible magnanimity, and uncommon vigor and acuteness of genius. He first took offence at the indulgences which were granted in 1517, by Pope Leo X., to those who contributed toward finishing St. Peter's church at Rome, Luther being then professor of divinity at Wittemberg. Those indulgences promised remission of all sins, past, present, and to come, however enormous their nature, to all who were rich enough to purchase them. At this Luther raised his warning voice; and in ninety-five propositions, which he maintained publicly at Wittemberg, September 30, 1517, exposed the doctrine of indulgences, which led him to attack also the authority of the pope. This was the commencement of that memorable revolution in the Church which was styled the Reformation; though Mosheim fixes the era of the Reformation from 1520, when Luther was excommunicated by the pope.

In 1523, Luther drew up a liturgy that, in many things, differed but little from the Mass Book; but he left his followers to make further reforms, as they saw them necessary; and, in consequence, the forms of worship in the Lutheran churches vary in points of minor importance; but they agree in reading the Scriptures publicly, in offering prayers and praises to God through the Mediator in their own language, in popular addresses to the congregation, and the reverent administration of the sacraments.

The Augsburg Confession (see CONFESSIONS) forms the established creed of the Lutheran Church. The following are a few of the principal points of doctrine maintained by this great reformer, and a few of the scriptures by which he supported them.

1. That the Holy Scriptures are the only source whence we are to draw our religious sentiments, whether they relate to faith or practice. John v. 39: 1 Cor. iv. 16: 2 Tim. iii. 15-17. Reason also confirms the sufficiency of the Scriptures; for if the written word be allowed to be a rule in one case, how can it be denied to be a rule in another?

2. That justification is the effect of faith exclusive of good works; and that faith ought to produce good works purely in obedience to God, and not in order to our justification; for St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians, strenuously opposed those who ascribed our justification, though but in part, to works: "If righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain." Gal. ii. 21. Therefore it is evident we are not justified by the law, or by our works; but to him that believeth, sin is pardoned, and Christ's righteousness imputed. This article of justification by faith alone, Luther used frequently to call "articulus stantis vel cadentis ecclesiae:" that by which the Church must stand or fall.

3. That no man is able to make satisfaction for his sins; for our Lord teaches us to say, when we have done all things that are commanded us, "We are unprofitable servants." Luke xvii. 10. Christ's sacrifice is alone sufficient to satisfy for sin, and nothing need be added to the infinite value of his atonement.

Luther also rejected tradition, purgatory, penance, auricular confession, masses, invocation of saints, monastic vows, and other doctrines of the Church of Rome. Luther differed widely from Calvin on matters of Church discipline; and on the presence of Christ's body in the sacrament. His followers also deviated from him in some things; but the following may be considered as a fair statement of their principles, and the difference between them and the Calvinists: 1. The Lutherans in Germany reject both Episcopacy and Presbyterianism, but appoint superintendents for the government of the Church, who preside in their consistories, when that office is not supplied by a delegate from the civil government; and they hold meetings in the different towns and villages, to inquire into the state of the congregations and the schools. The appointment of superintendents, and the presentation to livings, is generally in the prince, or ecclesiastical courts. The Swedes and Danes have an ecclesiastical hierarchy, similar to that of England. 2. They differ in their views of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. All the Lutherans reject trans-substantiation, but affirm that the body and blood of Christ are materially present in the sacrament, though in an incomprehensible manner: this they called con-substantiation. The Calvinists hold, on the contrary, that Jesus Christ is only spiritually present in the ordinance, by the external signs of bread and wine. 3. They differ as to the doctrine of the eternal decrees of God respecting man's salvation. The modern Lutherans maintain that the Divine decrees, respecting the salvation and misery of men, are founded upon the Divine prescience. The Calvinists, on the contrary, consider these decrees as absolute and unconditional.

The Lutherans are generally divided into the moderate and the rigid. The moderate Lutherans are those who submitted to the Interim published by the Emperor Charles V. Melancthon was the head of this party, and they were called Adiaphorists. The rigid Lutherans are those who would not endure any change in their master's sentiments, of whom M. Flaccius was the head. The Lutherans are partial to the use of instrumental music in their churches, and admit statues and paintings, as the Church of England does, without allowing them any religious veneration; but the rigid Calvinists reject these, and allow only the simplest forms of psalmody. The modern Lutherans, about the close of the seventeenth century, enlarged their liberality toward other sects, and gave up the supposed right of persecution; confessing that Christians are accountable to God only for their religious faith. They admit, also, into their sacred canon the Epistle of St. James, which Luther rashly rejected, because he could not reconcile it with St. Paul's doctrine of justification; and the Revelation of St. John, which Luther also rejected, because he could not explain it.

On some of the doctrines of the early German reformers the following remarks by Archbishop Laurence are entitled to high consideration: Against the Church of Rome, which always, when attacked, fled for protection to the shield of scholastical sophistry, Luther had waged a dauntless, unwearied, and effectual warfare. He entered the field of contest without distrust or apprehension, under a rooted persuasion that the victory over superstition would prove easy at an era when learning had already begun to extend itself in every direction, and was become closely allied to theological attainments. When the light of day appeared, the genuine doctrines of Scripture, and the primitive opinions of antiquity, began to be more distinctly perceived and more accurately investigated. With an attachment to classical pursuits arose a zeal for biblical inquiries. Taste and truth went hand in hand. Luther, than whom no one was more capable of infusing energy into the cause in which he had embarked, was of all men the worst adapted to conduct it with moderation: he was calculated to commence, but not to complete, reformation. Prompt, resolute, and impetuous, he labored with distinguished success in the demolition of long-established error; he also hastily threw together the rough and cumbrous materials of a better system. But the office of selecting, modelling, and arranging them was consigned to a correcter hand. Melancthon was of a character directly opposite to that of Luther, possessing every requisite to render truth alluring, and reformation respectable; and hence upon him, in preference, the princes of Germany conferred the honor of compiling the public profession of their faith. But it ought not to be concealed that, previously to the time when Lutheranism first became settled upon a permanent basis, and added public esteem to public notice, tenets were advanced which retarded the progress of truth more than all the subtleties of scholastic argument, or the terrors of papal anathema. At the beginning of the Reformation, as Melancthon frankly observed to Cranmer, there existed among its advocates stoical disputations respecting fate, offensive in their nature, and noxious in their tendency. The duration, however, of these stoical disputations was but short; and the substitution of a more rational as well as practical system, for the space of more than twenty years before the appearance of our Articles, prevented the founders of our Church from mistaking, for the doctrines of the Lutherans, those which they themselves wished to forget, and were anxious to obliterate. As we descend to particulars, it will be necessary to keep our eye upon one prominent doctrine, which was eminently conspicuous in all the controversies of the Lutherans—the doctrine of COMPLETE REDEMPTION BY CHRIST, which in their idea their adversaries (the Papists) disregarded, who denied in effect the depravity of our nature, believed the favor of Heaven in this life recoverable by what was denominated merit of congruity, and, in the life to come, by that which was termed merit of condignity, and founded predestination upon merits of such a description; thus in every instance, while retaining the name of Christians, rendering Christianity itself superfluous. In opposition to opinions so repugnant in many respects to reason, and in almost all so subversive of Scripture, the Lutherans constantly pressed the unsophisticated tenet of the atonement, not contractedly in a Calvinistical, but comprehensively in a Christian, point of view—in one in which both Calvinists and Arminians alike embrace it.

Upon original sin, the doctrine of the schoolmen was no less fanciful and remote from every scriptural idea, than flattering to human pride. They contended that the infection of our nature is not a mental but a mere corporeal taint; that the body alone receives and transmits the contagion, while the soul in all instances proceeds immaculate from the hands of her Creator. This disposition to disease, such as they allowed it to be, was considered by some of them as the effect of a peculiar quality in the forbidden fruit; by others, as having been contracted from the poisonous breath of the infernal spirit which inhabited the serpent's body. On one point they were all united: by preserving to the soul the bright traces of her Divine origin unimpaired, they founded on a deceitful basis an arrogant creed, which, in declaring peace and pardon to the sinner, rested more upon personal merit than the satisfaction of a Saviour. In commenting upon the celebrated Book of Sentences, a work once not much less revered than the Scriptures themselves, the disciples of Lombard never failed to improve every hint which tended to degrade the grace of God and exalt the pride of man. Original sin the Roman schoolmen directly opposed to original righteousness; and this they considered not as something connatural with man, but as a superinduced habit of adventitious ornament, the removal of which could not prove detrimental to the native powers of his mind. When, therefore, they contemplated the effects of the fall, by confining the evil to a corporeal taint, and not extending it to the nobler faculties of the soul, they regarded man as an object of Divine displeasure, not because he possessed that which was offensive, but because he was defective in that which was pleasing to the Almighty. Adam, they said, received for himself and his posterity the gift of righteousness, which he subsequently forfeited: in his loins we were included, and by him were virtually represented: his will was ours, and hence the consequence of his lapse is justly imputable to us, his descendants. By our natural birth, therefore, under this idea, we are alienated from God, innocent in our individual persons, but guilty in that of him from whom we derived our existence; a guilt which, although contracted through the fault of another, yet so closely adheres to us that it effectually precludes our entrance at the gate of everlasting life, until the reception of a new birth in baptism. Thus they contended that the sin of Adam conveys to us solely imputed guilt; the corporeal infection which they admitted not being sin itself, but only the subject-matter of it—not peccatum, but, according to their phraseology, fomes peccati, a kind of fuel which the human will kindles or not at pleasure. Such was the outline of the doctrine maintained in the Church of Rome. The tenet of the Lutherans, on the other hand, is remarkable for its simplicity and perspicuity. Avoiding all intricate questions upon the subject, they taught that original sin is a corruption of our nature in a general sense, a depravation of the mental faculties and the corporeal appetites; that the resplendent image of the Deity, which man received at the creation of the world, although not annihilated, is nevertheless greatly impaired; and that, in consequence, the bright characters of unspotted sanctity, once deeply engraven on his mind by the hand of the living God, are become obliterated, the injury extending to his intellect, and affecting as well his reason and his will as his affections and passions. To conceive that inclination to evil incurs not in itself the disapprobation of Heaven, appeared to them little better than an apology for crime, or at least a dangerous palliation of that which the Christian's duty compels him not only to repress but abhor.

The case of Cornelius, whose prayers and alms are said to have ascended up for a memorial before God, was often quoted, by the advocates of the Church of Rome, to prove the merit of works before the reception of grace; to prove the human will capable, by its own inherent rectitude, of deserving the favor and approbation of Heaven. The Lutherans, on the other hand, contended that the argument supported not the conclusion drawn from it, and was therefore irrelevant; that the works of Cornelius were not the causes but the effects of grace; and that this is sufficiently apparent from the context, in which he is described as "a devout man, who feared God and prayed continually." The disciples of Lombard, in whatever mode disposed to pervert reason and annihilate Scripture, universally held that neither before nor after the fall was man in himself capable of meriting heaven: that by the gratuitous endowments of his creation, even in paradise, he was only enabled to preserve his innocence, and not to sin; and that he was utterly incompetent to proceed one step farther, efficaciously to will a remunerable good, and by his natural exertions to obtain a reward above his nature; original righteousness being, reputed not a connate quality, but a supernatural habit. Thus, he could resist evil, but not advance good to perfection; could in some sense live well, by living free from sin, but could not without Divine aid so live as to deserve everlasting life. For such a purpose they asserted that grace was necessary, to operate upon his will in its primary determinations, and to coöperate with it in its ultimate acts. It was, therefore, in the loss of this celestial aid, this superadded gift, and not in any depravity of his mind, that they supposed the principal evil derivable from his lapse to consist; a loss, however, which, by a due exertion of his innate abilities, they deemed to be retrievable; and hence sprung that offensive doctrine of human sufficiency which, in the Lutheran's eye, completely obscured the glory of the gospel, and which, when applied to the sinner's conscience, taught the haughty to presume, and the humble to despair. According, then, to the system under consideration, the favor of God in this life, and his beatific vision in the life to come, are both attainable by personal merit; the former by congruous, as it was termed, the latter by condign: the one without, the other with, the assistance of grace. By our natural strength, it was said, we can fulfil the commands of God as far as their obligation extends; yet was it added, that we cannot fulfil them according to the intention of the Divine Legislator; an intention of rewarding only those who obey them in virtue formed by charity, under the influence of a quality rather regulating the tendency, than augmenting the purity, of the action. They stated, that we may so prepare ourselves for grace as to become entitled to it congruously, not as to a debt which in strict justice God is bound to pay, but as to a grant which it is congruous in him to give, and which it would be inconsistent with his attributes to withhold. This favorite doctrine was supported by every denomination of scholastics, and by every individual of the Church of Rome. Congruous merit was universally esteemed a pearl above all price, the intrinsic value of which attracted the regard, and conciliated the benevolence, of the Almighty. According to their conception, we are endowed with an innate propensity to good, which vice itself can never obliterate, and are able not only to reverence and adore the Supreme Being, but to love him above other objects. They supposed man competent no less to the efficient practice, than to the barren admiration, of holiness; enabled as well to obey the laws, as to love the goodness, of the Almighty; and, if not to deserve the rewards, at least to discharge the obligations, of religion. Impressed, therefore, with such exalted notions of human ability, and forgetful of the Christian propitiation for sin, the sophists of the schools maintained that the soul of man possesses in the freedom, or rather in the capacity, of her WILL a faculty almost Divine. Stimulated by the most upright propensities, and undepraved in her noblest powers, she directs her progress in the path of truth and the road to bliss, by the pure and inextinguishable light of an unperverted reason. Although mutable in her decisions, nevertheless complete controller of her conduct, she becomes at pleasure either the servant of righteousness or the slave of sin; and, disdaining to be anticipated by God himself, prevents him in his supernatural gifts by a previous display of her own meritorious deeds, challenging, as a congruous right, that which only could have been otherwise conferred as a favor undeserved. "By the bare observance of my holy order," exclaimed the secluded devotee, "I am able not solely to obtain grace for myself, but; by the works which I then may do, can accumulate merit sufficient both to supply my own wants and those of others; so that I may sell the superabundance of my acquired treasure." Can we be surprised that a reformer of Luther's manly disposition, who wrote without reserve and reasoned without control, when adverting to opinions of so noxious a tendency, should sometimes, from excess of zeal, lose sight of moderation in his censures? The Lutherans commenced the attack upon these unscriptural dogmas, under a persuasion that the position of their opponents militated against the leading principles of Christianity. "If man," they said, "be capable of pleasing God by his own works abstractedly considered, without Divine assistance, where is the necessity, and what is the utility, of that assistance?" They argued that, were it possible for the moral virtues of the mind by their own efficiency to render our persons acceptable to God and obtain his lost favor, no need would exist of any other satisfaction for sin, and thus the whole scheme of gospel redemption would have been fruitless, and Christ have died in vain. While, therefore, the doctrine of the atonement presented nothing but a cloud and darkness to their adversaries, it gave light by night to these; on them it shone, amidst surrounding gloom, with lustre unobscured. Luther advanced a proposition which proved highly offensive to the Papists, and which they never ceased to condemn and calumniate. His assertion was, that he who exerts himself to the utmost of his ability, still continues to sin. On the other side, unassisted man was thought incapable of performing an action remunerably good, or, as it was usually termed, condignly meritorious, even before his lapse; and that consequently, in his fallen state, all to which he was conceived competent by his innate strength was not to sin. When Luther therefore drew up his thesis for public disputation against the tenet of congruous works, if little delicacy, yet some caution, and much discrimination, appeared requisite. Had he stated them to be thus good in a scholastic sense, he would have completely lost sight of his object, and allowed more than even his opponents themselves. Had he described them as not demeritorious, or, in other words, not sinful, he would have precisely maintained the adverse position, and might consequently have spared his labor, at the same time that he would have tacitly acknowledged them to possess, what he could not consistently with truth attribute to them, every natural perfection of virtue and holiness. Under what denomination, then, could he class them, except under that of sinful? a denomination which he the more readily adopted because, even among his adversaries themselves, the words SIN and GRACE, as he remarked, were in general immediately opposed to each other. Anxious to rescue Christian theology from the grasp of those who embraced only to betray, the Lutherans labored to restore that importance to the doctrine of redemption with which the Scriptures invest it, but of which, by a subtle perversity, it had been deprived. The principal object, therefore, in their view evidently was, to Christianize the speculations of the schools; and the principal drift of their argument is to prove that human virtue, how extravagantly soever extolled by a vain philosophy, is wholly insufficient (because imperfect) to merit the favor of Heaven. Allowing no medium between righteousness and unrighteousness, the approbation and disapprobation of the Almighty, characterizing that as sinful which is confessedly not holy, and thus annihilating every ground of self-presumption, they inculcated the necessity of contemplating with the eye of faith those means of reconciliation which Christianity alone affords. But it has been insinuated that the Lutheran doctrine went to prove man's total inability to extricate himself from crime, until the arrival of some uncertain moment, which brings with it a regeneration from on high, the sudden transfusion of a new light and new virtues. But those who thus conceive of it are not probably aware that Melancthon, the venerable author of the Augsburg Confession, warmly reprobates this precise idea, which he denominates a Manichaean conceit and a horrible falsehood. Upon the abstract question of free will it is indeed true that Melancthon, no less than Luther, at first held opinions which he was happy to retract. But when this is acknowledged, it should be added that he made ample amends for his indiscretion by not only expunging the offensive passages from the single work which contained them, but by introducing others of a nature diametrically opposite. And although the more inflexible coadjutor of Melancthon was too lofty to correct what he had once made public, and too magnanimous to regard the charge of inconsistency which his adversaries urged against him, yet what his better judgment approved clearly appears from a preface written not long before his death; in which, while he expressed an anxiety to have his own chaotic labors, as he styled them, buried in eternal oblivion, he recommended in strong terms, as a work admirably adapted to form the Christian divine, that very performance of his friend which was remarkable for something more than a mere recantation of the opinions alluded to. It was not against any conceived deficiency in the quality of our virtue that they argued, but against its supposed competency, whether wrought in or out of grace, with greater or less degrees of purity, to effect that which the oblation of Christ alone accomplishes. Upon both points Luther treated the doctrine of his adversaries as altogether frivolous, and incapable of corroboration by a single fact. Futile, however, as the scholastical tenet appeared to be, although deficient in proof and unsupported by example, upon this, he remarked with indignation and grief, was founded the whole system of papal delusion.

Justification was on both sides supposed to consist entirely in the remission of sins. The popish scholastics, on this head, were remarkably distinct in their ideas and express in their language. They represented it as an effect produced by the infusion of Divine grace into the mind; not as a consequent to a well-spent life, but as preceding all remunerable obedience, as the intervening point between night and day, the gloom of a guilty and the light of a self-approving conscience; or, in other words, and to adopt their own phraseology, as the exact boundary where merit of congruity ends and where merit of condignity begins, the infallible result of a previous disposition on our part, which never fails of alluring from on high that supernatural quality which, being itself love, renders the soul beloved. While the Lutherans, however, adhered to the general import of the term as understood in the schools, they waged an incessant warfare upon another point: while they allowed that justification consists in the remission of sin, they denied that this remission is to be acquired by the merit of the individual. Their scholastic opponents maintained that man is justified in the sight of God in consequence of his own preparation, and on account of his personal qualities. They, on the other hand, argued, with an inflexibility which admitted of no compromise, that, possessing not merits of his own to plead, man freely received forgiveness through the mercy of God solely on account of the merits of Christ. The effective principle, therefore, or meritorious cause of justification, was the great point contested. The doctrine of the popish divines, explained more at large, was this: When the sinner, conscious of his past transgressions, inquired where he was to seek the expiation of his crime, and deliverance from the dreadful consequences of it, the general answer was, In the merit of penitence; a merit capable of annihilating guilt, and appeasing the anger of incensed Omnipotence. He, they argued, who, having disobeyed the laws of Heaven, is desirous of returning into that state of acceptance from which he has fallen, must not expect free forgiveness; but previously by unfeigned sorrow of heart deserve the restoration of grace, and, with it, the obliteration of his offences. To effect this desirable purpose, he is bound strictly to survey and detest his former conduct, accurately to enumerate his transgressions, and deeply feel them; and, impressed with a due sense of their magnitude, impurity, and consequences, to condemn his folly and deplore his fault, which have made him an outcast of Heaven, and exposed him to eternal misery. So far he can proceed by that operation of the mind which they denominated ATTRITION, and which, being within the sphere of his natural powers, they regarded as congruous piety meritorious of justification, as a preparation of the soul more or less necessary to receive and merit justifying grace. When, therefore, he is arrived at this point, ATTRITION ceases and CONTRITION commences: the habit of sin is expelled, while that of holiness is superinduced in its stead, and with the infusion of charity, the plastic principle of a new obedience, justification becomes complete. But even here it was not conceived that a total deliverance takes place; a liberation from guilt and eternal punishment is effected, but not from temporal, which is never remitted unless either by the infliction of some personal suffering or satisfactory compensation required of him who is already justified and approved by Heaven. However, to accomplish this remaining object, nothing more is wanting than a continuation, to a sufficient intensity, of that compunction of heart which is now denominated CONTRITION, grace supplying the defects of nature, and enabling penitential merit not only to justify, but to obtain exemption from punishment of every species. But so great appeared to the popish scholastics the frailty of man and the severity of God, that no inconsiderable difficulty occurred in the due application of this favorite doctrine to individuals; for the means of expiation, they imagined, ought always to be proportionate to the magnitude of the offences. "How," they reasoned, "are we to be assured that our contrition has been either sufficient or sincere, and whether it has been so in the obliteration not only of one crime, but of all; whether it has atoned for past transgressions of every kind, the number of which may perplex, as well as their guilt confound, us?" Instead, therefore, of penitence in its strictest acceptance as a perfect virtue, God, they said, in condescension to human infirmity, has substituted for general practice the sacrament of penitence, which, for the attainment of full remission, requires only a moderate compunction of soul, with confession to the priest, and the discharge of such satisfaction as he may enjoin. And, still lower to reduce the terms of acceptance, they even argued that it is not absolutely necessary for the penitent to experience an entire conversion of heart, but only not to oppose the impediment of moral crime, to feel some displeasure at his past conduct, and to express a resolution of amending it in future. But, after all, and in spite of the boasted authority of the keys, complete confidence in Divine forgiveness was never inculcated; for it was neither the interest nor the inclination of the Church of Rome to teach the simple doctrine of Christian faith, but rather to involve it in metaphysical obscurity. Under the pretext, therefore, of relieving the throbbing breast from its apprehensions, they had recourse to numerous inventions for propping the insecure fabric of penitential hope; asserting, among other extravagances, that the sacraments are in themselves efficacious by virtue of their own operation, exclusively of all merit in the recipient; and that the sacrament of the altar, in particular, acts so powerfully in this respect as to communicate grace not only to those who partake of it, but to others from whom it is received by substitution, provided its operation be not hindered by confessedly flagrant immorality. So deeply rooted in the minds of the Papists had become the persuasion of its thus effecting the best of purposes, and that even without the necessity of an actual participation of it by him upon whom the benefit is conferred, that the celebration of the mass was universally regarded as the means of appeasing the anger of Heaven, and obtaining pardon and peace, of procuring Divine assistance for the living, and, for the dead, deliverance from the bitter pains of purgatory. Nor by the sacraments alone, but by every good external work, as well as internal disposition, was justifying grace supposed to be merited congruously, and satisfaction for sin to be made condignly. In monastical institutions, likewise, were found no mean materials for similar purposes; "for in those feigned religions," as the homily On Good Works describes them, "the devotees boasted of having lamps which ran always over, able to satisfy not only for their own sins, but also for all other their benefactors, brothers and sisters of religion, as most ungodly and craftily they had persuaded the multitude of ignorant people; keeping in divers places marts or markets of merits, being full of their holy relics, images, shrines, and works of overflowing abundance, ready to be sold." Yet, whether the dubious penitent was instructed to derive consolation from the efficacy of the sacraments, from his own personal qualities, or from any of what Cranmer aptly termed "the fantastical works of man's invention," it should be observed that he was not directly taught to consider these as wholly superseding the virtue of repentance, but as supplying his deficiencies in the performance of it; an incongruous system of atonement, fabricated by the avarice of Rome, and the obsequiousness of scholastical philosophy, to augment the treasures and extend the influence of the Church, to extinguish the light of gospel truth, and, while keeping the world at large in ignorance, to hold the conscience of the individual in slavery. Upon the whole, then, the scholastics maintained that justification is unattainable without repentance, at least without some degree of attrition, on our part; but in the common apprehension of the doctrine even this seems to have been forgotten, and merit of congruity considered in a general point of view as alone efficacious. Thus good works of every species preceding grace were said to deserve it, and, by deserving grace, to deserve the justifying principle. And always were they careful to impute the cause of forgiveness, not to the mercy of God in Christ, but to the sole change in the individual, to his transmutation from a state of unrighteousness to one of righteousness, to his possession of a quality which renders him a worthy object of Divine approbation. For in every instance personal merit was conceived to be the solid basis upon which rests the complete remission of sin. Upon no one point, perhaps, has the opinion of Luther been more misrepresented than upon this. Some have ascribed to it a solidifant tendency, if not of the most enthusiastical, at least of the most unqualified, description. But it seems indeed impossible accurately to comprehend the position which he maintained, if we examine it in an insulated point of view, unless we connect it with that of which in the Church of Rome it properly formed a part, and from which he never intended to separate it—the doctrine of penitence. In opposing the absurdity of papal indulgences, (the first impiety against which his manly mind revolted,) a ray of light, before unnoticed, darted upon him, and opened a completely new scene, which, while it stimulated his efforts as a reformer, animated his hopes as a Christian. Hence, averting with disdain from the speculations of sophists, and turning to the sacred page of revelation, he there beheld an affiance very different from what the schools inculcated; and thus, while their vain language was, "Repent, and trust to the efficacy of your contrition, either with or without extraneous works, according to the degree of its intensity, for the expiation of your offences," his, more scriptural and more consoling, became simply this: "Repent, and trust not for expiation to your own merits of any kind, but solely to those of your Redeemer." Rejecting the dreams of their adversaries with respect to the nature and effects of this important duty, they represented it as consisting of two essential parts, CONTRITION and FAITH, the latter as always associated with the former. Hence, in the Apology of their Confession, they repeatedly declared a disavowal of all faith, except such as exists in the contrite heart. Far was it from their intention to encourage the presumptuous or fanatical sinner in a false security: their object was very different and laudable: they labored to fix the eye of him who both laments and detests his offences, upon the only deserving object of human confidence and Divine complacency. Properly, then, as they frequently remarked, their doctrine of justification was appropriated to troubled consciences, at every period of true repentance, and particularly at the awful hour of death, when the time for habitual proofs of amendment has elapsed, and when the past appears replete with guilt and the future with terror. At such moments, they taught not, with the schools, an affiance in human merit, but in the gratuitous mercy of God through Christ: to contrition, as a preparatory qualification or previous requisite, they added faith; and from faith they deemed every principle of real piety and virtue inseparable. Good works, or the outward fruits of an inward renovation of mind, were said to follow remission of sins; internal necessarily preceding external reformation. For the individual, they argued, must himself be good before the action can be so denominated, be justified before it can be deemed just, and accepted before it can prove acceptable, distinguishing between the primary admission into God's favor, and the subsequent preservation of that favor.

The unfathomable depths of Divine predestination and predetermination human reason in vain attempts to sound, finite faculties to scan infinite, or the limited intellect of man to comprehend the immensity of the Godhead. Erasmus, a peculiar favorite with the reformers of our own country, when contemplating this inexplicable subject, observed that "in the Holy Scriptures there are certain secret recesses, which God is unwilling for us too minutely to explore; and which, if we endeavor to explore, in proportion as we penetrate farther, our minds become more and more oppressed with darkness and stupefaction; that thus we might acknowledge the inscrutable majesty of the Divine wisdom, and the imbecility of the human mind." Congenial, also, with the feelings and sentiments of Erasmus upon this point were those of Luther. "To acquire any knowledge," he remarked, "of a Deity not revealed in Scripture, to know what his existence is, his actions and dispositions, belongs not to me. My duty is only this: to know what are his precepts, his promises, and his threatenings. Pernicious and pestilent is the thought of investigating causes, and brings with it inevitable ruin, especially when we ascend too high, and wish to philosophize upon predestination." How differently Calvin felt upon the same subject, and with what little reserve, or rather with what bold temerity, he labored to scrutinize the unrevealed Divinity, is too well known to require any thing beyond a bare allusion to the circumstance. His sentiments, however, were much less regarded than some are disposed to allow; and upon this particular question, so far were they from having attained their full celebrity at the period when the Articles of the Church of England were framed, that they were not taught without opposition even in his own unimportant territory of Geneva. For at that precise era he was publicly accused (by Sebastian Castellio) of making God the author of sin; and although, not contented with silencing, he first imprisoned and afterward banished his accuser, yet he could not expel the opinions of his adversary. While the Church of Rome maintained a predestination to life of one man in preference to another individually on account of personal merit, the Lutherans taught a gratuitous predestination of Christians collectively, of those whom God has chosen in Christ out of mankind; and by this single point of difference were the contending opinions principally contradistinguished. With us the system of Calvin still retains so many zealous advocates, that to a modern ear the very term PREDESTINATION seems to convey a meaning only conformable with his particular system. It should, however, be observed that this word was in familiar use for centuries before the Reformation, in a sense very different from what Calvin imputed to it, not as preceding the Divine prescience, but as resulting from it, much in the same sense as that in which it has since been supported by the Arminians. Yet, obvious as this appears, writers of respectability strangely persuade themselves that, immediately prior to the Reformation, the doctrines of the Church of Rome were completely Calvinistical—a conclusion to which, certainly, none can subscribe who are sufficiently conversant with the favorite productions of that time. So far, indeed, was this from being the fact, that Calvin peculiarly prided himself on departing from the common definition of the term, which had long been adopted by the adherents of the schools, and retained with a scrupulous precision. For while they held that the expression predestinati is exclusively applicable to the elect, whom God, foreknowing as meritorious objects of his mercy, predestinates to life; and while they appropriated that of præsciti to the non-elect, whose perseverance in transgression is simply foreknown; Calvin, on the other side, treating the distinction as a frivolous subterfuge, contended that God, decreeing the final doom of the elect and non-elect irrespectively, predestinates both, not subsequently but previously to all foreknowledge of their individual dispositions, especially devotes the latter to destruction through the medium of crime, and creates them by a fatal destiny to perish. Whatever, therefore, modern conjecture may have attributed to the popish scholastics, it is certain that, abhorring every speculation which tends in the remotest degree to make God the author of sin, they believed that only salutary good is predestinated: grace to those who deserve it congruously, and glory to those who deserve it condignly. They maintained that Almighty God, before the foundations of the world were laid, surveying in his comprehensive idea, or, as they phrased it, in his prescience of simple intelligence, the possibilities of all things before he determined their actual existence, foresaw that, if mankind were created, (although he willed the salvation of all, and was inclined to assist all indifferently, yet) some would deserve eternal happiness, and others eternal misery; and that therefore he approved and elected the former, but disapproved or reprobated the latter. Thus, grounding election upon foreknowledge, they contemplated it, not as an arbitrary principle, separating one individual from another under the influence of a blind chance or an irrational caprice, but, on the contrary, as a wise and just principle, which presupposes a diversity between those who are accepted and those who are rejected. Hence it was that, in order to systematize upon this principle of election, and to show how consistent it is as well with the justice as the benevolence of the Deity, the will of God was considered in a double point of view, as absolute and conditional, or, in the technical language of the schools, as antecedent and consequent. In the first instance, by his absolute or antecedent will, he was said to desire the salvation of every man; in the latter, by his conditional or consequent will, that only of those whom he foresaw abstaining from sin and obeying his commandments: the one expressed his general inclination, the other his particular resolution upon the view of individual circumstances and conditions. To the inquiry, why some are unendowed with grace, their answer was, "Because some are not willing to receive it, and not because God is unwilling to give it." "He," they said, "offers his light to all. He is absent from none; but man absents himself from the present Deity, like one who shuts his eyes against the noonday blaze." To the foregoing statement it should be added, that they held an election, or rather an ordination, to grace (which they expressly asserted to be defectible) distinct from an election to glory; that, according to them, a name may be written in the book of life at one period, which at another may be erased from it; and that predestination to eternal happiness solely depends upon final perseverance in well-doing. On the whole, it is evident that they considered the dignity or worthiness of the individual as the meritorious basis of predestination; merit of congruity as the basis of a preordination to grace, and merit of condignity as that of a preordination to glory. Thus, not more fastidious in the choice of their terms than accurate in the use of them, while they denied that the prescience of human virtue, correctly speaking, could be the primary cause of the Divine will, because nothing in time can properly give birth to that which has existed from eternity, they strenuously maintained it to be a secondary cause, the ratio or rule in the mind of the Deity which regulated his will in the formation of its ultimate decisions. Although in the established confession of their faith the Lutherans avoided all allusion to the subject of predestination, it was nevertheless introduced into another work of importance, and of considerable public authority, the Loci Theologici of Melancthon, a production which was everywhere received as the standard of Lutheran divinity.

Both Luther and Melancthon, after the Diet of Augsburg, kept one object constantly in view—to inculcate only what was plain and practical, and never to attempt philosophizing. But to what, it may be asked, did the Lutherans object in the theory of their opponents when they themselves abandoned the tenet of necessity? Certainly not to the sobriety and moderation of that part of it which vindicated the justice, and displayed the benevolence, of the Almighty; but, generally, to the principles upon which it proceeded; to the presumption in overleaping the boundary which Heaven has prescribed to our limited faculties, and which we cannot pass without plunging into darkness and error; and to its impiety in disregarding, if not despising, the most important truths of Christianity. A system of such a nature they hesitated not to reject, anxious to conduct themselves by the light of Scripture alone, nor presuming to be wise above what God has been pleased to discover. Maintaining not a particular election of personal favorites, either by an absolute will, or even a conditional one, dependent upon the ratio of merit, but a general election of all who, by baptism in their infancy, or by faith and obedience in mature years, become the adopted heirs of Heaven; they conceived this to be the only election to which the gospel alludes, and, consequently, the only one upon which we can speak with confidence, or reason without presumption. If it be observed that the selection of an integral body necessarily infers that of its component parts, the answer is obvious: the latter, although indeed it be necessarily inferred by the former, is nevertheless not a prior requisite, but a posterior result of the Divine ordination. What they deemed absolute on the part of God was his everlasting purpose to save his elect in Christ, or real Christians considered as a whole, and contrasted with the remainder of the human race; the completion of this purpose being regulated by peculiar circumstances, operating as inferior causes of a particular segregation. For, persuaded of his goodwill toward all men without distinction, of his being indiscriminately disposed to promote the salvation of all, and of his seriously (not fictitiously, as Calvin taught) including all in the universal promise of Christianity, they imputed to him nothing like a partial choice, no limitation of favors, no irrespective exclusion of persons; but assuming the Christian character as the sole ground of individual preference; they believed that every baptized infant, by being made a member of Christ, not by being comprised in a previous arbitrary decree, is truly the elect of God, and, dying in infancy, certain of eternal happiness; that he who, in maturer years, becomes polluted by wilful crime, loses that state of salvation which before he possessed; that, nevertheless, by true repentance, and conversion to the Father of mercy and God of all consolation, he is again reinstated in it; and that, by finally persevering in it, he at length receives the kingdom prepared for every sincere Christian before the foundation of the world. Can any man, whom prejudice has not blinded, rank these sentiments with those of Calvin? It may seem almost unnecessary to subjoin, that the Lutherans held the defectibility of grace; its indefectibility being a position supported but by those who think that the Redeemer died for a selected few alone. Upon the whole, then, it appears that the Lutherans, affecting not in any way to philosophize, but committing themselves solely to the guidance of Scripture, differed from the Church of Rome in several important particulars. For although on some points they coincided with her—although they inculcated, with equal zeal and upon a better principle, both the universality and the defectibility of grace, as well as a conditional admission into the number of the elect—they nevertheless were entirely at variance with her upon the very foundation of the system. Thus, while their opponents taught that predestination consists in the prospective discrimination of individuals by Divine favor, according to the foreseen ratio of every man's own merit—works of congruity deserving grace here, and works of condignity eternal life hereafter, and that in this way it principally rests upon human worth—the Lutherans, disclaiming every idea of such a discrimination, placed it upon the same basis as they assumed in the case of justification—that of an effectual redemption by Christ. Instead, therefore, of holding the election of individuals as men on account of personal dignity or worthiness, they maintained the election of a general mass as Christians on account of Christ alone; adding that we are admitted into that number, or discarded from it, in the eye of Heaven, proportionably as we embrace or reject the salvation offered to all, embracing it with a faith inseparable from genuine virtue, or rejecting it by incredulity and crime. For neither in this, nor in the instance of justification, did they exclude repentance and a true conversion of the heart and life, as necessary requisites, but only as meritorious causes, from the contemplation of God's omniscient intellect. "Let those," said Luther, "who wish to be elected avoid an evil conscience, and not transgress the Divine commandments." Instructed, then, by the unerring page of truth, they asserted no other predestination than what is there expressly revealed—that of the good and gracious Father of mankind, who from eternity has been disposed to promote the happiness and welfare of all men, has destined Christ to be the Saviour of the whole world, and withholden from none the exalted hope of the Christian calling. Convinced that this is the only predestination which Christianity discloses, and consequently the only one which we can either with safety or certainty embrace, they discouraged every attempt at investigating the will, out of the word, of God; every attempt at effecting impossibilities, at unveiling the secret counsels of Him who shrouds his Divine perfections in darkness impervious to mortal eyes. With such investigations, indeed, the world had already been sufficiently bewildered by the scholastics, who, endowed with a ready talent at perplexing what before was plain, and at rendering abstruseness still more abstruse, had made the subject totally inexplicable, vainly laboring to develop with precision that mysterious will upon which the wise must ever think it folly, and the good impiety, to speculate. Disquisitions of this presumptuous nature, from a personal experience of their mischievous tendency, Luther abjured himself, and deprecated in others. "Are we, miserable men," he exclaimed, "who as yet are incapable of comprehending the rays of God's promises, the glimmerings of his precepts and his works, although confirmed by words and miracles, are we, infirm and impure, eager to comprehend all that is great and glorious in the solar light itself, in the incomprehensible light of a miraculous Godhead? Do we not know that God dwells in splendor inaccessible? And yet do we approach, or rather do we presume to approach it? Are we not aware that his judgments are inscrutable? And yet do we endeavor to scrutinize them? And these things we do, before we are habituated even to the faint lustre of his promises and precepts, with a vision still imperfect, blindly rushing into the majesty of that light which, secret and unseen, has never been, by words or miracles, exhibited. What wonder, then, if, while we explore its majesty, we are overwhelmed with its glory?" For a further account of the Lutheran views on predestination, see the last pages of the article CALVINISM.

After this very ample exposition of the sentiments of the German reformers on the chief points of Christian doctrine, it is only necessary to give a few additional particulars in corroboration of some portions of the preceding statement. The high estimation in which Luther held the productions of the judicious Melancthon is apparent from a passage in the preface to the first volume of Luther's works, dated 1545. In that year also appeared the last amended edition of Melancthon's "Common-Places," to which he alludes. "Long and earnestly," he says, "have I resisted the importunity of those who have wished me to publish my works, or, to speak more correctly, my confused and disorderly lucubrations; not only because I was unwilling that the labors of the ancients should be turned aside by my novelties, and that the reader should be hindered from perusing them, but likewise because now, by the grace of God, a great number of methodical books are extant; among which the Common-Places of our Philip claim the preference, for by them a divine and a bishop may be abundantly and satisfactorily confirmed, so as to become powerful in the word of the doctrine of piety, especially when the Holy Bible itself can now be procured in almost every language. But the want of order in the matters to be discussed in my books induced, nay compelled, me to render them a sort of rude and indigested chaos, which it would now require even on my part no small exertion to digest into a methodical form. Under the influence of such motives as these, I was desirous that all my productions should be buried in perpetual oblivion, that they might give place to others of a better description." In this preface Luther also gives the following testimony to the general usefulness of Melancthon's labors: "In the same year Philip Melancthon had been called to this university by Prince Frederick to fill the chair of Greek professor, but no doubt with the intention that I should have him as my colleague in the labors of the divinity professorship. For his works are sufficiently in proof of what the Lord hath effected by this his choice instrument, not only in polite literature, but in theology, although Satan be enraged and all his party." Though the early opinions of Luther upon the doctrine of a philosophical necessity appear to have been occasionally expressed in a harsh and repulsive manner, yet his followers pertinaciously contend that even the harshest of them cannot, with propriety, be construed into a sense favorable to the Calvinistical system. "Those of Melancthon in the first edition of his Loci Theologici, although occurring but in one or two instances, were, nevertheless, still more offensive, and less capable of a mitigated interpretation. So far, indeed, did he carry the doctrine of Divine predetermination as to degrade man to a level with the brutes, as will be obvious from the following passage in the edition of 1525: "Lastly, Divine predetermination takes away human liberty. For all things come to pass according to Divine predetermination, not only external works, but also internal thoughts in all creatures." After the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, we hear no more of this obnoxious tenet. Indeed, so early as 1527, these reformers seem to have abandoned it. At least, when in that year a form of doctrine was drawn up for the churches of Saxony, free will in acts of morality was thus inculcated: "The human will is so far free as to be able in some sort to perform the righteousness of the flesh, or civil justice, when it is obliged by the law and by force not to steal, not to kill, not to commit adultery, etc. Therefore let ministers teach, that it is in a measure in our own hands to restrain carnal affections, and to perform civil justice; and let them diligently exhort men to a strict and proper course of life, because God also requires this kind of righteousness, and will grievously punish those men who live so negligent of their duty. For as we are bound to make a good use of the other gifts of God, so is it likewise our duty to employ to good purpose those powers which God has bestowed on nature." "For God takes no delight in that ferocious mode of life which is adopted by some men, who, after having heard that we are not justified by our own powers and works, foolishly dream that they will wait until they be drawn by God, and in the mean time their course of life is most impure. Such persons God will most severely punish; and they must, therefore, be earnestly reprehended and admonished by those whose province it is to teach in the churches." This work, which is generally termed, Libellus Visitations Saxonie, was first composed in German by Melancthon in 1527, and afterward republished by Luther with a preface, in which he thus expresses himself: "We do not publish these as rigorous precepts, nor do we again employ ourselves in drawing up pontifical decrees, but we relate matters of history and public deeds, and present the confession and symbol of our belief." The previous controversy between Luther and Erasmus, on the topic of free will, had probably tended to produce an amelioration of the doctrinal system of the Lutheran Church. In this view it was, not without reason, that Erasmus made the following reflections in a letter dated 1528, soon after he had seen this production: "The Lutheran fever, every succeeding day, assumes a milder form; so that Luther himself now writes recantations on almost every thing, and on this account he is considered by the rest as a heretic and a madman." Similar caustic remarks occur in other letters of Erasmus; and as, in those days of high religious excitement, taunts of this kind were considered too good to be confined as secrets within the breast of the correspondents to whom they were addressed, it is not improbable that Luther might be prevented through them, among other reasons, from making further doctrinal concessions; it being no uncommon circumstance in the history of the human mind for persons of otherwise strong understandings to be under the influence of this pitiable weakness. That Melancthon not only abandoned but reprehended the doctrine in 1529, we cannot doubt, because his own express testimony in proof of it remains on record. In a letter to Christopher Stathmio, dated March 20th, 1559, which was not long before his death, he notices the subject in these words: "Thirty years ago, not through the desire of contention, but on account of the glory of God, and for the sake of discipline, I sharply reprehended the Stoical paradoxes concerning necessity, because they are reproachful toward God and injurious to morals. At this time the legions of the Stoics are waging war against me; but in the answer which I have written in opposition to the Bavarian inquisition, I have once more pointed out in a modest manner that opinion (on fate or predestination) in which anxious minds may acquiesce and be at rest." On consulting the tract to which his letter alludes, we find him employing this strong and unequivocal language: "I also openly reject and abhor those Stoical and Manichean furies who affirm that all things necessarily happen, evil as well as good actions. But concerning these I refrain at present from any lengthened discussion; only I entreat young people to avoid these monstrous opinions, which are contumelious against God, and pernicious to morals." From the Loci Theologici, in which Melancthon had first introduced this obnoxious tenet, he expunged necessity in the edition of 1533, and inserted in its place the opposite one of contingency. The following are extracts from this amended work: "The discussion on the cause of sin and that on contingency have sometimes greatly agitated the Church, and excited mighty tragedies. Men of acute minds collect multitudes of inextricable and absurd things about both these subjects. Because there is some danger in them, young people must be warned to abstain from these interminable disputes, and in preference to search out a simple and pious opinion, beneficial to religion and morals, in which they may abide, nor suffer themselves to be withdrawn from it by those fallacious tricks of disputations. But this is a pious and true sentiment to be embraced with both hands, and to be retained rather by the whole heart—that God is not the cause of sin, and that he does not will sin. But the causes of sin are the will of the devil, and the will of man." "But this sentiment being once laid down, that God is not the cause of sin, it evidently follows that contingency must be granted.

The freedom of the will is the cause of the contingency of our actions." "Neither must the delirious doatings about Stoical fate, or about necessity, be conveyed into the Church, because they are inextricable and sometimes injurious to piety and morals." "From these opinions it becomes the pious to be abhorrent in their ears and in their hearts." These extracts serve to prove that Melancthon reprobated the idea of introducing into the Church the doctrine of Stoical fate, before Calvin had distinguished himself either as an author or a reformer. Into his subsequent productions of almost every description Melancthon introduced the doctrine of contingency, and strenuously defended it, particularly in the amended edition of his Loci Theologici in 1545. Luther never formally revoked any of his own writings; but on this last corrected production of his friend, as we have shown, he bestowed the highest commendations. Yet he did not scruple publicly to assert, that at the beginning of the Reformation he had not completely settled his creed. In the seventh volume of his works this sentence is found: "I have also published the confession of my faith; in which I have openly testified what and how I believe, and in what articles I think myself at length to be at rest." He seems, indeed, to have generally avoided the subject, from the period of his controversy with Erasmus, to the publication of his Commentary on Genesis—his last work of any importance. But in this, after a long argument to prove that, as we have no knowledge of the unrevealed Deity, we have nothing to do with those things which are above our comprehension; and that we are not to reason upon predestination out of Christianity; he thus apologizes for his former opinions: "It has been my wish diligently and accurately to deliver these charges and admonitions; because, after my death, many persons will publish my books to the world, and by that course will confirm errors of every kind and their own delirious ravings. But among other matters I have written that all things are absolute and necessary; but at the same time I added, that we must behold God as he is revealed to us, as we sing in the Psalm, 'Jesus Christ is the Lord of sabaoth, nor is there any other God.' In several other passages I have used similar expressions. But these people will pass by all such passages, and will only seize upon those concerning a hidden Deity. You, therefore, who now hear me, recollect that I have taught this: We must not inquire concerning the predestination of a hidden God, but we must abide and acquiesce in those things which are revealed by calling and by the ministry of the word." "But in other passages of my different works I have inculcated the same sentiments, and I now deliver them again with an audible voice; therefore I am excused." For the more modern state of the Lutheran Church, see NEOLOGY.

The following account of the union between the Lutheran and Calvinistic Churches, as given in the advertisement to Baron Von Wessenberg's "Correspondence with the Court of Rome," may not be uninteresting to the reader: "The Germans have just set the noble example of forming a union between these two branches of the Protestant faith. This union, which originated, we believe, in the grand duchy of Nassau, has taken place almost universally throughout Germany; and the separate appellations of Lutheran and Calvinistic Churches have merged in the common appellation of the Evangelical Church. The Lutheran and Reformed Churches of Prussia met in synod together, on the invitation of their monarch, the first of October, 1817, and soon came to an agreement; and the union was celebrated on the day of the tri-centenary festival of the Reformation. A similar synod of the Lutherans and Calvinists in Hesse-Cassel was held at Hanau in May and June, 1818, and attended with the same result. The royal confirmation was given to the Bavarian union on the first of October following. Saxe-Weimar, and most of the other small states, have followed this example. The Protestant Germans have now, therefore, only one gospel, one temple, one Divine Instructor, and one mode of communion; and, what is singular, and highly honorable to their liberality, this union was everywhere accomplished with the greatest ease, and without a dissentient voice having been raised against it." How different was this result from that of the synods and councils of other times; and what a change in the state of public opinion does it indicate! And yet it is to be feared that the liberality from which this union has resulted, is rather indifference to the grand peculiarities of the Christian faith than mutual charity. LYCAONIA, a province of Asia Minor, accounted a part of Cappadocia, having Pisidia on the west, and Cilicia on the south. In it were the cities of Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, mentioned in the travels of St. Paul. The former was the capital, and the country itself at that time a Roman province. The "speech of Lycania," mentioned Acts xiv. 11, is supposed to have been a corrupt Greek, intermingled with many oriental words.

LYCIA, a country of Asia Minor, having Phrygia on the north, Pamphylia on the east, the Mediterranean on the south, and Caria on the west. The greatest part of the country, however, is a peninsula projecting into the Mediterranean. Lycia derived its name from Lycus, the son of Pandion, who settled here. It was conquered by Croesus, King of Lydia, and passed with his kingdom into the hands of the Persians. It afterward, in common with the neighboring countries of Asia Minor, formed part of the Macedonian empire, under Alexander; then of that of the Seleucids, his successors in those countries; and, at the time of the apostles, was reduced to the state of a Roman province. [Acts xxvii. 5.]

LYDDA, by the Greeks called Diospolis. It lay in the way from Jerusalem to Cæsarea, four or five leagues to the east of Joppa. Lydda belonged to the tribe of Ephraim. It seems to have been inhabited by the Benjamites, at the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. Neh. xi. 35. St. Peter coming to Lydda, cured a sick man of the palsy named Eneas. Acts ix. 33, 34.

[The Hebrew name, Lod, survives in the modern Ludd. The city appears to have been built by Benjamites, though it was not within the limits of their tribe. 1 Chron. viii. 12: Ezra ii. 33. Demetrius Nicator transferred it, with its district, from Samaria to Judea. When it surrendered to Vespasian it was a large village. It was early a bishopric, and its bishops subscribed themselves sometimes of Lydda and sometimes of Diospolis. Apollonius was Bishop of Lydda in 518. Pelagius, in 415, appeared here before a council. It is said that St. George was born in Lydda; that he was martyred at Nicomedia near the close of the third century; and that his remains were transferred to Lydda, where a church was erected to his honor, which was demolished by the Saracens. It appears to have been rebuilt; and again demolished by Saladin, A. D. 1191. Ludd is a considerable village of small houses—the nominal seat of a Greek bishop, who resides at Jerusalem. The noble ruins of the church lie at the eastern part of the town: the western end of the church has been formed into a mosque, the lofty minaret of which, says Robinson, forms the landmark of Ludd.]

LYDIA, a woman of Thyatira, a seller of purple, who dwelt in the city of Philippi, in Macedonia. She was converted to the faith by St. Paul, and both she and her family were baptized. She offered her house to the apostle, and pressed him to abide there so earnestly, that he yielded to her entreaties. She was not a Jewess by birth, but a proselyte. Acts xvi. 14, 15, 40.

LYDIA, an ancient celebrated kingdom of Asia Minor, which, in the time of the apostles, was reduced to a Roman province. Sardis was the capital.

[LYSANIAS. Tetrarch of Abilene, Luke iii. 1, supposed son or grandson of Lysanias, who was put to death by Marc Antony.]

LYSTRA, a city of Lycaonia, the native place of Timothy. The Apostle Paul and Barnabas having preached here, and healed a cripple, were taken for gods. But so fickle are human praise and popular encomiums, that, in the space of a few hours, those who had been deemed gods were regarded as less than mortals, and were stoned by the very persons who so lately deified them. See Acts xiv.

MAACAH, or BETH-MAACHA, a little province of Syria to the east and the north of the sources of the river Jordan, upon the road to Damascus. Abel or Abela was in this country, whence it was called Abelbeth-Maachah. We learn from Joshua xiii. 13, that the Israelites did not destroy the Maachathites, but permitted them to dwell in the land among them. The distribution of the half tribe of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, extended as far as this country. Deut. iii. 14: Joshua xii. 5.

[MAACAH, or MAACHAH. A son or daughter of Nahor's concubine. Gen. xxii. 24.—Great-granddaughter of Benjamin, and wife of Machir. 1 Chron. vii. 15, 16.—Concubine of Caleb. 1 Chron. ii. 48.—Wife of David and mother of Absalom. 2 Sam. iii. 3.—Father of Hanan. 1 Chron. xi. 43.—Father of Shephatiah. 1 Chron. xxvii. 16.—Father of Achish, King of Gath. 1 Kings ii. 39.—Wife of Rehoboam, 1 Kings xv. 2, mother of Abijam, and Asa's grandmother, as mother must mean in verse 10.]

[MACARIANS. Followers of Macarius, an Egyptian monk of the fourth century. His writings are tinged with Origenism.—Also the followers of Macarius, a native of Ireland, who, in the ninth century, propagated in France the error afterward adopted by Averroes, that one individual intelligence performs the spiritual functions in all men.]

MACCABEES, two apocryphal books of Scripture, containing the history of Judas and his brothers, and their wars against the Syrian kings in defence of their religion and liberties, so called from Judas, the son of Mattathias, surnamed Maccabæus, as some authors say, from the word מַכְבִּיר, formed of the initials of Exod. xv. 11, מִי־כַמֶּכֶה בְּאֵלִים יְהוָה, "Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods?" which was the motto of his standard; whence those who fought under his standard were called Maccabees, and the name was generally applied to all who suffered in the cause of true religion under the Egyptian or Syrian kings. This name, formed by abbreviation according to the common practice of the Jews, distinguished Judas Maccabæus by way of eminence, as he succeeded his father, B. C. 166, in the command of those forces which he had with him at his death; and being joined by his brothers, and all others that were zealous for the law, he erected his standard, on which he inscribed the above-mentioned motto. Those, also, who suffered under Ptolemy Philopater of Alexandria, fifty years before this period, were afterward called Maccabees; and so were Eleazar, and the mother and her seven sons, though they suffered before Judas erected his standard with the motto from which the appellation originated. And therefore, as these books, which contain the history of Judas and his brothers, and their wars against the Syrian kings, in defence of their religion and liberties, are called the first and second books of the Maccabees, so that book which gives us the history of those who, in the like cause, under Ptolemy Philopater, were exposed to his elephants at Alexandria, is called the third book of the Maccabees; and that which is written by Josephus, of the martyrdom of Eleazar, and the seven brothers and their mother, is called the fourth book of the Maccabees.

The first book of the Maccabees is an excellent history, and comes nearest to the style and manner of the sacred historians of any extant. It was written originally in the Chaldee language, of the Jerusalem dialect, and was extant in this language in the time of Jerome, who had seen it. From the Chaldee it was translated into Greek, from the Greek into Latin. Theodotion is conjectured to have translated it into Greek; but this version was probably more ancient, as we may infer from its use by ancient authors, as Tertullian, Origen, and others. It is supposed to have been written by John Hyrcanus, the son of Simon, who was prince and high-priest of the Jews near thirty years, and began his government at the time where this history ends. It contains the history of forty years, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes to the death of Simon, the high-priest; that is, from the year of the world 3829 to the year 3869, B. C. 131. The second book of the Maccabees begins with two epistles sent from the Jews of Jerusalem to the Jews of Egypt and Alexandria, to exhort them to observe the feast of the dedication of the new altar erected by Judas, on his purifying the temple. The first was written in the 169th year of the era of the Selencidae, that is, B. C. 144; and the second, in the 188th year of the same era, or B. C. 125; and both appear to be spurious. After these epistles follows the preface of the author to his history, which is an abridgment of a larger work, composed by one Jason, a Jew of Cyrene, who wrote in Greek the history of Judas Maccabæus, and his brethren, and the wars against Antiochus Epiphanes, and Eupator his son. The last two chapters contain events under the reign of Demetrius Soter, the successor of Antiochus Eupator, and contain such varieties in their style, as render it doubtful whether they had the same author as the rest of the work. This second book does not by any means equal the accuracy and excellency of the first. It contains a history of about fifteen years, from the execution of Heliodorus's commission, who was sent by Seleucus to fetch away the treasures of the temple, to the victory obtained by Judas Maccabæus over Nicanor: that is, from the year of the world 3828 to the year 3843, B. C. 157.

There are in the Polyglot Bibles, both of Paris and London, Syriac versions of both these books; but they, as well as the English versions which we have among the apocryphal writers in our Bibles, are derived from the Greek. For a further account of Judas Maccabæus, and of his brothers, whose history is recorded in the first and second books of the Maccabees, and also by Josephus, we refer to the article JEW. The third book of the Maccabees contains the history of the persecution of Ptolemy Philopater against the Jews in Egypt, and their sufferings under it; and seems to have been written by some Alexandrian Jew in the Greek language, not long after the time of Siracides. This book, with regard to its subject, ought to be called the first, as the things which are related in it occurred before the Maccabees, whose history is recorded in the first and second books; but as it is of less authority and repute than the other two, it is reckoned after them. It is extant in Syriac, though the translator did not seem to have well understood the Greek language. It is in most of the ancient manuscript copies of the Greek Septuagint, particularly in the Alexandrian and Vatican, but was never inserted into the vulgar Latin version of the Bible, nor, consequently, into any of our English copies. The first authentic mention we have of this book is in Eusebius's "Chronicon." It is also named with two other books of the Maccabees in the eighty-fifth of the Apostolic canons. But it is uncertain when that canon was added. Grotius thinks that this book was written after the first two books, and shortly after the book of Ecclesiasticus, from which circumstance it was called the third book of Maccabees. Moreover, Josephus's history of the martyrs that suffered under Antiochus Epi-phanes is found in some manuscript Greek Bibles, under the name of the fourth book of the Maccabees. This book, ascribed to Josephus, occurs under the title, "Concerning the Empire or Government of Reason;" but learned men have expressed a doubt whether this was the book known to the ancients as the fourth book of the Maccabees.

MACEDONIA, a kingdom of Greece, having Thrace to the north, Thessaly south, Epirus west, and the Ægean Sea east. Alexander the Great, son of Philip, King of Macedonia, having conquered Asia, and subverted the Persian empire, the name of the Macedonians became very famous throughout the east; and it is often given to the Greeks, the successors of Alexander in the monarchy. In like manner, the name of Greeks is often put for Macedonians. 2 Maccabees iv. 36. When the Roman empire was divided, Macedonia fell to the share of the emperor of the east. After it had long continued subject to the Romans, it fell under the power of the Ottoman Turks, who are the present masters of it.

St. Paul was invited by an angel of the Lord, who appeared to him at Troas, to come and preach the gospel in Macedonia. Acts xvi. 9. After this vision the apostle no longer doubted his Divine call to preach the gospel in Macedonia; and the success that attended his ministry confirmed him in his persuasion. Here he laid the foundation of the churches of Thessalonica and Philippi.

[MACEDONIANS. He was deposed by the Council of Constantinople, A. D. 360, and sent into exile. His followers were numerous in the Asiatic provinces, but they were crushed by a council assembled at Constantinople, under Theodosius, A. D. 381. They are sometimes called PNEUMATOMACHIANS, Fighters against the Spirit.]

MAGDALA, a city on the west side of the Sea of Galilee, near Dalmanutha; Jesus, after the miracle of the seven loaves, being said by St. Matthew to have gone by ship to the coasts of Magdala, Matt. xv. 39; and by St. Mark, to "the parts of Dalmanutha." Mark viii. 10. Mr. Buckingham came to a small village in this situation called Migdal, close to the edge of the lake, beneath a range of high cliffs, in which small grottoes are seen, with the remains of an old square tower, and some larger buildings, of rude construction, apparently of great antiquity. Migdol implies a tower, or fortress; and this place, from having this name particularly applied to it, was doubtless, like the Egyptian Migdol, one of considerable importance; and may be considered as the site of the Migdal of the Naphtalites, as well as the Magdala of the New Testament [Dr. Robinson calls it "el-Mejdel, a miserable little Muslim village, looking much like a ruin, though exhibiting no marks of antiquity." He identifies it with the Migdal-el of Joshua xix. 38, and the town of Mary Magdalene.]

The name originated in the unfounded notion that Mary Magdalene had been a woman of licentious habits. The order was established in Rome by Leo X. MAGI, or MAGIANS, a title which the ancient Persians gave to their wise men, or philosophers. Magi, among the Persians, answers to σοφοί, or φιλόσοφοι, among the Greeks; sapientes, among the Latins; druids, among the Gauls; gymnosophists, among the Indians; and priests, among the Egyptians.

The ancient magi, according to Aristotle and Laertius, were the sole authors and conservators of the Persian philosophy; and the philosophy principally cultivated among them was theology and politics; they being always esteemed as the interpreters of all law, both Divine and human; on which account they were wonderfully revered by the people. Hence Cicero observes that none were admitted to the crown of Persia, but such as were well instructed in the discipline of the magi; who taught τὰ βασιλικά, and showed princes how to govern. Plato, Apuleius, Laertius; and others, agree that the philosophy of the magi related principally to the worship of the gods: they were the persons who were to offer prayers, supplications, and sacrifices, as if the gods would be heard by them alone. But, according to Lucian, Suidas, etc., this theology or worship of the gods, as it is called, about which the magi were employed, was little more than the diabolical art of divination; so that μαγεία, strictly taken, was the art of divination. These people were held in such veneration among the Persians, that Darius, the son of Hystaspes, among other things, had it engraven on his monument that he was the master of the magi. Philo Judæus describes the magi to be diligent inquirers into nature, out of the love they bear to truth; and who, setting themselves apart from other things, contemplate the Divine virtues the more clearly, and initiate others in the same mysteries. The magi, or magians, formed one of the two grand sects into which the idolatry of the world was divided between five and six hundred years before Christ. These abominated all those images which were worshipped by the other sect, denominated Sabians, and paid their worship to the Deity under the emblem of fire. Their chief doctrine was, that there were two principles, one of which was the cause of all good, and the other the cause of all evil. The former was represented by light, and the latter by darkness, as their truest symbols; and of the composition of these two they supposed that all things in the world were made. The sect of the magians was revived and reformed by Zoroaster. This celebrated philosopher, called by the Persians Zerdusht, or Zaratush, began about the thirty-sixth year of the reign of Darius to restore and reform the magian system of religion. He was not only excellently skilled in all the learning of the east that prevailed in his time, but likewise thoroughly versed in the Jewish religion, and in all the sacred writings of the Old Testament that were then extant: whence some have inferred that he was a native Jew both by birth and profession; and that he had been servant to one of the prophets, probably Ezekiel or Daniel. He made his first appearance in Media, in the city of Xix, now called Aderbijan, as some say; or, according to others, in Ecbatana, now called Tauris. Instead of admitting the existence of two first causes, with the magians, he asserted the existence of one supreme God, who created both these, and out of these two produced, according to his sovereign pleasure, every thing else. According to his doctrine, there was one supreme Being independently and self-existing from all eternity. Under him there are two angels: one the angel of light, the author and director of all good; and the other the angel of darkness, who is the author and director of all evil. These two, probably speaking figuratively, out of the mixture of light and darkness, made all things that are; and they are in a state of perpetual conflict; so that where the angel of light prevails, there the most is good; and where the angel of darkness prevails, there the most is evil. This struggle shall continue to the end of the world; and then there shall be a general resurrection, and a day of judgment: after which, the angel of darkness and his disciples shall go into a world of their own, where they shall suffer in everlasting darkness the punishment of their evil deeds; and the angel of light and his disciples shall go into a world of their own, where they shall receive in everlasting light the reward due unto their good deeds; and henceforward they shall for ever remain separate.

Of the controversy as to Zoroaster, Zeratust, or Zertushta, and the sacred books said to have been written by him, called Zend, or Zendavesta, which has divided the most eminent critics, it would answer no important end to give an abstract. Those who wish for information on the subject are referred to Hyde's "Religio Veterum Persarum," Prideaux's "Connection," Warburton's "Divine Legation;" Bryant's "Mythology;" "The Universal History;" Sir W. Jones's Works, vol. iii., p. 115; M. du Perron; and Richardson's "Dissertation," prefixed to his Persian and Arabic Dictionary. But whatever may become of the authority of the whole or part of the Zendavesta, and with whatever fables the history of the reformer of the magian religion may be mixed, the learned are generally agreed that such a reformation took place by his instrumentality. "Zeratust," says Sir W. Jones, "reformed the old religion by the addition of genii or angels, of new ceremonies in the veneration shown to fire, of a new work which he pretended to have received from heaven, and, above all, by establishing the actual adoration of the Supreme Being;" and he further adds, "The reformed religion of Persia continued in force till that country was conquered by the Mussulmans; and, without studying the Zend, we have ample information concerning it in the modern Persian writings of several who profess it. Bahman always named Zeratust with reverence: he was, in truth, a pure Theist, and strongly disclaimed any adoration of the fire or other elements; and he denied that the doctrine of two coeval principles, supremely good and supremely bad, formed any part of his faith." "The Zeratust of Persia, or the Zoroaster of the Greeks," says Richardson, "was highly celebrated by the most discerning people of ancient times; and his tenets, we are told, were most eagerly and rapidly embraced by the highest in rank and the wisest men in the Persian empire." He distinguished himself by denying that good and evil, represented by light and darkness, were coeval, independent principles; and asserted the supremacy of the true God, in exact conformity with the doctrine contained in a part of that celebrated prophecy of Isaiah in which Cyrus is mentioned by name: "I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God beside me;" no coeval power. "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace," or good, "and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." Fire, by Zerdushta, appears to have been used emblematically only; and the ceremonies for preserving and transmitting it introduced by him were manifestly taken from the Jews, and the sacred fire of their tabernacle and temple.

The old religion of the Persians was corrupted by Sabianism, or the worship of the host of heaven, with its accompanying superstition. The magian doctrine, whatever it might be at first, had degenerated; and two eternal principles, good and evil, had been introduced. It was, therefore, necessarily idolatrous also, and, like all other false systems, flattering to the vicious habits of the people. So great an improvement in the moral character and influence of the religion of a whole nation as was effected by Zoroaster, a change which is not certainly paralleled in the ancient history of the religion of mankind, can scarcely, therefore, be thought possible, except we suppose a Divine interposition, either directly, or by the occurrence of some very impressive events. Now, as there are so many authorities for fixing the time of Zoroaster or Zeratust not many years subsequent to the death of the great Cyrus, the events connected with the conquest of Babylon may account for his success in that reformation of religion of which he was the author. For, had not the minds of men been prepared for this change by something extraordinary, it is not supposable that they would have adopted a purer faith from him. That he gave them a better doctrine, is clear from the admission of even Dean Prideaux, who has very unjustly branded him as an impostor. Let it then be remembered, that as "the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men," he often overrules great political events for moral purposes. The Jews were sent into captivity to Babylon to be reformed from their idolatrous propensities, and their reformation commenced with their calamity. A miracle was there wrought in favor of three Hebrew confessors of the existence of one only God, and that under circumstances to put shame upon a popular idol in the presence of the king, and "all the rulers of the provinces," that the issue of this controversy between Jehovah and idolatry might be made known throughout that vast empire. Worship was refused to the idol by a few Hebrew captives, and the idol had no power to punish the public affront: the servants of Jehovah were cast into a furnace, and he delivered them unhurt; and a royal decree declared "that there was no God who could deliver after this sort." The proud monarch himself also is smitten with a singular disease: he remains subject to it until he acknowledges the true God; and, upon his recovery, he publicly ascribes to him both the justice and the mercy of the punishment. This event takes place, also, in the accomplishment of a dream which none of the wise men of Babylon could interpret. It was interpreted by Daniel, who made the fulfilment to redound to the honor of the true God, by ascribing to him the perfection of knowing the future, which none of the false gods, appealed to by the Chaldean sages, possessed; as the inability of their servants to interpret the dream sufficiently proved. After these singular events, Cyrus takes Babylon, and he finds there the sage and statesman, Daniel, the worshipper of the true God, "who creates both good and evil," "who makes the light and forms the darkness." There is little doubt that he and the principal Persians throughout the empire would have the prophecy of Isaiah respecting Cyrus, delivered more than a hundred years before he was born, and in which his name stood recorded, along with the predicted circumstances of the capture of Babylon, pointed out to them. Every reason, religious and political, urged the Jews to make the prediction a matter of notoriety; and from Cyrus's decree in Ezra it is certain that he was acquainted with it; because there is in the decree an obvious reference to the prophecy. This prophecy, so strangely fulfilled, would give mighty force to the doctrine connected with it, and which it proclaims with so much majesty:

"I am JEHOVAH, and none else,
Forming LIGHT and creating DARKNESS, Making PEACE and creating EVIL:
I JEHOVAH am the author of all these things."

Here the great principle of corrupted magic was directly attacked; and, in proportion as the fulfilment of the prophecy was felt to be singular and striking, the doctrine blended with it would attract notice. Its force was both felt and acknowledged, as we have seen, in the decree of Cyrus for the rebuilding of the temple. In that Cyrus acknowledged the true God to be supreme, and thus renounced his former faith; and the example, the public example, of a prince so beloved, and whose reign was so extended, could not fail to influence the religious opinions of his people. That the effect did not terminate in Cyrus, we know; for, from the book of Ezra, it appears that both Darius and Artaxerxes made decrees in favor of the Jews, in which Jehovah has the emphatic appellation repeatedly given to him, "the God of heaven," the very terms used by Cyrus himself. Nor are we to suppose the impression confined to the court; for the history of the three Hebrew youths, of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, sickness, and reformation from idolatry, of the interpretation of the handwriting on the wall by Daniel the servant of the living God, of his deliverance from the lions, and the publicity of the prophecy of Isaiah respecting Cyrus, were too recent, too public, and too striking in their nature, not to be often and largely talked of. Besides, in the prophecy respecting Cyrus, the intention of Almighty God in recording the name of that monarch in an inspired book, and showing beforehand that he had chosen him to overturn the Babylonian empire, is expressly mentioned as having respect to two great objects, first, the deliverance of Israel, and, second, the making known his supreme divinity among the nations of the earth. We again quote Lowth's translation:

"For the sake of my servant Jacob,
And of Israel my chosen,
I have even called thee by thy name,
I have surnamed thee, though thou knewest me not.
I am JEHOVAH, and none else,
Beside me there is no God:
I will gird thee, though thou hast not known me,
That they may know, from the rising of the sun,
And from the west, that there is NONE BESIDE ME."

It was, therefore, intended by this proceeding on the part of Providence to teach, not only Cyrus, but the people of his vast empire, and surrounding nations, 1. That the God of the Jews was Jehovah, the self-subsistent, the eternal God; 2. That he was God alone, there being no Deity beside himself; and, 3. That good and evil, represented by light and darkness, were neither independent nor eternal subsistences, but his great instruments, and under his control.

The Persians, who had so vastly extended their empire by the conquest of the countries formerly held by the monarchs of Babylon, were thus prepared for such a reformation of their religion as Zoroaster effected. The principles he advocated had been previously adopted by Cyrus and other Persian monarchs, and probably by many of the principal persons of that nation. Zoroaster himself thus became acquainted with the great truths contained in this famous prophecy, which attacked the very foundations of every idolatrous and Manichæan system. From the other sacred books of the Jews, who mixed with the Persians in every part of the empire, he evidently learned more. This is sufficiently proved from the many points of similarity between his religion and Judaism, though he should not be allowed to speak so much in the style of the Holy Scriptures as some passages in the Zendavesta would indicate. He found the people, however, "prepared of the Lord" to admit his reformations, and he carried them. This cannot but be looked upon as one instance of several merciful dispensations of God to the Gentile world, through his own peculiar people, the Jews, by which the idolatries of the heathen were often checked, and the light of truth rekindled among them. In this view the ancient Jews evidently considered the Jewish Church as appointed not to preserve only but to extend true religion. "God be merciful to us and bless us; that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health unto all nations." This renders Pagan nations more evidently "without excuse." That this dispensation of mercy was afterward neglected among the Persians, is certain. How long the effect continued we know not, nor how widely it spread; perhaps longer and wider than may now distinctly appear. If the magi, who came from the east to seek Christ, were Persians, some true worshippers of God would appear to have remained in Persia to that day; and if, as is probable, the prophecies of Isaiah and Daniel were retained among them, they might be among those who "waited for redemption," not at Jerusalem, but in a distant part of the world. The Parsees, who were nearly extirpated by Mohammedan fanaticism, were charged by their oppressors with the idolatry of fire, and this was probably true of the multitude. Some of their writers, however, warmly defended themselves against the charge. A considerable number of them remain in India to this day, and profess to have the books of Zoroaster.

2. The term magi was also anciently used generally throughout the east, to distinguish philosophers, and especially astronomers. Pliny and Ptolemy mention Arabi as synonymous with magi; and it was the opinion of many learned men in the first ages of Christianity, that the magi who presented offerings to the infant Saviour, Matt. ii. 1, came from southern Arabia; for it is certain that "gold, frankincense, and myrrh," were productions of that country. They were philosophers among whom the best parts of the reformed magian system, which was extensively diffused, were probably preserved. They were pious men, also, who had some acquaintance, it may be, with the Hebrew prophecies, and were favored themselves with Divine revelations. They are to be regarded as members of the old patriarchal Church, never quite extinguished among the heathen; and they had the special honor to present the homage of the Gentile world to the infant Saviour.

MAGICIAN not unfrequently occurs in Scripture. Generally it signifies a diviner, a fortune-teller, etc. Moses forbids recourse to such on pain of death: "The soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and even cut him off from among his people." Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6. The Hebrew אֱלֹהֵי-הַמִּסְתֵּי וְאֲדֹמְרֵי, which signify literally—the first, those possessed with a spirit of Python, or a demon that foretells future events; the second, knowers, they who boast of the knowledge of secret things. It was such sort of people that Saul extirpated out of the land of Israel. 1 Sam. xxviii. 3. Daniel also speaks of magicians and diviners in Chaldea, under Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel i. 20, etc.; לְרֹמְשֵׁי וּלְכַשְׂפֵּי. He names four sorts: Chartumim, Asaphim, Mecasphim, and Casdim. Daniel ii. 2. The first, Chartumim, according to Theodotion, signifies "enchanters;" according to the LXX., "sophists;" according to Jerome, harioslas, "diviners, fortune-tellers, casters of nativities." The second word, Asaphim, has a great resemblance to the Greek word σοφός, "wise men;" whether the Greeks took this word from the Babylonians, or vice versa. Theodotion and Jerome have rendered it "magicians;" the LXX., "philosophers." The third word, Mecasphim, by Jerome and the Greeks, is translated malefici, "enchanters;" such as used noxious herbs and drugs, the blood of victims, and the bones of the dead, for their superstitious operations. The fourth word, Casdim, or Chaldeans, has two significations: first, the Chaldean people, over whom Nebuchadnezzar was monarch; the second, a sort of philosophers, who dwelt in a separate part of the city, who were exempt from all public offices and employments. Their studies were physic, astrology, divination, foretelling of future events by the stars, interpretation of dreams, augury, worship of the gods, etc. All these inquisitive and superstitious arts were prohibited among the Israelites, as founded on imposture or devilism, and as inconsistent with faith in God's providence, and trust in his supremacy. [The early Christians were derided by the heathen under the name of magicians. Celsus pretended that Christ practiced magic, which he learned in Egypt. Some asserted that he wrote books on magic for his disciples!]

MAGOG. See GOG.

[MAHAGLATH. This word occurs in the titles of Ps. liii. and lxxxviii., and is variously rendered, master of the dance, or of the flute, or of the band of pipers. Some think it the name of a tune.]

MAHANAIM, a city of the Levites, of the family of Merari, in the tribe of Gad, upon the brook Jabbok. Joshua xxi. 38; xiii. 26. The name Mahanaim signifies "two hosts," or "two fields." The patriarch gave it this name because in this place he had a vision of angels coming to meet him. Gen. xxxii. 2. Mahanaim was the seat of the kingdom of Ishbosheth, after the death of Saul. 2 Sam. ii. 9, 12. It was also to this place that David retired during the usurpation of Absalom, 2 Sam. xvii. 24; and this rebellious son was subdued, and suffered death, not far from this city.

[MAHOMETANISM. See MOHAMMEDANISM.]

[MAJORISTS. Followers of Major, who, about the time of the Interim, taught that good works are necessary to salvation: some of his opponents held that they were unfriendly to it.]

[MAKKEDAH. A town of Judah, eight miles east of Eleutheropolis. Josh. x.; xii. 16.]

[MAKTESH. Zeph. i. 11. The word denotes mortar, and Jerome says it was the name of a place near Jerusalem where they hulled rice, etc. Others think it means the lower city, or the valley between the upper and lower city. The Targum locates it in Kidron.]

MALACHI, the last of the twelve minor prophets. Malachi prophesied about B. C. 400; and some traditionary accounts state that he was a native of Sapha, and of the tribe of Zebulun. He reproves the people for their wickedness, and the priests for their negligence in the discharge of their office; he threatens the disobedient with the judgments of God, and promises great rewards to the penitent and pious; he predicts the coming of Christ, and the preaching of John the Baptist; and, with a solemnity becoming the last of the prophets, he closes the sacred canon with enjoining the strict observance of the Mosaic law, till the forerunner, already promised, should appear in the spirit of Elias, to introduce the Messiah, who was to establish a new and everlasting covenant.

[MALAKANI. A sect in Russia, principally in the Crimea, deriving their name from their using milk on fast-days. They call themselves "Spiritual Christians." Like the Duchobortsi, another sect of Russian mystics, they teach the spirituality of the law, of worship, and of the ordinances; but differ from them in believing the atonement, allowing a stated ministry, and keeping the Sabbath. They meet on Saturday evenings for prayer, to prepare their hearts for the services of the Lord's day.]

MAAMON, a Syriac word which signifies riches. Matt. vi. 24.

MAMRE, an Amorite, brother of Aner and Eshcol, and friend of Abraham. Gen. xiv. 13. It was with these three persons, together with his own and their domestics, that Abraham pursued and overcame the kings after their conquest of Sodom and Gomorrah.

MAMRE, the same as Hebron. In Gen. xxiii. 19 it is said that "Abraham buried Sarah in the cave of the field of Machpelah, before Mamre: the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan." And in Gen. xxxv. 27 it is said that "Jacob came unto Isaac his father, unto Mamre, unto the city of Arba, which is Hebron." The city probably derived its name from that Mamre who joined Abraham in the pursuit of Chedorlaomer, and the rescue of Lot. Gen. xiv.

MANRE, PLAIN OF, a plain near Mamre, or Hebron, said to be about two miles to the south of the town. Here Abraham dwelt after his separation from Lot; here he received from God himself a promise of the land, in which he was then a stranger, for his posterity; here he entertained the angels under an oak, and received a second promise of a son; and here he purchased a burying-place for Sarah; which served also as a sepulchre for himself and the rest of his family. [Gen. xiii. 18; xiv. 13; xviii. 1; xxiii. 17-20. See HEBRON.]

[MANAHATH. A town in Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 6.]

MANAHEM was the sixteenth king of Israel, and son of Gadi. He revenged the death of his master Zachariah, by killing Shallum, son of Jabesh, who had usurped the crown of Israel, A. M. 3232. 2 Kings xv. 13, etc. Manahem reigned in his stead.

MANASSEH, the eldest son of Joseph, and grandson of the patriarch Jacob, Gen. xli. 50, was born A. M. 2290, B. C. 1714. The name Manasseh signifies forgetfulness, because Joseph said, "God hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house." When Jacob was going to die, Joseph brought his two sons to him, that his father might give them his last blessing. Gen. xlviii. Jacob, having seen them, adopted them. The tribe of Manasseh came out of Egypt in number thirty-two thousand two hundred men, upward of twenty years old, under the conduct of Gamaliel, son of Pedahzur. Num. ii. 20, 21. This tribe was divided in the land of promise. One half tribe of Manasseh settled beyond the river Jordan, and possessed the country of Bashan, from the river Jabbok to Mount Libanus; and the other half tribe of Manasseh settled on this side Jordan, and possessed the country between the tribe of Ephraim south, and the tribe of Issachar north, having the river Jordan east, and the Mediterranean Sea west. Joshua xvi., xvii.

MANASSEH, the fifteenth king of Judah, and son and successor of Hezekiah, was twelve years old when he began to reign, and reigned fifty-five years. 2 Kings xx. 21; xxi. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1, 2, etc. His mother's name was Hephzibah. He did evil in the sight of the Lord: worshipped the idols in the land of Canaan; rebuilt the high-places that his father Hezekiah had destroyed; set up altars to Baal; and planted groves to false gods. He raised altars to the whole host of heaven, in the courts of God's house; made his son pass through the fire in honor of Moloch; was addicted to magic, divinations, auguries, and other superstitions; set up the idol Astarte in the house of God; finally he involved his people in all the abominations of the idolatrous nations to that degree that Israel committed more wickedness than the Canaanites, whom the Lord had driven out before them. To all these crimes Manasseh added cruelty; and he shed rivers of innocent blood in Jerusalem. The Lord being provoked by so many crimes, threatened him by his prophets, "I will blot out Jerusalem as a writing is blotted out of a writing-tablet." The calamities which God had threatened began toward the twenty-second year of this impious prince. The King of Assyria sent his army against him, who, seizing him among the briars and brambles where he was hid, fettered his hands and feet, and carried him to Babylon. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, 12, etc. It was probably Sargon or Esar-haddon, King of Assyria, who sent Tartan into Palestine, and who, taking Azoth, attacked Manasseh, put him in irons, and led him away, not to Nineveh, but to Babylon, of which Esar-haddon had become master, and had reunited the empires of the Assyrians and the Chaldeans. Manasseh, in bonds at Babylon, humbled himself before God, who heard his prayers, and brought him back to Jerusalem; and Manasseh acknowledged the hand of the Lord. Manasseh was probably delivered out of prison by Sinsuchin, the successor of Esar-haddon. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 13, 14, etc. Being returned to Jerusalem, he restored the worship of the Lord; broke down the altars of the false gods; abolished all traces of their idolatrous worship; but he did not destroy the high-places: which is the only thing Scripture reproaches him with, after his return from Babylon. He caused Jerusalem to be fortified; and he enclosed with a wall another city, which in his time was erected west of Jerusalem, and which went by the name of the second city. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. He put garrisons into all the strong places of Judah. Manasseh died at Jerusalem, and was buried in the garden of his house, in the garden of Uzza. 2 Kings xxi. 18. He was succeeded by his son Amon.

MANDRAKE, מַדְרֵאִים. Gen. xxx. 14-16: Cant. vii. 13. Interpreters have wasted much time and pains in endeavoring to ascertain what is intended by the Hebrew word dudaim. Some translate it by "violet," others "lilies," "jasmynes," "truffle or mushroom," and some think that the word means "flowers," or "fine flowers," in general. Bochart, Calmet, and Sir Thomas Browne, suppose the citron intended; Celsius is persuaded that it is the fruit of the lote tree; Hiller, that cherries are spoken of; and Ludolf maintains that it is the fruit which the Syrians call mauz, resembling in figure and taste the Indian fig; but the generality of interpreters and commentators understand by dudaim, mandrakes, a species of melon; and it is so rendered in the Septuagint, and in both the Targums, in Gen. xxx. 14. It appears from Scripture that they were in perfection about the time of wheat harvest, have an agreeable odor, may be preserved, and are placed with pomegranates. Hasselquist, the pupil and intimate friend of Linnæus, who travelled into the Holy Land to make discoveries in natural history, imagines that the plant commonly called mandrake is intended. Speaking of Nazareth, in Galilee, he says, "What I found most remarkable at this village was the great number of mandrakes which grew in a vale below it. I had not the pleasure to see this plant in blossom, the fruit now (May 5th, O. S.) hanging ripe on the stem, which lay withered on the ground. From the season in which this mandrake blossoms and ripens fruit, one may form a conjecture that it was Rachel's dudaim. These were brought her in the wheat harvest, which in Galilee is in the month of May, about this time, and the mandrake was now in fruit."

[MANEH. A hundred shekels. 1 Kings x. 17: 2 Chron. ix. 16. From Ezek. xlv. 12, it appears to have been sixty shekels, when used as money.]

[MANGER. Some understand by φάτνη, in Luke ii. 7, 12, 16, stall, as in Luke xiii. 15—not the place out of which the cattle ate, but the stabulum, the place where they stood to eat. Campbell, in a note on Luke ii. 7, learnedly defends the common rendering, and inclines to the tradition that the manger was in a cave.]

MANICHÆANS, or MANICHEES, a denomination founded in the latter part of the third century, by Mani, Manes, or Manicheus. Being a Persian or Chaldean by birth, and educated among the magi, he attempted a coalition of their doctrine with the Christian system, or, rather, the explication of the one by the other. Dr. Lardner, so far from taking Mani and his followers for enthusiasts, as some have done, thinks they erred on the other side, and were rather a sect of reasoners and philosophers than visionaries and enthusiasts. So Faustus, one of their leaders, says, the doctrine of Mani taught him not to receive every thing recommended as said by our Saviour, but first to examine and consider whether it be true, sound, right, genuine; while the Catholics, he says, swallowed every thing, and acted as if they despised the benefit of human reason, and were afraid to examine and distinguish between truth and falsehood. St. Augustin, it is well known, was for some time among this sect; but they were not pretensions to inspiration, but specious and alluring promises of rational discoveries, by which Augustin was deluded, as he particularly states in his letter to his friend Honoratus. So Beausobre remarks: "These heretics were philosophers, who, having formed certain systems, accommodated revelation to them, which was the servant of their reason, not the mistress."

Mani, according to Dr. Lardner, believed in an eternal self-existent Being, completely happy and perfect in goodness, whom alone he called God, in a strict and proper sense; but he believed also in an evil principle or being, which he called hyle, or the devil, whom he considered as the God of this world, blinding the eyes of them that believe not. 2 Cor. iv. 4. God, the supreme and good, they considered as the Author of the Universe; and, according to St. Augustin, they believed, also, in a consubstantial trinity, though they strangely supposed the Father to dwell in light inaccessible, the Son to have his residence in the solar orb, and the Holy Spirit to be diffused throughout the atmosphere; on which account they paid a superstitious, and perhaps an idolatrous, reverence to the sun and moon. Their belief in the evil principle was, no doubt, adopted to solve the mysterious question of the origin of evil, which, says Dr. Lardner, was the ruin of these men, and of many others. As to the hyle, or the devil, though they dared not to consider him as the creature of God, neither did they believe in his eternity; for they contended, from the Greek text of John viii. 44, that he had a father. But they admitted the eternity of matter, which they called darkness; and supposed hyle to be the result of some wonderful and unaccountable commotion in the kingdom of darkness, which idea seems to be borrowed from the Mosaic chaos. In this commotion darkness became mingled with light, and thus they account for good and evil being so mixed together in the world. Having thus brought hyle, or Satan, into being, they next found an empire and employment for him. Every thing, therefore, which they conceived unworthy of the fountain of goodness, they attributed to the evil being; particularly the material world, the Mosaic dispensation, and the Scriptures on which it was founded. This accounts for their rejecting the Old Testament. Dr. Lardner contends, however, that they received generally the books of the New Testament, though they objected to particular passages as corrupted, which they could not reconcile to their system. On Romans vii. Mani founded the doctrine of two souls in man, two active principles: one, the source and cause of vicious passions, deriving its origin from matter; the other, the cause of the ideas of just and right, and of inclinations to follow those ideas, deriving its origin from God. Considering all sensual enjoyments to be in some degree criminal, they were enemies to marriage; though, at the same time, knowing that all men cannot receive this saying, they allowed it to the second class of their disciples, called auditors; but by no means to the perfect or confirmed believers. Another absurd consequence of believing the moral evil of matter was that they denied the real existence of Christ's human nature, and supposed him to suffer and die in appearance only. According to them, he took the form only of man; a notion that was afterward adopted by Mohammed, and which necessarily excludes all faith in the atonement. Construing too literally the assertion that flesh and blood could not inherit the kingdom of God, they denied the doctrine of the resurrection. Christ came, they said, to save the souls of men, and not the bodies. No part of matter, according to them, could be worthy of salvation. In many leading principles they thus evidently agreed with the Gnostics, of whom, indeed, they may be considered a branch.

[Neander says Manes was presbyter of a church in Alivaz, capital of the Persian province Husitis. He travelled through the East Indies and China, and on his return the reigning monarch received him with favor; but his successor declared him a heretic, and had him flayed alive, and his skin stuffed, and hung up before the gates of Djondischapur, in order to intimidate his followers. As they were of Persian origin, the Roman emperors severely persecuted them. Manes was born in Persia, A. D. 240, and put to death about 277.]

MANNA, מַּן, Exod. xvi. 15, 33, 35: Num. xi. 6, 7, 9: Josh. v. 12: Neh. ix. 20: Ps. lxxviii. 24: מַּן, John vi. 31, 49, 58: Heb. ix. 4: Rev. ii. 17: the food which God gave the children of Israel during their continuance in the deserts of Arabia, from the eighth encampment in the wilderness of Sin. Moses describes it as white like hoar-frost, round, and of the bigness of coriander-seed. It fell every morning upon the dew; and when the dew was exhaled by the heat of the sun, the manna appeared alone, lying upon the rocks or the sand. It fell every day except on the Sabbath, and only around the camp of the Israelites. Every sixth day there fell a double quantity; and though it putrefied and bred maggots when it was kept any other day, yet on the Sabbath there was no such alteration. The same substance which was melted by the heat of the sun when it was left abroad, was of so hard a consistence when brought into the tent, that it was beaten in mortars, and would even endure the fire, being made into cakes and baked in pans. It fell in so great quantities during the whole forty years of their journey, that it was sufficient to feed the whole multitude of above a million of souls. Every man, that is, every male or head of a family, was to gather each day the quantity of an omer, about three quarts, English measure; and it is observed that "he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack," because his gathering was in proportion to the number of persons for whom he had to provide. Or every man gathered as much as he could; and then, when brought home and measured by an omer, if he had a surplus, it went to supply the wants of some other family that had not been able to collect a sufficiency, the family being large, and the time in which the manna might be gathered, before the heat of the day, not being sufficient to collect enough for so numerous a household, several of whom might be so confined as not to be able to collect for themselves. Thus there was an equality; and in this light the words of St. Paul lead us to view the passage, 2 Cor. viii. 15. To commemorate their living upon manna, the Israelites were directed to put one omer of it into a golden vase; and it was preserved for many generations by the side of the ark.

Our translators and others make a plain contradiction in the relation of this account of the manna, by rendering it thus: "And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna; for they knew not what it was;" whereas the Septuagint, and several authors, both ancient and modern, have translated the text according to the original: "The Israelites seeing this, said one to another, What is it? מַּן הַזֶּה; for they knew not what it was," and therefore they could not give it a name. Moses immediately answers the question, and says, "This is the bread which the Lord hath given you to eat." From Exodus xvi. 31, we learn that this substance was afterward called מַּן, probably in commemoration of the question they had asked on its first appearance. What this substance was we know not. It was nothing that was common in the wilderness. It is evident that the Israelites never saw it before; for Moses says, "He fed thee with manna which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know," Deut. viii. 3, 16; and it is very likely that nothing of the kind had ever been seen before; and by a pot of it being laid up in the ark, it is as likely that nothing of the kind ever appeared after the miraculous supply in the wilderness had ceased. The author of the book of Wisdom, xvi. 20, 21, says, that the manna so accommodated itself to every one's taste that it proved palatable and pleasing to all. It has been remarked that at this day what is called manna is found in several places; in Arabia, on Mount Libanus, Calabria, and elsewhere. The most famous is that of Arabia, which is a kind of condensed honey, which exudes from the leaves of trees, from whence it is collected when it has become concentered. Salmasius thinks this of the same kind which fed the children of Israel; and that the miracle lay, not in creating any new substance, but in making it fall duly at a set time every day throughout the whole year, and that in such plenty as to suffice so great a multitude. But in order for this, the Israelites must be supposed every day to have been in the neighborhood of the trees on which this substance is formed; which was not the case neither do these trees grow in those deserts. Besides, this kind of manna is purgative, and the stomach could not endure it in such quantity as is implied by its being eaten for food. The whole history of the giving of the manna is evidently miraculous; and the manna was truly "bread from heaven," as sent by special interposition of God.

[The superior of the convent at Mount Sinai told Dr. Robinson that the monn "is not produced every year; sometimes only after five or six years. It is found," says the Doctor, "in the form of shining drops on the twigs and branches (not upon the leaves) of the Turfa, Tamarix Gallica mannifera of Ehrenberg, from which it exudes in consequence of the puncture of an insect of the coccus kind, Coccus manniparus. It has the appearance of gum, is of a sweetish taste, and melts when exposed to the sun or to a fire. The Arabs consider it as a great delicacy, and the pilgrims prize it highly; especially those from Russia, who pay a high price for it. Of all the characteristics of the Old Testament manna, not one is applicable to the present manna."]

MANOAH, the father of Samson, was of the tribe of Dan, and a native of the city of Zorah. Judges xiii. 6-23. See SAMSON.

[MANUDUCTOR. The leader of the choir in the ancient Church, corresponding to the Greek MESOCHOROS.]

[MAON. A town in the south of Judah, giving name to a desert on the east. 1 Sam. xxv. 2; xxiii. 25. Dr. Robinson says, "The conical hill of Ma'in rises gradually not less than some 200 feet above the site of Carmel. From the top there is an extensive prospect toward the north and over the broad plain on the west. The summit is crowned with ruins of no great extent—foundations of hewn stone; a square enclosure, the remains probably of a tower or small castle; and several cisterns. The view is fine, including on the east the region toward the Dead Sea, and extending on the North to Beni Na'im and Hebron, which was distinctly seen in its valley. From Ma'in we could distinguish quite a number of places. Ma'in is without doubt the Maon of Nabal. Sem'û'a probably corresponds to the ancient Eshtemoa. Josh. xxi. 14; xv. 50. 'Attir suggests the Jattir of Scripture, Josh. xv. 48; while Sûsieh is a tract of ruins in the middle of the plain, said to be large, with many columns, though there seemed to be no houses standing. 'Anâb is of course the ancient name Anab without change, Josh. xi. 21; xv. 50; and in Shuweikeh, the diminutive form of Shaukeh, we may recognize the Socoh of the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 48. We found another Shuweikeh corresponding to the Socoh in the plain. Josh. xv. 35. In Yutta and Kurnul we have the Juttah and Carmel of antiquity. Eusebius and Jerome enumerate Anab, Eshtemoa, Jattir, and Juttah, as large villages in their age; though the specifications they give of their sites are very indefinite. Maon was then desolate; and the Socoh of the mountains is not mentioned by them. Carmel existed. But from the days of Jerome until the present century, not one of these names, except Carmel, occurs in history, or has been known as being still in existence. At Kurnul are more extensive ruins than we yet had seen, unless perhaps at Bethel. On the way, about a quarter of a mile south of the castle, are the remains of a church, etc.: the length of the foundations is 156 feet. The ruins of the town lie around the head and along the two sides of a valley, the head of which forms a semicircular amphitheatre shut in by rocks—on the bottom is a reservoir 117 feet long, 74 broad. The main ruins are west of the amphitheatre; and here stands the castle, 62 feet by 42—the height now remaining about 30 feet." There are also the ruins of three small churches, towers, and many houses. "Eusebius and Jerome describe Carmel as a village ten miles from Hebron, verging toward the east, with a Roman garrison. We hear no more of it until 1172, when Saladin invaded the country, and King Almarich, having marched against him without effect, drew back and encamped at Carmel. Here he found a pool and water in plenty for his army."]

[MAONITES, MEHUNIMS. Judges x. 12: 2 Chron. xxvi. 7. Robinson says, "Ma'an, the well-known town on the route of the Syrian Haj, nearly east of Wady Mûsa, is with good reason assumed as the probable seat of the Maonites."]

MARAH, or MARA, a word which signifies bitterness. When the Israelites came out of Egypt, and had arrived at the desert of Etham, they found the water so bitter that neither themselves nor their cattle could drink of it. Exod. xv. 23. On this account they gave the name of Marah to that encampment. And here their murmurings began against Moses; for they asked, "What shall we drink?" Moses prayed to the Lord, who instructed him to take a particular kind of wood, and cast it into the water, which he did; and immediately the water became palatable. According to the orientals, this wood was called Alnah.

[Modern travellers identify Marah with 'Ain Hawârah, about thirty-three miles, or three days' journey for the caravan of the Israelites, from 'Ayn Mûsa. Exod. xv. 22-25. The basin of Hawârah is six or eight feet in diameter, and the water two feet deep: it is saltish and somewhat bitter. Burckhardt suggests that the water may have been made palatable by mingling with it the berries of the Ghurkud; but apart from the disagreement with the statement of Moses, Robinson says the season for those berries could not have arrived when the Israelites were at Marah. The Bedouins know nothing about any tree or fruit used for sweetening bad water.]

MARBLE, מַרְבֵּל, 1 Chron. xxix. 2: Esther i. 6: Canticles v. 15: a valuable kind of stone, of a texture so hard and compact, and of a grain so fine, as readily to take a beautiful polish. It is dug out of quarries in large masses, and is much used in buildings, ornamental pillars, etc. Marble is of different colors, black, white, etc.; and is sometimes elegantly clouded and variegated. The stone mentioned in the places cited above is called the stone of sis or sish: the LXX. and Vulgate render it "Parian stone," which was remarkable for its bright white color. Probably the cliff Ziz, 2 Chron. xx. 16, was so called from being a marble crag: the place was afterward called Petra. The variety of stones, בִּהָט, שֵׁשׁ, סִלְוָה, זֶרֶךְ, mentioned in the pavement of Ahasuerus, might be marble of different colors. The ancients sometimes made pavements wherein were set very valuable stones.

[MARCELLANS. Followers of Marcellus, of Ancyra, in the fourth century, who held that the Son and Spirit are but emanations from the Father.]

[MARCIONITES. Followers of Marcion, son of the Bishop of Sinope in Pontus. He is said to have been excommunicated by his father for immorality and heresy. He went to Rome, where he met with Cerdo, a Syrian Gnostic, under whose instruction he developed a system, agreeing substantially with the Gnostic systems of the Syrian school, but affirming the existence of a kind of deity intermediate between the eternally good and the eternally evil powers. He was the Demiurge or God of the Jews. Mankind were governed despotically by this middle deity and the absolutely wicked power. To deliver them from this condition Christ descended into Capernaum with the appearance of a body to proclaim the good Deity, previously unknown. Those who believe in Christ, and lead a good life from love to the good Deity, shall be admitted into heaven; all others shall be left to the justice of the Demiurge. Marcion required his perfect Christians to abstain from marriage and other earthly pleasures. He rejected the Old Testament, and received in the New only the Gospel of Luke and ten Epistles of Paul, greatly mutilated and corrupted. Unlike other Gnostics, the Marcionites formed separate fraternities or churches. They rose about A. D. 144. Tertullian wrote five books against Marcion.]

[MARCITES. Followers of Marcion in the second century, who ordained women to the ministry. They called themselves perfecti, and professed to do every thing without fear.]

[MARCOSIANS. A sect of Valentinians, so called from Marcus, who held that the perfection of all truth is found in the Greek alphabet, and this is why our Lord is called the Alpha and the Omega. He taught that there is a quaternity in the Godhead—Infallibility, Silence, the Father, and Truth. They baptized in the name of the unknown Father of all things; in the name of Truth, the mother of all things; and in Jesus, who descended in the union of these powers, etc. Some of them, it is said, rejected baptism.]

[MARESHAH. A town in the plain of Judah, fortified by Rehoboam. Josh. xv. 44: 2 Chron. xi. 8. Here Asa defeated Zerah. 2 Chron. xiv. 9, 10. It was destroyed by Judas Maccabæus; rebuilt and fortified by Gabinius, again destroyed by the Parthians, and its ruins were pointed out in the fourth century, "in the second mile from Eleutheropolis," where Robinson thinks he discovered its remains.]

[MARIOLATRY. The adoration of the Virgin Mary. This impiety appears to have been introduced into the Church as early as the fourth century. See COLLYRIDIAN. It is the popular idolatry of the Church of Rome, as may be seen in Horne's "Mariolatry."]

MARK was the nephew of Barnabas, being his sister's son; and he is supposed to have been converted to the gospel by St. Peter, who calls him his son, 1 Peter v. 13; but no circumstances of his conversion are recorded. The first historical fact mentioned of him in the New Testament is, that he went, in the year 44, from Jerusalem to Antioch, with Paul and Barnabas. Not long after, he set out from Antioch with those apostles upon a journey, which they undertook by the direction of the Holy Spirit, for the purpose of preaching the gospel in different countries; but he soon left them, probably without sufficient reason, in Perga in Pamphylia, and went to Jerusalem. Acts xiii. Afterward, when Paul and Barnabas had determined to visit the several churches which they had established, Barnabas proposed that they should take Mark with them; to which Paul objected, because Mark had left them in their former journey. This produced a sharp contention between Paul and Barnabas, which ended in their separation. Mark accompanied his uncle Barnabas to Cyprus, but it is not mentioned whither they went when they left that island. We may conclude that St. Paul was afterward reconciled to St. Mark, from the manner in which he mentions him in his Epistles written subsequently to this dispute; and particularly from the direction which he gives to Timothy: "Take Mark, and bring him with thee; for he is profitable to me for the ministry." 2 Tim. iv. 11. No further circumstances are recorded of St. Mark in the New Testament; but it is believed, upon the authority of ancient writers, that soon after his journey with Barnabas he met Peter in Asia, and that he continued with him for some time; perhaps till Peter suffered martyrdom at Rome. Epiphanius, Eusebius, and Jerome, all assert that Mark preached the gospel in Egypt; and the two latter call him Bishop of Alexandria.

Dr. Lardner thinks that St. Mark's Gospel is alluded to by Clement of Rome; but the earliest ecclesiastical writer upon record who expressly mentions it is Papias. It is mentioned, also, by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, Augustin, Chrysostom, and many others. The works of these fathers contain numerous quotations from this Gospel; and, as their testimony is not contradicted by any ancient writer, we may safely conclude that the Gospel of St. Mark is genuine. The authority of this Gospel is not affected by the question concerning the identity of Mark the evangelist, and Mark the nephew of Barnabas; since all agree that the writer of this Gospel was the familiar companion of St. Peter, and that he was qualified for the work which he undertook, by having heard, for many years, the public discourses and private conversation of that apostle.

Some writers have asserted that St. Peter revised and approved this Gospel, and others have not scrupled to call it the Gospel according to St. Peter; by which title they did not mean to question St. Mark's right to be considered as the author of this Gospel, but merely to give it the sanction of St. Peter's name. The following passage in Eusebius appears to contain so probable an account of the occasion of writing this Gospel, and comes supported by such high authority, that we think it right to transcribe it: "The lustre of piety so enlightened the minds of Peter's hearers at Rome, that they were not contented with the bare hearing and unwritten instruction of his divine preaching, but they earnestly requested St. Mark, whose Gospel we have, being an attendant upon St. Peter, to leave with them a written account of the instructions which had been delivered to them by word of mouth; nor did they desist till they had prevailed upon him; and thus they were the cause of the writing of that Gospel which is called according to St. Mark; and they say, that the apostle being informed of what was done, by the revelation of the Holy Ghost, was pleased with the zeal of the men, and authorized the writing to be introduced into the churches. Clement gives this account in the sixth book of his Institutions; and Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, bears testimony to it." Jerome also says, that St. Mark wrote a short Gospel from what he had heard from St. Peter, at the request of the brethren at Rome, which, when St. Peter knew, he approved, and published it in the Church, commanding the reading of it by his own authority.

Different persons have assigned different dates to this Gospel; but there being almost a unanimous concurrence of opinion that it was written while St. Mark was with St. Peter at Rome, and not finding any ancient authority for supposing that St. Peter was in that city till A. D. 64, we are inclined to place the publication of this Gospel about A. D. 65. St. Mark having written this Gospel for the use of the Christians at Rome, which was at that time the great metropolis and common centre of all civilized nations, we accordingly find it free from all peculiarities, and equally accommodated to every description of persons. Quotations from the ancient prophets, and allusions to Jewish customs, are, as much as possible, avoided; and such explanations are added as might be necessary for Gentile readers at Rome: thus, when Jordan is first mentioned in this Gospel, the word river is prefixed, Mark i. 5: the oriental word corban is said to mean a gift, Mark vii. 11: the preparation is said to be the day before the Sabbath, Mark xv. 42; and defiled hands are said to mean unwashed hands, Mark vii. 2; and the superstition of the Jews upon that subject is stated more at large than it would have been by a person writing at Jerusalem.

Some learned men, from a collation of St. Matthew's and St. Mark's Gospels, have pointed out the use of the same words and expressions in so many instances that it has been supposed St. Mark wrote with St. Matthew's Gospel before him; but the similarity is not strong enough to warrant such a conclusion; and seems no greater than might have arisen from other causes. St. Peter would naturally recite in his preaching the same events and discourses which St. Matthew recorded in his Gospel; and the same circumstances might be mentioned in the same manner by men who sought not after "excellency of speech," but whose minds retained the remembrance of facts or conversations which strongly impressed them, even without taking into consideration the idea of supernatural guidance. We may further observe that the idea of St. Mark's writing from St. Matthew's Gospel does not correspond with the account given by Eusebius and Jerome, as stated above.

MARK ON THE FOREHEAD. See FOREHEAD.

MARONITES, a sect of eastern Christians who follow the Syrian rite, and are subject to the pope; their principal habitation being on Mount Libanus, or between the Ansarians to the north and the Druses to the south. Mosheim informs us that the Monothelites, condemned and exploded by the council of Constantinople, found a place of refuge among the Mardaites, signifying in Syriac rebels, a people who took possession of Lebanon, A. D. 676, which became the asylum of vagabonds, slaves, and all sorts of rabble; and about the conclusion of the seventh century they were called Maronites, after Maro, their first bishop; a name which they still retain. None, he says, of the ancient writers give any certain account of the first person who instructed these mountaineers in the doctrine of the Monothelites: it is probable, however, from several circumstances, that it was John Maro, whose name they have adopted; and that this ecclesiastic received the name of Maro from his having lived, in the character of a monk, in the famous convent of St. Maro, upon the borders of the Orontes, before his settlement among the Mardaites of Mount Libanus. One thing is certain, from the testimony of Tyrius, and other unexceptionable witnesses, as also from the most authentic records, namely, that the Maronites retained the opinions of the Monothelites until the twelfth century, when, abandoning and renouncing the doctrine of one will in Christ, they were readmitted into the communion of the Roman Church. The most learned of the modern Maronites have left no method unemployed to defend their Church against this accusation: they have labored to prove, by a variety of testimonies, that their ancestors always persevered in the Catholic faith, and in their attachment to the Roman pontiff, without ever adopting the doctrine of the Monophysites or Monothelites. But all their efforts are insufficient to prove the truth of these assertions, and the testimonies they allege will appear absolutely fictitious and destitute of authority.

The nation may be considered as divided into two classes, the common people and the shaiks, by whom must be understood the most eminent of the inhabitants, who, from the antiquity of their families, and the opulence of their fortunes, are superior to the ordinary class. They all live dispersed in the mountains, in villages, hamlets, and even detached houses; which is never the case in the plains. The whole nation consists of cultivators. Every man improves the little domain he possesses, or farms, with his own hands. Even the shaiks live in the same manner, and are only distinguished from the rest by a bad pelisse, a horse, and a few slight advantages in food and lodging: they all live frugally, without many enjoyments, but also with few wants, as they are little acquainted with the inventions of luxury. In general, the nation is poor, but no one wants necessities; and if beggars are sometimes seen, they come rather from the sea-coast than the country itself. Property is as sacred among them as in Europe; nor do we see there those robberies and extortions so frequent with the Turks. Travellers may journey there, either by night or by day, with a security unknown in any other part of the empire, and the stranger is received with hospitality, as among the Arabs: it must be owned, however, that the Maronites are less generous, and rather inclined to the vice of parsimony. Conformably to the doctrines of Christianity, they have only one wife, whom they frequently espouse without having seen, and always without having been much in her company. Contrary to the precepts of that same religion, however, they have admitted, or retained, the Arab custom of retaliation, and the nearest relation of a murdered person is bound to avenge him. From a habit founded on distrust, and the political state of the country, every one, whether shaikh or peasant, walks continually armed with a musket and poniards. This is, perhaps, an inconvenience; but this advantage results from it, that they have no novices in the use of arms among them, when it is necessary to employ them against the Turks. As the country maintains no regular troops, every man is obliged to join the army in time of war; and if this militia were well conducted, it would be superior to many European armies. From accounts taken in late years, the number of men fit to bear arms amounts to thirty-five thousand.

In religious matters the Maronites are dependent on Rome. Though they acknowledge the supremacy of the pope, their clergy continue, as heretofore, to elect a head, with the title of batrak, or patriarch of Antioch. [He resides at Canobin, in Mount Lebanon: his appointment is subject to the approval of the pope; and he observes perpetual celibacy.] Their priests marry, as in the first ages of the Church; but their wives must be maidens, and not widows; nor can they marry a second time. They celebrate mass in Syriac, of which the greater part of them comprehend not a word. The Gospel, alone, is read aloud in Arabic, that it may be understood by the people. [They use unleavened bread in the eucharist, agreeing thus with the Western Church.] The communion is administered in both kinds. In the small country of the Maronites there are reckoned upward of two hundred convents for men and women. These religious are of the order of St. Anthony, whose rules they observe with an exactness which reminds us of earlier times. The court of Rome, in affiliating the Maronites, has granted them a hospitium at Rome, to which they may send several of their youth to receive a gratuitous education. It should seem that this institution might introduce among them the ideas and arts of Europe; but the pupils of this school, limited to an education purely monastic, bring home nothing but the Italian language, which is of no use, and a stock of theological learning, from which as little advantage can be derived; they accordingly soon assimilate with the rest. Nor has a greater change been operated by the three or four missionaries maintained by the French capuchins at Gazir, Tripoli, and Bairout. Their labors consist in preaching in their church, in instructing children in the catechism, Thomas à Kempis, and the Psalms, and in teaching them to read and write. Formerly, the Jesuits had two missionaries at their house at Antoura, and the Lazarites have now succeeded them in their mission. The most valuable advantage that has resulted from these labors is, that the art of writing has become more common among the Maronites, and rendered them, in this country, what the Copts are in Egypt; that is, they are in possession of all the posts of writers, intendants, and kaiyas among the Turks, and especially of those among their allies and neighbors, the Druses.

Mosheim observes, that the subjection of the Maronites to the spiritual jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff was agreed to with this express condition, that neither the popes nor their emissaries should pretend to change or abolish any thing that related to the ancient rites, moral precepts, or religious opinions of this people; so that, in reality, there is nothing to be found among the Maronites that savors of Popery, if we except their attachment to the Roman pontiff. It is also certain that there are Maronites in Syria, who still behold the Church of Rome with the greatest aversion and abhorrence; nay, what is still more remarkable, great numbers of that nation residing in Italy, even under the eye of the pontiff, opposed his authority during the seventeenth century, and threw the court of Rome into great perplexity. One body of these non-conforming Maronites retired into the valleys of Piedmont, where they joined the Waldenses; another, above six hundred in number, with a bishop and several ecclesiastics at their head, flew into Corsica, and implored the protection of the republic of Genoa against the violence of the inquisitors.

MARRIAGE, a civil and religious contract, by which a man is joined and united to a woman, for the ends of procreation. The essence of marriage consists in the mutual consent of the parties. Marriage is a part of the law of nations, and is in use among all people. The public use of marriage institutions consists, according to Archdeacon Paley, in their promoting the following beneficial effects: 1. The private comfort of individuals. 2. The production of the greatest number of healthy children, their better education, and the making of due provision for their settlement in life. 3. The peace of human society, in cutting off a principal source of contention, by assigning one or more women to one man, and protecting his exclusive right by sanctions of morality and law. 4. The better government of society, by distributing the community into separate families, and appointing over each the authority of a master of a family, which has more actual influence than all civil authority put together. 5. The additional security which the state receives for the good behavior of its citizens, from the solicitude they feel for the welfare of their children, and from their being confined to permanent habitations. 6. The encouragement of industry.

Whether marriage be a civil or a religious contract, has been a subject of dispute. The truth seems to be that it is both. It has its engagements to men, and its vows to God. A Christian state recognizes marriage as a branch of public morality, and a source of civil peace and strength. It is connected with the peace of society by assigning one woman to one man, and the state protects him, therefore, in her exclusive possession. Christianity, by allowing divorce in the event of adultery, supposes, also, that the crime must be proved by proper evidence before the civil magistrate; and lest divorce should be the result of unfounded suspicion, or be made a cover for license, the decision of the case could safely be lodged nowhere else. Marriage, too, as placing one human being more completely under the power of another than any other relation, requires laws for the protection of those who are thus so exposed to injury. The distribution of society into families, also, can only be an instrument for promoting the order of the community, by the cognizance which the law takes of the head of the family, and by making him responsible, to a certain extent, for the conduct of those under his influence. Questions of property are also involved in marriage and its issue. The law must, therefore, for these and many other weighty reasons, be cognizant of marriage; must prescribe various regulations respecting it; require publicity of the contract; and guard some of the great injunctions of religion in the matter by penalties. In every well-ordered society, marriage must be placed under the cognizance and control of the state. But then those who would have the whole matter to lie between the parties themselves and the civil magistrate, appear wholly to forget that marriage is also a solemn religious act, in which vows are made to God by both persons, who, when the rite is properly understood, engage to abide by all those laws with which he has guarded the institution; to love and cherish each other; and to remain faithful to each other until death. For if, at least, they profess belief in Christianity, whatever duties are laid upon husbands and wives in Holy Scripture, they engage to obey by the very act of their contracting marriage. The question, then, is whether such vows to God are as necessarily involved in marriage, are to be left between the parties and God privately, or whether they ought to be publicly made before his ministers and the Church. On this the Scriptures are silent; but though Michaelis has shown that the priests under the law were not appointed to celebrate marriage, yet in the practice of the modern Jews it is a religious ceremony, the chief rabbi of the synagogue being present, and prayers being appointed for the occasion. This renders it probable that the character of the ceremony under the law, from the most ancient times, was a religious one. The more direct connection of marriage with religion in Christian states, by assigning its celebration to the ministers of religion, appears to be a very beneficial custom, and one which the state has a right to enjoin. For since the welfare and morals of society are so much interested in the performance of the mutual duties of the married state; and since those duties have a religious as well as a civil character, it is most proper that some provision should be made for explaining those duties; and for this a standing form of marriage is best adapted. By acts of religion, also, they are more solemnly impressed upon the parties. When this is prescribed in any state, it becomes a Christian cheerfully, and even thankfully, to comply with a custom of so important a tendency, as matter of conscientious submission to lawful authority, although no scriptural precept can be pleaded for it. That the ceremony should be confined to the clergy of an established Church, is a different consideration. We think that the religious effect would be greater, were the ministers of each religious body to be authorized by the state to celebrate marriages among their own people, due provision being previously made by the civil magistrate for the regular and secure registry of them, and to prevent the laws respecting marriage from being evaded; which is indeed his business. The offices of religion would then come in by way of sanction and moral enforcement.

When this important contract is once made, then certain rights are acquired by the parties mutually, who are also bound by reciprocal duties, in the fulfilment of which the practical virtue of each consists. And here the superior character of the morals of the New Testament, as well as their higher authority, is illustrated. It may, indeed, be within the scope of mere moralists to show that fidelity, and affection, and all the courtesies necessary to maintain affection, are rationally obligatory upon those who are connected by the nuptial bond; but in Christianity nuptial fidelity is guarded by the express law, "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" and by our Lord's exposition of the spirit of that law which forbids the indulgence of loose thoughts and desires, and places the purity of the heart under the guardianship of that hallowed fear which his authority tends to inspire. Affection, too, is made a matter of diligent cultivation upon considerations, and by a standard, peculiar to our religion. Husbands are placed in a relation to their wives similar to that which Christ bears to his Church, and his example is thus made their rule. As Christ loved the Church, so husbands are to love their wives; as Christ "gave himself," his life, "for the Church," Eph. v. 25, so are they to hazard life for their wives; as Christ saves his Church, so is it the bounden duty of husbands to endeavor, by every possible means, to promote the religious edification and salvation of their wives. The connection is thus exalted into a religious one; and when love which knows no abatement, protection at the hazard of life, and a tender and constant solicitude for the salvation of a wife, are thus enjoined, the greatest possible security is established for the exercise of kindness and fidelity. The oneness of this union is also more forcibly stated in Scripture than anywhere beside. "They twain shall be one flesh." "So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies: he that loveth his wife loveth himself. For no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the Church." Precept and illustration can go no higher than this; and nothing evidently is wanting either of direction or authority to raise the state of marriage into the highest, most endearing, and sanctified relation in which two human beings can stand to each other.

2. We find but few laws in the books of Moses concerning the institution of marriage. Though the Mosaic law nowhere obliges men to marry, the Jews have always looked upon it as an indispensable duty implied in the words, "Increase and multiply," Gen. i. 28; so that a man who did not marry his daughter before she was twenty years of age, was looked upon as accessory to any irregularities the young woman might be guilty of for want of being timely married. Moses restrained the Israelites from marrying within certain degrees of consanguinity; which had till then been permitted, to prevent their taking wives from among the idolatrous nations among whom they lived. Abraham gave this as a reason for choosing a wife for Isaac from among his own kindred. Gen. xxxiv. 3, etc. But when his descendants became so exceedingly multiplied, this reason ceased; and the great law-giver prohibited, under pain of death, certain degrees of kindred as incestuous. Polygamy, though not expressly allowed, is, however, tacitly implied in the laws of Moses. Gen. xxxi. : Exod. xxi. 10. This practice likewise was authorized by the example of the patriarchs. Thus Jacob married both the daughters of Laban. In respect to which custom, Moses enjoins that, upon the marriage of a second wife, a man shall be bound to continue to the first her food, raiment, and the duty of marriage. The Jews did not always content themselves with the allowance of two wives, as may be seen in the examples of David, Solomon, and many others. However, they made a distinction between the wives of the first rank and those of the second. The first they called nashim, and the other pilegashim; which last, though most versions render it by the words "concubines," "harlots," and "prostitutes," yet it has nowhere in Scripture any such bad sense. There is a particular law called the Levirate, which obliged a man, whose brother died without issue, to marry his widow, and raise up seed to his brother. Deut. xxv. 5, etc. But Moses in some measure left it to a man's choice whether he would comply with this law or not; for in case of a refusal, the widow could only summon him before the judges of the place, when, if he persisted, she untied his shoe, and spat in his face, and said, "Thus shall it be done unto the man who refuses to build up his brother's house." A man was at liberty to marry not only in the twelve tribes, but even out of them, provided it was among such nations as used circumcision; such were the Midianites, Ishmaelites, Edomites, Moabites, and Egyptians. Accordingly, we find Moses himself married to a Midianite, and Boaz to a Moabite. Amasa was the son of Jether, an Ishmaelite, by Abigail, David's sister; and Solomon, in the beginning of his reign, married Pharaoh's daughter. Whenever we find him and other kings blamed for marrying strange women, we must understand it of those nations which were idolatrous and uncircumcised.

[The canonists have carefully specified the several degrees of affinity within which marriage may not be contracted, the regulations being taken from the Mosaic code. The question as to the lawfulness of marrying a brother's widow, or the sister of a deceased wife, was much controverted: the general sense was adverse to these connections, as appears from the dispensation made in such cases to the clergy. The fathers denounced marriages of Christians with idolaters, and they were forbidden by decrees of councils—as also marriages with Jews, Mohammedans, and heretics. If such marriages had been contracted before the parties were converted to Christianity, they were not annulled after the conversion of one of them. The parties about to be married were required to signify their intentions to the pastor, who was to decide whether or not the proposed union was proper; otherwise, censure, penance, or excommunication might follow. Religious rites in matrimony were required by the Church as early as the second century; but were not recognized by the civil law until the ninth. The use of the ring in espousal and marriage is very ancient; so also kissing, crowning, veiling, processions, etc. See DIGAMISTS and ESPOUSALS.]

It appears almost impossible to Europeans, says Mr. Hartley, that a deception like that of Laban's could be practiced. But the following extract, from a journal which I kept at Smyrna, presents a parallel case: "The Armenian brides are veiled during the marriage ceremony; and hence deceptions have occurred in regard to the person chosen for wife. I am informed that, on one occasion, a young Armenian at Smyrna solicited in marriage a younger daughter, whom he admired. The parents of the girl consented to the request, and every previous arrangement was made. When the time for solemnizing the marriage arrived, the elder daughter, who was not so beautiful, was conducted by the parents to the altar, and the young man was unconsciously married to her. And 'it came to pass that in the morning, behold, it was the elder daughter.' The deceit was not discovered till it could not be rectified; and the manner in which the parents justified themselves was precisely that of Laban: 'It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born.' It is really the rule among the Armenians, that neither a younger son nor daughter be married, till their elder brother or sister have preceded them." I was once present at the solemnization of matrimony among the Armenians; and some recollections of it may tend to throw light on this and other passages of Scripture. The various festivities attendant on these occasions continue for three days; and during the last night the marriage is celebrated. I was conducted to the house of the bride, where I found a very large assemblage of persons. The company was dispersed through various rooms; reminding me of the directions of our Saviour in regard to the choice of the lowermost rooms at feasts. On the ground floor I actually observed that the persons convened were of an inferior order of the community, while in the upper rooms were assembled those of higher rank. The large number of young females who were present, naturally reminded me of the wise and foolish virgins in our Saviour's parable. These being friends of the bride, the virgins, her companions, had come to meet the bridegroom. Psalm xlv. 14. It is usual for the bridegroom to come at midnight; so that, literally, at midnight the cry is made, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh! go ye out to meet him." Matt. xxv. 6. But on this occasion the bridegroom tarried: it was two o'clock before he arrived. The whole party then proceeded to the Armenian church, where the bishop was waiting to receive them; and there the ceremony was completed. See DIVORCE and BRIDE.

[MARS' HILL. "This," says Dr. Robinson, "is a narrow naked ridge of limestone rock, rising gradually from the northern end, and terminating abruptly on the south, over against the west end of the Acropolis, from which it bears about north; being separated from it by an elevated valley. This southern end is fifty or sixty feet above the said valley, yet much lower than the Acropolis. On its top are still to be seen the seats of the judges and parties hewn in the rock; and toward the south-west is a descent by a flight of steps, also cut in the rock, into the valley below. Standing on this elevated platform, surrounded by the learned and the wise of Athens, Paul had directly before him the far-famed Acropolis, with its wonders of Grecian art; and beneath him, on his left, the majestic Theseium, the earliest and still most perfect of Athenian structures; while, all around, other temples and altars filled the whole city. Yet here Paul hesitated not to exclaim: 'God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands.' On the Acropolis, too, were the three celebrated statues of Minerva: one of olive-wood; another of gold and ivory, in the Parthenon, the masterpiece of Phidias; and the colossal statue in the open air, the point of whose spear was seen over the Parthenon by those sailing along the gulf. To these Paul probably referred and pointed when he went on to affirm that 'the Godhead is not like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device.'" Acts xvii. MARTHA was sister of Lazarus and Mary, and mistress of the house where our Saviour was entertained, in the village of Bethany. Martha is always named before Mary, probably because she was the elder sister. [Luke x. 38-42: John xi. ; xii. 2.]

[MARTINMAS. November 11: the feast of St. Martin, Bishop of Tours, who died A. D. 400.]

[MARTYR. Μάρτυρ, μάρτυς. Acts xxii. 20: Rev. ii. 13. One who dies as a witness to the truth, as Christ, Stephen, and Antipas. Eusebius wrote a history of the martyrs who fell under the persecutions of the Roman emperors. Jerome also wrote a work on the same subject, which is considered the great martyrology of the Latin Church. Gibbon insinuates that but few Christians fell by the sword of persecution; but existing records, catacombs, and other monuments, show that there was a large as well as noble army of martyrs. Festivals in honor of the martyrs can be traced to the time of Polycarp, who suffered martyrdom, A. D. 168: they were generally held at the graves of the martyrs. Catechumens who suffered martyrdom were looked upon as baptized with their own blood, an enviable substitute for baptism with water. In later ages extraordinary prerogatives were attributed to the martyrs, and superstitious and idolatrous honors rendered to them. The myriads of Protestants put to death by Papists are called martyrs: accounts of many of them may be found in Fox's Book of Martyrs, and Rule's Martyrs of the Reformation. The same name is also frequently given to the Remonstrants, Anabaptists, Quakers, Covenanters, and others, who were persecuted to death by mistaken Protestants in Holland, Germany, Great Britain, New England, and elsewhere.]

[MARTYRIUM. A church built over a martyr's grave. Eusebius calls the church built on Calvary, Martyrium Salvatoris.]

MARY, the mother of Jesus, and wife of Joseph. She is called by the Jews the daughter of Eli; and by the early Christian writers, the daughter of Joakim and Anna; but Joakim and Eliakim are sometimes interchanged, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4; and Eli, or Heli, is therefore the abridgment of Eliakim, Luke iii. 23. She was of the royal race of David, as was also Joseph her husband; and she was also cousin to Elisabeth, the wife of Zacharias the priest. Luke i. 5, 36. Mary being espoused to Joseph, the Angel Gabriel appeared to her, to announce to her that she should be the mother of the Messiah. Luke i. 26, 27, etc. To confirm his message, and to show that nothing is impossible to God, he added that her cousin Elisabeth, who was old, and had been hitherto barren, was then in the sixth month of her pregnancy. Mary answered, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord: be it unto me according to thy word;" and presently she conceived. She set out for Hebron, a city in the mountains of Judah, to visit her cousin Elisabeth. As soon as Elisabeth heard the voice of Mary, her child, John the Baptist, leaped in her womb; and she was filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake with a loud voice, saying, "Blessed art thou among women," etc. Then Mary praised God, saying, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour," etc. Mary continued with Elisabeth about three months, and then returned to her own house. An edict of Cæsar Augustus having decreed that all subjects of the empire should go to their own cities, to register their names according to their families, Joseph and Mary, who were both of the lineage of David, went to Bethlehem, from whence sprang their family. But while they were here, the time being fulfilled in which Mary was to be delivered, she brought forth her first-born son. She wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in the manger of the stable or cavern whither they had retired, because there was no room in the inn. Angels made this event known to shepherds, who were in the fields near Bethlehem, and these came in the night to Joseph and Mary and saw the child lying in the manger, and paid him their adoration. The presentation of Christ in the temple, the flight into Egypt, the slaughter of the innocents, and other events connected with the birth and infancy of our Lord, are plainly related in the Gospels. Mary and Joseph went every year to Jerusalem to the passover; and when Jesus was twelve years of age, they took him with them. When they were returning, the youth continued at Jerusalem, without their perceiving it. Three days after, they found him in the temple, sitting among the doctors, hearing them, and asking them questions. Afterward, he returned with them to Nazareth, and lived in filial submission to them. But his mother laid up all these things in her heart. Luke ii. 51, etc. The Gospel speaks nothing more of the Virgin Mary till the marriage at Cana of Galilee, at which she was present with her son Jesus. She was at Jerusalem at the last passover our Saviour celebrated there. There she saw all that was transacted; followed him to Calvary; and stood at the foot of his cross with an admirable constancy and courage. Jesus seeing his mother, and his beloved disciple near, he said to his mother, "Woman, behold thy son; and to the disciple, Behold thy mother. And from that hour the disciple took her home to his own house." No further particulars of this favored woman are mentioned, except that she was a witness of Christ's resurrection. A veil is drawn over her character and history; as though with the design to reprove that wretched idolatry of which she was made the subject when Christianity became corrupt and paganized. [The last occurrence of her name is in Acts i. 14.]

MARY, the mother of John Mark, a disciple of the apostles. She had a house in Jerusalem, whither, it is thought, the apostles retired after the ascension of our Lord, and where they received the Holy Ghost. After the imprisonment of St. Peter, the faithful assembled in this house, and were praying there when Peter, delivered by the ministry of an angel, knocked at the door of the house. Acts xii. 12.

MARY, of Cleophas. St. Jerome says she bore the name of Cleophas, either because of her father, or for some other reason which cannot now be known. Others believe, with greater probability, that she was the wife of Cleophas, as our version of the New Testament makes her, by supplying the word wife, John xix. 25, and mother of James the Less, and of Simon, brethren of our Lord. These last-mentioned authors take Mary, mother of James, and Mary, wife of Cleophas, to be the same person. Matt. xxvii. 56: Mark xv. 40, 41: Luke xxiv. 10: John xix. 25. St. John gives her the name of Mary of Cleophas; and the other evangelists, the name of Mary, mother of James. Cleophas and Alphaeus are the same person; as James, son of Mary, wife of Cleophas, is the same as James, son of Alphaeus. It is thought she was the sister of the Virgin Mary, and that she was the mother of James the Less, of Joses, of Simon, and of Judas, who in the Gospel are named the brethren of Jesus Christ—Matt. xiii. 55; xxvii. 56: Mark vi. 3—that is, his cousins-german. She was an early believer in Jesus Christ, and attended him on his journeys, to minister to him. She was present at the last passover, and at the death of our Saviour she followed him to Calvary; and during his passion she was with the mother of Jesus at the foot of the cross. She was also present at his burial; and on the Friday before had, in union with others, prepared the perfumes to embalm him. Luke xxiii. 56. But going to his tomb very early on the Sunday morning, with other women, they there learned from the mouth of an angel that he was risen; of which they carried the news to the apostles. Luke xxiv. 1-5: Matt. xxviii. 9. By the way Jesus appeared to them; and they embraced his feet, worshipping him. This is all we know with certainty concerning Mary, the wife of Cleophas.

MARY, sister of Lazarus, who has been posterously confounded with that female sinner spoken of, Luke vii. 37-39. She lived with her brother and her sister Martha at Bethany; and Jesus Christ, having a particular affection for this family, often retired to their house with his disciples. Six days before the passover, after having raised Lazarus from the dead, he came to Bethany with his disciples, and was invited to sup with Simon the leper, John xii. 1, etc.: Matt. xxvi. 6, etc.: Mark xiv. 3, etc. Martha attended at the table, and Lazarus was one of the guests. Upon this occasion, Mary, taking a pound of spikenard, which is the most precious perfume of its kind, poured it upon the head and feet of Jesus. She wiped his feet with her hair, and the whole house was filled with the odor of the perfume. Judas Iscariot murmured at this; but Jesus justified Mary in what she had done, saying that by this action she had prevented his embalmment, and in a manner had declared his death and burial, which were at hand. From this period the Scriptures make no mention of either Mary or Martha.

MARY MAGDALENE, so called, it is probable, from Magdala, a town of Galilee, of which she was a native, or where she had resided during the early part of her life. Out of her, St. Luke tells us, Jesus had cast seven devils. Luke viii. 2. He informs us, also, in the same place, that Jesus, in company with his apostles, preached the gospel from city to city; and that there were several women with them, whom he had delivered from evil spirits, and healed of their infirmities; among whom was this Mary, whom some, without a shadow of proof, have supposed to be the sinful woman spoken of, Luke vii. 37-39; as others have as erroneously imagined her to be Mary, the sister of Lazarus. Mary Magdalene is mentioned by the evangelists as being one of those women that followed our Saviour to minister to him, according to the custom of the Jews. She attended him in the last journey he made from Galilee to Jerusalem, and was at the foot of the cross with the holy virgin, John xix. 25:

Mark xv. 47; after which she returned to Jerusalem, to buy and prepare with others certain perfumes, that she might embalm him after the Sabbath was over, which was then about to begin. All the Sabbath day she remained in the city; and the next day, early in the morning, went to the sepulchre along with Mary, the mother of James, and Salome. Mark xvi. 1, 2: Luke xxiv. 1, 2. For other particulars respecting her, see also Matt. xxviii. 1-5: John xx. 11-17. In Dr. Townley's Essays, there is one of considerable research on Mary Magdalene; and his conclusion is, that it is probable that the woman mentioned by St. Luke, and called in the English translation "a sinner," had formerly been a heathen; but whether subsequently a proselyte to Judaism or not, is uncertain; and that, having been brought to the knowledge of Christian truth, and having found mercy from the Redeemer, she pressed into Simon's house, and gave the strongest proofs of her gratitude and veneration by anointing the Saviour's feet, bedewing them with her tears, and wiping them with the hairs of her head: that, by a wilful and malicious misrepresentation, the Jews confounded Mary Magdalene with Mary the mother of Jesus, and represented her as an infamous character; and that, from the blasphemous calumny of the Jews, a stigma of infamy has been affixed to the name of Mary Magdalene, and caused her to be regarded in the false light of a penitent prostitute. There is no doubt that Mary Magdalene, both in character and circumstances, was a woman of good reputation.

MASCHIL, a title, or inscription, at the head of several psalms of David and others, in the book of Psalms. Thus Psalm xxxii. is inscribed, "A Psalm of David, Maschil;" and Psalm xlii., "To the chief musician, Maschil, for the sons of Korah." The word Maschil, in the Hebrew, signifies, "he that instructs;" though some interpreters take it for the name of a musical instrument. Some of the rabbins believe that, in repeating the psalms which have this inscription, it was usual to add an interpretation or explication to them. Others, on the contrary, think it shows the clearness and perspicuity of such psalms, and that they needed no particular explication. The most probable opinion is, that Maschil means an instructive song.

[MASH. Son of Aram, Gen. x. 23: called Meshech, 1 Chron. i. 17. He is supposed to have given name to Mount Masius, in Mesopotamia, and to the river Mazecha, which heads there.]

MASS, missa, in the Church of Rome, the office of prayers used at the celebration of the eucharist; or, in other words, the consecrating of the bread and wine so that they are transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ, and offering them as an expiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead. Nicod, after Baronius, observes that the word comes from the Hebrew missach, (oblatum), or from the Latin missa missorum; because in former times the catechumens and excommunicated were sent out of the church, when the deacons said, "Ite, missa est," after sermon and reading of the Epistle and Gospel; they not being allowed to assist at the consecration. Menage derives the word from missio, "dismissing;" others, from missa, "sending;" because in the mass the prayers of men on earth are sent up to heaven.

As the mass is in general believed to be a representation of the passion of our blessed Saviour, so every action of the priest, and every particular part of the service, are supposed to allude to the particular circumstances of his passion and death. The general division of masses is into high and low mass. The first is that sung by the choristers, and celebrated with the assistance of a deacon and sub-deacon: low masses are those in which the prayers are barely rehearsed without singing. There are a great number of different or occasional masses in the Romish Church, many of which have nothing peculiar but the name. Such are the masses of the saints: that of St. Mary of the Snow, celebrated on the fifth of August; that of St. Margaret, patroness of lying-in women; that at the feast of St. John the Baptist, at which are said three masses; that of the Innocents, at which the Gloria in excelsis and Hallelujah are omitted; and, it being a day of mourning, the altar is of a violet color. As to ordinary masses, some are said for the dead, and, as is supposed, contribute to extricate the soul out of purgatory. At these masses the altar is put in mourning, and the only decorations are a cross in the middle of six yellow wax lights; the dress of the celebrant, and the very mass-book, are black; many parts of the office are omitted, and the people are dismissed without the benediction. If the mass be said for a person distinguished by his rank or virtues, it is followed with a funeral oration; they erect a chappelle ardente, that is, a representation of the deceased, with branches and tapers of yellow wax, either in the middle of the church, or near the deceased's tomb, where the priest pronounces a solemn absolution of the deceased. There are likewise private masses said for stolen or strayed goods or cattle, for health, for travellers, etc., which go under the name of votive masses. There is still a further distinction of masses, denominated from the countries in which they were used: thus the Gothic mass, or missa mosarabum, is that used among the Goths, when they were masters of Spain, and which is still observed at Toledo and Salamanca; the Ambrosian mass is that composed by St. Ambrose, and used only at Milan, of which city he was bishop; the Gallic mass, used by the ancient Gauls; and the Roman mass, used by almost all the churches in the Roman communion.

MATERIALISM, the doctrine which resolves the thinking principle in man, or the immaterial and immortal soul with which God was pleased to endue Adam at his creation, into mere matter, or into a faculty resulting from its organization. Much has been written of late years against this doctrine, and the different modifications which it has assumed; but in substance nothing new has been said on either side; and the able and condensed argument of Wollaston in his "Religion of Nature Delineated," if well considered, will furnish every one with a most clear and satisfactory refutation of this anti-scriptural and irrational error:—The soul cannot be mere matter; for if it is, then either all matter must think; or the difference must arise from the different modification, magnitude, figure, or motion of some parcels of matter in respect of others; or a faculty of thinking must be superadded to some systems of it which is not superadded to others. But, in the first place, that position, which makes all matter to be cogitative, is contrary to all the apprehensions and knowledge we have of the nature of it; nor can it be true, unless our senses and faculties be contrived only to deceive us. We perceive not the least symptom of cogitation or sense in our tables, chairs, etc. Why doth the scene of thinking lie in our heads, and all the ministers of sensation make their reports to something there, if all matter be apprehensive and cogitative? For in that case there would be as much thought and understanding in our heels, and everywhere else, as in our heads. If all matter be cogitative, then it must be so quatenus [so far forth as] matter, and thinking must be of the essence and definition of it; whereas by matter no more is meant than a substance extended and impenetrable to other matter. And since, for this reason, it cannot be necessary for matter to think, (because it may be matter without this property,) it cannot think as matter only; if it did, we should not only continue to think always, till the matter of which we consist is annihilated, and so the assertor of this doctrine would stumble upon immortality unawares; but we must also have thought always in time past, ever since that matter was in being; nor could there be any the least intermission of actual thinking; which does not appear to be our case. If thinking, self-consciousness, etc., were essential to matter, every part of it must have them; and then no system could have them. For a system of material parts would be a system of things conscious, every one by itself of its own existence and individuality, and, consequently, thinking by itself; but there could be no one act of self-consciousness or thought common to the whole. Juxtaposition, in this case, could signify nothing: the distinction and individuation of the several particles would be as much retained in their vicinity, as if they were separated by miles.

In the next place, the faculties of thinking, etc., cannot arise from the size, figure, texture, or motion of it; because bodies by the alteration of these only become greater or less, round or square, etc., rare or dense, translated from one place to another with this or that new direction or velocity, or the like; all which ideas are quite different from that of thinking; there can be no relation between them. These modifications and affections of matter are so far from being principles or causes of thinking and acting, that they are themselves but effects, proceeding from the action of some other matter or thing upon it, and are proofs of its passivity, deadness, and utter incapacity of becoming cogitative: this is evident to sense. They who place the essence of the soul in a certain motion given to some matter, (if any such men there really be,) should consider, among many other things, that to move the body spontaneously, is one of the faculties of the soul; and that this, which is the same with the power of beginning motion, cannot come from motion already begun, and impressed ab extra. Let the materialist examine well, whether he does not feel something within himself that acts from an internal principle; whether he does not experience some liberty, some power of governing himself, and choosing; whether he does not enjoy a kind of invisible empire in which he commands his own thoughts, sends them to this or that place, employs them about this or that business, forms such and such designs and schemes; and whether there is any thing like this in bare matter, however fashioned or proportioned; which, if nothing should protrude or communicate motion to it, would for ever remain fixed to the place where it happens to be, an eternal monument of its own being dead. Can such an active being as the soul is, the subject of so many powers, be itself nothing but an accident? When I begin to move myself, I do it for some reason, and with respect to some end, the means to effect which I have, if there be occasion for it, concerted within myself; and this does not at all look like motion merely material, or in which matter is only concerned, which is all mechanical. Who can imagine matter to be moved by arguments, or ever placed syllogisms and demonstrations among levers and pulleys? We not only move ourselves upon reasons which we find in ourselves, but upon reasons imparted by words or writings from others, or perhaps merely at their desire or bare suggestion; in which case, again, nobody surely can imagine that the words spoken or written, the sound in the air, or the strokes on the paper, can, by any natural or mechanical effieience, cause the reader or hearer to move in any determinate manner, or at all. The reason, request, or friendly admonition, which is the true motive, can make no impression upon matter. It must be some other kind of being that apprehends the force and sense of them. Do not we see, in conversation, how a pleasant thing said makes people break out into laughter, a rude thing into passion, and so on? These affections cannot be the physical effects of the words spoken, because then they would have the same effect, whether they were understood or not. And this is further demonstrable from hence, that though the words do really contain nothing which is either pleasant or rude, or perhaps words are thought to be spoken which are not spoken, yet if they are apprehended to do that, or the sound to be otherwise than it was, the effect will be the same. It is therefore the sense of the words, which is an immaterial thing, that, by passing through the understanding, and causing that which is the subject of the intellectual faculties to influence the body, produces these motions in the spirits, blood, and muscles.

They who can fancy that matter may come to live, think, and act spontaneously, by being reduced to a certain magnitude, or having its parts placed after a certain manner, or being invested with such a figure, or excited by such a particular motion; they, I say, would do well to discover to us that degree of fineness, that alteration in the situation of its parts, etc., at which matter may begin to find itself alive and cogitative; and which is the critical minute that introduces these important properties. If they cannot do this, nor have their eye upon any particular crisis, it is a sign that they have no good reason for what they say. For if they have no reason to charge this change upon any particular degree or difference, one more than another, they have no reason to charge it upon any degree or difference at all; and then they have no reason by which they can prove that such a change is made at all. Besides all which, since magnitude, figure, and motion are but accidents of matter, not matter, and only the substance is truly matter; and since the substance of any one part of matter does not differ from that of another, if any matter can be by nature cogitative, all must be so; but this we have seen cannot be. So then, in conclusion, if there is any such thing as matter that thinks, etc., this must be a particular privilege granted to it; that is, a faculty of thinking must be superadded to certain parts or parcels of it; which, by the way, must infer the existence of some being able to confer this faculty; who, when the ineptness of matter has been well considered, cannot appear to be less than omnipotent, or God. But the truth is, matter seems not to be capable of such improvement, of being made to think. For since it is not the essence of matter, it cannot be made to be so without making matter another kind of substance from what it is. Nor can it be made to arise from any of the modifications or accidents of matter; and in respect of what else can any matter be made to differ from other matter?

The accidents of matter are so far from being made by any power to produce cogitation, that some even of them show it incapable of having a faculty of thinking superadded. The very divisibility of it does this. For that which is made to think must either be one part, or more parts joined together. But we know no such thing as a part of matter purely one, or indivisible. It may, indeed, have pleased the Author of nature that there should be atoms, whose parts are actually indiscernible, and which may be the principles of other bodies; but still they consist of parts, though firmly adhering together. And if the seat of cogitation be in more parts than one—whether they lie close together, or are loose, or in a state of fluidity, it is the same thing—how can it be avoided, but that either there must be so many several minds, or thinking substances, as there are parts, and then the consequence which has been mentioned would return upon us again; or else that there must be something else superadded for them to centre in, to unite their acts, and make their thoughts to be one? And then what can this be but some other substance, which is purely one?

Matter by itself can never entertain abstracted and general ideas, such as many in our minds are. For could it reflect upon what passes within itself, it could possibly find there nothing but material and particular impressions: abstractions and metaphysical ideas could not be printed upon it. How could one abstract from matter who is himself nothing but matter?

If the soul were mere matter, external visible objects could only be perceived within us according to the impressions they make upon matter, and not otherwise. For instance: the image of a cube in my mind, or my idea of a cube, must be always under some particular prospect, and conform to the rules of perspective; nor could I otherwise represent it to myself: whereas now I can form an idea of it as it is in itself, and almost view all its hedræ at once, as it were encompassing it with my mind. I can within myself correct the external appearances and impressions of objects, and advance, upon the reports and hints received by my senses, to form ideas of things that are not extant in matter. By seeing a material circle I may learn to form the idea of a circle, or figure generated by the revolution of a ray about its centre; but then, recollecting what I know of matter upon other occasions, I can conclude there is no exact material circle. So that I have an idea, which perhaps was raised from the hints I received from without, but is not truly to be found there. If I see a tower at a great distance, which, according to the impressions made upon my material organs, seems little and round, I do not therefore conclude it to be either: there is something within that reasons upon the circumstances of the appearance, and, as it were, commands my sense, and corrects the impression; and this must be something superior to matter, since a material soul is no otherwise impressible itself but as material organs are: instances of this kind are endless. If we know any thing of matter, we know that by itself it is a lifeless thing, inert and passive only; and acts necessarily, or rather is acted, according to the laws of motion and gravitation. This passiveness seems to be essential to it. And if we know any thing of ourselves, we know that we are conscious of our own existence and acts; that is, that we live; that we have a degree of freedom; that we can move ourselves spontaneously; and, in short, that we can, in many instances, take off the effect of gravitation, and impress new motions upon our spirits, or give them new directions, only by a thought. Therefore, to make mere matter do all this is to change the nature of it: to change death into life, incapacity of thinking into cogitativity, necessity into liberty. And to say that God may superadd a faculty of thinking, moving itself, etc., to matter, if by this be meant that he may make matter to be the suppositum of these faculties, that substance in which they inhere, is the same in effect as to say that God may superadd a faculty of thinking to incogitativity, of acting freely to necessity, and so on. What sense is there in this? And yet so it must be, while matter continues to be matter.

That faculty of thinking, so much talked of by some as superadded to certain systems of matter, fitly disposed, by virtue of God's omnipotence, though it be so called, must in reality amount to the same thing as another substance with the faculty of thinking. For a faculty of thinking alone will not make up the idea of a human soul, which is endued with many faculties—apprehending, reflecting, comparing, judging, making deductions and reasoning, willing, putting the body in motion, continuing the animal functions by its presence, and giving life; and therefore, whatever it is that is superadded, it must be something which is endued with all those other faculties. And whether that can be a faculty of thinking, and so these other faculties be only faculties of a faculty, or whether they must not all be rather the faculties of some substance, which, being by their own concession superadded to matter, must be different from it, we leave the unprejudiced to determine. If men would but seriously look into themselves, the soul would not appear to them as a faculty of the body, or a kind of appurtenance to it, but rather as some substance, properly placed in it, not only to use it as an instrument, and act by it, but also to govern it, or the parts of it, as the tongue, hands, feet, etc., according to its own reason. For I think it is plain enough that the mind, though it acts under great limitations, doth, however, in many instances govern the body arbitrarily; and it is monstrous to suppose this governor to be nothing but some fit disposition or accident, superadded, of that matter which is governed. A ship, it is true, would not be fit for navigation, if it were not built and provided in a proper manner; but then, when it has its proper form, and is become a system of materials fitly disposed, it is not this disposition that governs it: it is the man, that other substance, who sits at the helm, and they who manage the sails and tackle, that do this. So our vessels without a proper organization and conformity of parts would not be capable of being acted as they are; but still it is not the shape, or modification, or any other accident, that can govern them. The capacity of being governed or used can never be the governor, applying and using that capacity. No, there must be at the helm something distinct, that commands the body, and without which the vessel would run adrift, or, rather, sink.

For the foregoing reasons it is plain that matter cannot think, cannot be made to think. But if a faculty of thinking can be superadded to a system of matter, without uniting an immaterial substance to it, yet a human body is not such a system, being plainly void of thought, and organized in such a manner as to transmit the impressions of sensible objects up to the brain, where the percipient, and that which reflects upon them, certainly resides; and therefore that which there apprehends, thinks, and wills, must be that system of matter to which a faculty of thinking is superadded. All the premises then well considered, judge whether, instead of saying that this inhabitant of our heads (the soul) is a system of matter to which a faculty of thinking is superadded, it might not be more reasonable to say, it is a thinking substance intimately united to some fine material vehicle, which has its residence in the brain. Though I understand not perfectly the manner how a cogitative and spiritual substance can be thus closely united to such a material vehicle, yet I can understand this union as well as how it can be united to the body in general, perhaps as how the particles of the body itself cohere together, and much better than how a thinking faculty can be superadded to matter; and besides, several phenomena may more easily be solved by this hypothesis; which, in short, is this, that the human soul is a cogitative substance united to a material vehicle; that these act in conjunction, that which affects the one affecting the other; that the soul is detained in the body till the habitation is spoiled, and their mutual tendency interrupted, by some hurt or disease, or by the decays and ruins of old age, or the like.

But many a man, says Mr. Rennell, has maintained that the brain has the power of thought, from the conclusions which his own experience, and perhaps his extended knowledge of the human frame, have enabled him to draw. He has observed the action of the brain, has watched the progress of its diseases, and has seen the close connection which exists between many of its afflictions and the power of thought. But in this, as in most other cases, partial knowledge leads him to a more mistaken view of the matter than total ignorance. Satisfied with the correctness of his observations, he hastily proceeds to form his opinion, forgetting that it is not on the truth only, but on the whole truth, that he should rest his decision. By an accidental blow, the skull is beaten in, the brain is pressed upon, and the patient lies without sense or feeling. No sooner is the pressure removed than the power of thought immediately returns. It is known, again, that the phenomena of fainting arises from a temporary deficiency of blood in the brain: the vessels collapse, and the loss of sense immediately ensues. Restore the circulation, and the sense is instantly recovered. On the contrary, when the circulation in the brain is too rapid, and inflammation of the organ succeeds, we find that delirium, frenzy, and other disorders of the mind, arise in proportion to the inflammatory action, by which they are apparently produced. It is observed, also, that when the stomach is disordered by an excess of wine, or of ardent spirits, the brain is also affected through the strong sympathies of the nervous system, the intellect is disordered, and the man has no longer a rational command over himself or his actions. From these, and other circumstances of a similar nature, it is concluded that thought is a quality or function of the brain; that it is inseparable from the organ in which it resides; and, as Mr. Lawrence, after the French physiologists, represents it, that “medullary matter thinks.”

Now, it must certainly be inferred from all these circumstances that there is a close connection between the power of thinking and the brain; but it by no means follows that they are, therefore, one and the same. Allowing, however, for a moment, the justice of the inference, from the premises which have been stated, we must remember that we have not as yet taken in all the circumstances of the case. We have watched the body rather than the mind, and that only in a diseased state; and from this partial and imperfect view of the subject, our conclusions have been deduced. Let us take a healthy man in a sound sleep. He lies without sense or feeling, yet no part of his frame is diseased, nor is a single power of his life of vegetation suspended. All within his body is as active as ever. The blood circulates as regularly, and almost as rapidly, in the sleeping as in the waking subject. Digestion, secretion, nutrition, and all the functions of the life of vegetation proceed, and yet the understanding is absent. Sleep, therefore, is an affection of the mind, rather than of the body; and the refreshment which the latter receives from it, is from the suspension of its active and agitating principle. Now if thought were identified with the brain, when the former was suspended, the latter would undergo a proportionate change. Memory, imagination, perception, and all the stupendous powers of the human intellect, are absent; and yet the brain is precisely the same, the same in every particle of matter, the same in every animal function. Of not a single organ is the action suspended. When, again, the man awakens, and his senses return, no change is produced by the recovery: the brain, the organs of sense, and all the material parts of his frame, remain precisely in the same condition. Dreaming may perhaps be adduced as an exception to this statement. But it is first to be remarked, that this affection is by no means general. There are thousands who never dream at all, and thousands who dream only occasionally. Dreaming, therefore, even though it were to be allowed as an exception, could not be admitted to invalidate the rule. And if there be a circumstance which to any philosophic mind will clearly intimate the independence of thought upon matter, it is the phenomenon of dreaming. Perception, that faculty of the soul which unites it with the external world, is then suspended, and the avenues of sense are closed. All communication with outward objects being thus removed, the soul is transported, as it were, into a world of its own creation. There appears to be an activity in the motions, and a perfection in the faculties, of the mind when disengaged from the body, and disencumbered of its material organs. The slumber of its external perception seems to be but the awakening of every other power. The memory is far more keen, the fancy far more vivid, in the dreaming than in the waking man. Ideas rise in rapid succession, and are varied in endless combination; so that the judgment, which, next to the perception, depends most upon external objects, is unable to follow the imagination in all its wild and unwearied flights. A better notion of the separate and independent existence of the soul cannot be formed than that which we derive from our observations on the phenomena of dreaming. Again: when the mind is anxiously engaged in any train of thought, whether in company or alone, it frequently neglects the impressions made upon the external organs. When a man is deeply immersed in meditation, or eagerly engaged in a discussion, he often neither hears a third person when he speaks, nor observes what he does, nor even when gently touched does he feel the pressure.

Yet there is no defect either in the ear, the eye, or the nervous system; the brain is not disordered, for if his mind were not so fully occupied, he would perceive every one of those impressions which he now neglects. In this case, therefore, as in sleep, the independence of mind upon the external organ is clearly shown.

But let us take the matter in another point of view. We have observed the action of the brain upon thought, and have seen that when the former is unnaturally compressed, the latter is immediately disordered or lost. Let us now turn our attention to the action of thought upon the brain. A letter is brought to a man containing some afflicting intelligence. He casts his eye upon its contents, and drops down without sense or motion. What is the cause of this sudden affection? It may be said that the vessels have collapsed, that the brain is consequently disordered, and that loss of sense is the natural consequence. But let us take one step backward, and inquire what is the cause of the disorder itself, the effects of which are thus visible. It is produced by a sheet of white paper, distinguished by a few black marks. But no one would be absurd enough to suppose that it was the effect of the paper alone, or of the characters inscribed upon it, unless those characters conveyed some meaning to the understanding. It is thought, then, which so suddenly agitates and disturbs the brain, and makes its vessels to collapse. From this circumstance alone we discover the amazing influence of thought upon the external organ; of that thought which we can neither hear, nor see, nor touch, which yet produces an affection of the brain fully equal to a blow, a pressure, or any other sensible injury. Now this very action of thought upon the brain clearly shows that the brain does not produce it, while the mutual influence which they possess over each other, as clearly shows that there is a strong connection between them. But it is carefully to be remembered that connection is not identity. While we acknowledge then, on the one side, the mutual connection of the understanding and the brain, we must acknowledge, on the other, their mutual independence. The phenomena which we daily observe lead us of necessity to the recognition of these two important principles. If, then, from the observations which we are enabled to make on the phenomena of the understanding and of the brain, we are led to infer mutual independence, we shall find our conclusions still further strengthened by a consideration of the substance and composition of the latter. Not only is the brain a material substance, endowed with all those properties of matter which we have before shown to be inconsistent with thought, but it is a substance which, in common with the rest of our body, is undergoing a perpetual change. Indeed, experiments and observation give us abundant reason for concluding that the brain undergoes within itself precisely the same change with the remainder of the body. A man will fall down in a fit of apoplexy, and be recovered; in a few years he will be attacked by another, which will prove fatal. Upon dissection it will be found that there is a cavity formed by the blood effused from the ruptured vessel, and that a certain action had been going on which gradually absorbed the coagulated blood. If then an absorbent system exists in the brain, and the organ thereby undergoes, in the course of a certain time, a total change, it is impossible that this flux and variable substance can be endowed with consciousness or thought. If the particles of the brain, either separately or in a mass, were capable of consciousness, then after their removal the consciousness which they produced must for ever cease. The consequence of which would be that personal identity must be destroyed, and that no man could be the same individual being that he was ten years ago. But our common sense informs us, that as far as our understanding and our moral responsibility are involved, we are the same individual beings that we ever were. If the body alone, or any substance subject to the laws of body, were concerned, personal identity might reasonably be doubted; but it is something beyond the brain that makes the man at every period of his life the same: it is consciousness that, amidst the perpetual change of our material particles, unites every link of successive being in one indissoluble chain. The body may be gradually changed, and yet, by the deposition of new particles, similar to those which absorption has removed, it may preserve the appearance of identity. But in consciousness there is real, not an apparent, individuality, admitting of no change or substitution.

So inconsistent with reason is every attempt which has been made to reduce our thoughts to a material origin, and to identify our understanding with any part of our corporeal frame! The more carefully we observe the operation, both of the mind and of the brain, the more clearly we shall distinguish, and the more forcibly shall we feel, the independence of the one upon the other. We know that the brain is the organ or instrument by which the mind operates on matter, and we know that the brain again is the chain of communication between the mind and the material world. That certain disorders, therefore, in the chain should either prevent or disturb this communication is reasonably to be expected; but nothing more is proved from thence than we knew before, namely, that the link is imperfect. And when that link is again restored, the mind declares its identity, by its memory of things which preceded the injury or the disease; and where the recovery is rapid, the patient awakes as it were from a disturbed dream. How indeed the brain and the thinking principle are connected, and in what manner they mutually affect each other, is beyond the reach of our faculties to discover. We must, for the present, be contented with our ignorance of the cause, while from the effects we are persuaded both of their connection on the one hand, and of their independence on the other.

MATTHEW, called also Levi, was the son of Alpheus, but probably not of that Alpheus who was the father of the Apostle James the Less. He was a native of Galilee; but it is not known in what city of that country he was born, or to what tribe of the people of Israel he belonged. Though a Jew, he was a publican or tax-gatherer under the Romans; and his office seems to have consisted in collecting the customs due upon commodities which were carried, and from persons who passed, over the Lake of Gennesaret. Our Saviour commanded him, as he was sitting at the place where he received these customs, to follow him. He immediately obeyed; and from that time he became a constant attendant upon our Saviour, and was appointed one of the twelve apostles. St. Matthew, soon after his call, made an entertainment at his house, at which were present Christ and some of his disciples, and also several publicans. After the ascension of our Saviour, he continued, with the other apostles, to preach the gospel for some time in Judea; but as there is no further account of him in any writer of the first four centuries, we must consider it as uncertain into what country he afterward went, and likewise in what manner and at what time he died.

In the few writings which remain of the apostolical fathers, Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, there are manifest allusions to several passages in St. Matthew's Gospel; but the Gospel itself is not mentioned in any one of them. Papias, the companion of Polycarp, is the earliest author on record who has expressly named St. Matthew as the writer of a Gospel; and we are indebted to Eusebius for transmitting to us this valuable testimony. The work itself of Papias is lost; but the quotation in Eusebius is such as to convince us that in the time of Papias no doubt was entertained of the genuineness of St. Matthew's Gospel. This Gospel is repeatedly quoted by Justin Martyr, but without mentioning the name of St. Matthew. It is both frequently quoted, and St. Matthew mentioned as its author, by Irenæus, Origen, Athanasius, Cyril, Epiphanius, Jerome, Chrysostom, and a long train of subsequent writers. It was, indeed, universally received by the Christian Church; and we do not find that its genuineness was controverted by any early profane writer. We may, therefore, conclude, upon the concurrent testimony of antiquity, that this Gospel is rightly ascribed to St. Matthew. It is generally agreed, upon the most satisfactory evidence, that St. Matthew's Gospel was the first which was written; but though this is asserted by many ancient authors, none of them, except Irenæus and Eusebius, have said any thing concerning the exact time at which it was written. The only passage in which the former of these fathers mentions this subject, is so obscure, that no positive conclusion can be drawn from it: Dr. Lardner and Dr. Townson understand it in very different senses; and Eusebius, who lived a hundred and fifty years after Ire næus, barely says that Matthew wrote his Gospel just before he left Judea to preach the religion of Christ in other countries; but when that was, neither he nor any other ancient author informs us with certainty. The impossibility of settling this point upon ancient authority has given rise to a variety of opinions among moderns. Of the several dates assigned to this Gospel, which deserve any attention, the earliest is A. D. 38, and the latest A. D. 64.

It appears very improbable that the Christians should be left any considerable number of years without a written history of our Saviour's ministry. It is certain that the apostles, immediately after the descent of the Holy Ghost, which took place only ten days after the ascension of our Saviour into heaven, preached the gospel to the Jews with great success; and surely it is reasonable to suppose that an authentic account of our Saviour's doctrines and miracles would very soon be committed to writing, for the confirmation of those who believed in his Divine mission, and for the conversion of others; and, more particularly, to enable the Jews to compare the circumstances of the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus with their ancient prophecies relative to the Messiah; and we may conceive that the apostles would be desirous of losing no time in writing an account of the miracles which Jesus performed, and of the discourses which he delivered, because the sooner such an account was published, the easier it would be to inquire into its truth and accuracy; and, consequently, when these points were satisfactorily ascertained, the greater would be its weight and authority. We must own that these arguments are so strong in favor of an early publication of some history of our Saviour's ministry, that we cannot but accede to the opinion of Jones, Wetstein, and Dr. Owen, that St. Matthew's Gospel was written A. D. 38.

There has also of late been great difference of opinion concerning the language in which this Gospel was originally written. Among the ancient fathers, Papias, as quoted by Eusebius, Irenæus, Origen, Cyril, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, and Jerome, positively assert that it was written by St. Matthew in Hebrew, that is, in the language then spoken in Palestine; and, indeed, Dr. Campbell says that this point was not controverted by any author for fourteen hundred years. Erasmus was one of the first who contended that the present Greek is the original; and he has been followed by Le Clerc, Wetstein, Basnage, Whitby, Jortin, Hug, and many other learned men. On the other hand, Grotius, Du Pin, Simon, Walton, Cave, Hammond, Mill, Michaelis, Owen, and Campbell, have supported the opinion of the ancients. In a question of this sort, which is a question of fact, the concurrent voice of antiquity is decisive. Though the fathers are unanimous in declaring that St. Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, yet they have not informed us by whom it was translated into Greek. No writer of the first three centuries makes any mention whatever of the translator; nor does Eusebius; and Jerome tells us that in his time it was not known who was the translator. It is, however, universally allowed that the Greek translation was made very early, and that it was more used than the original. This last circumstance is easily accounted for. After the destruction of Jerusalem, the language of the Jews, and every thing which belonged to them, fell into great contempt; and the early fathers, writing in Greek, would naturally quote and refer to the Greek copy of St. Matthew's Gospel, in the same manner as they constantly used the Septuagint version of the Old Testament. There being no longer any country in which the language of St. Matthew's original Gospel was commonly spoken, that original would soon be forgotten; and the translation into Greek, the language then generally understood, would be substituted in its room. This early and exclusive use of the Greek translation is a strong proof of its correctness, and leaves us but little reason to lament the loss of the original.

"As the sacred writers," says Dr. Campbell, "especially the evangelists, have many qualities in common, so there is something in every one of them which, if attended to, will be found to distinguish him from the rest. That which principally distinguishes St. Matthew is the distinctness and particularity with which he has related many of our Lord's discourses and moral instructions. Of these, his sermon on the mount, his charge to the apostles, his illustrations of the nature of his kingdom, and his prophecy on Mount Olivet, are examples. He has also wonderfully united simplicity and energy in relating the replies of his Master to the cavils of his adversaries. Being early called to the apostleship, he was an eye-witness and an ear-witness of most of the things which he relates; and though I do not think it was the scope of any of these historians to adjust their narratives to the precise order of time wherein the events happened, there are some circumstances which incline me to think that St. Matthew has approached at least as near that order as any of them." And this, we may observe, would naturally be the distinguishing characteristic of a narrative written very soon after the events had taken place. The most remarkable things recorded in St. Matthew's Gospel, and not found in any other, are the following: the visit of the eastern magi; our Saviour's flight into Egypt; the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem; the parable of the ten virgins; the dream of Pilate's wife; the resurrection of many saints at our Saviour's crucifixion; and the bribing of the Roman guard appointed to watch at the holy sepulchre by the chief priests and elders.

MATTHIAS the Apostle was first in the rank of our Saviour's disciples, and one of those who continued with him from his baptism to his ascension. Acts i. 21, 22. It is very probable he was of the number of the seventy, as Clemens Alexandrinus and other ancients inform us. We have no particulars of his youth or education, for we may reckon as nothing what is read in Abdias, or Obadiah, concerning this matter. After the ascension of our Lord, the apostles retiring to Jerusalem in expectation of the effusion of the Holy Ghost, as had been promised, Peter proposed to fill up the place of Judas: to this the disciples agreed. They then presented two persons, Joseph Barsabas, surnamed Justus, and Matthias. The lot falling on Matthias, he was from that time associated with the eleven apostles. The Greeks believe that Matthias preached and died at Colchis. [His feast is observed in the Latin Church, February 24, or in leap-year, 25; in the Greek Church, August 9.]

[MAUNDY-THURSDAY. Thursday before Easter. The name is derived by some from Dies mandati, because Christ on that day commanded his disciples to celebrate his Supper, or because he commanded them to wash one another's feet. Others derive it from the Anglo-Saxon mand, a basket, because baskets were brought on that day to receive the donations of the king. Penitents were anciently readmitted to the Church on this day; and the Lord's Supper was celebrated, with the washing of feet.]

[MAZZAROTH. Job xxxviii. 82. This is generally considered the signs of the zodiac, though Parkhurst, deriving the word from מַזְרָה, to corrupt, thinks it indicates the simoom.]

[MEARAH. A cave "that was beside the Sidonians." Josh. xiii. 4. Robinson suggests it might be "the Tyrian cave in the territory of Sidon, occupied by the crusaders as a stronghold."]

MEASURE, that by which any thing is measured, or adjusted, or proportioned. Prov. xx. 10: Micah vi. 10. Tables of Scripture measures of length and capacity are found at the end of this volume.

MEATS. The Hebrews had several kinds of animals which they refused to eat. Among domestic animals they only ate the cow, the sheep, and the goat; the hen and pigeon, among domestic birds; besides several kinds of wild animals. To eat the flesh with the blood was forbidden them, much more to eat the blood without the flesh. We may form a judgment of their taste, by what the Scripture mentions of Solomon's table. 1 Kings iv. 22, 23. Thirty measures of the finest wheat flour were provided for it every day, and twice as much of the ordinary sort; twenty stall-fed oxen, twenty pasture oxen, a hundred sheep, besides the venison of deer and roebucks, and wild fowls. It does not appear that the ancient Hebrews were very nice about the seasoning and dressing of their food. We find among them roast meat, boiled meat, and ragouts. They roasted the paschal lamb.

At the first settling of the Christian Church, very great disputes arose concerning the use of meats offered to idols. Some newly converted Christians, convinced that an idol was nothing, and that the distinction of clean and unclean creatures was abolished by our Saviour, ate indifferently of whatever was served up to them, even among Pagans, without inquiring whether these meats had been first offered to idols. They took the same liberty in buying meat sold in the markets, not regarding whether it was pure or impure, according to the Jews, or whether it was that which had been offered to idols. But other Christians, weaker, or less instructed, were offended at this liberty; and thought to eat of meat that had been once offered to idols, was a kind of partaking of that wicked and sacrilegious offering. The diversity in opinion produced some scandal, to which St. Paul thought it behooved him to provide a suitable remedy. Rom. xiv. 20: Titus i. 15. He determined, therefore, that all things were clean to such as were clean, and that an idol was nothing at all; that a man might safely eat of whatever was sold in the shambles, and though it might be a part of what had been previously offered in the temple, and there exposed to sale, he need not scrupulously inquire whence it came; that if an unbeliever should invite a believer to eat with him, the believer might eat of whatever was set before him, etc. 1 Cor. x. 25-27. But at the same time he enjoins that the law of charity and prudence should be observed; that men should be cautious of scandalizing or offending weak minds; that though all things may be lawful, yet all things are not always expedient; that no one ought to seek his own accommodation or satisfaction, but that of his neighbor; that if any one should say to us, "This has been offered to idols," we may not then eat of it, for the sake of him who gives the information; not so much for fear of wounding our own conscience, but his: in a word, that he who is strong, and thinks he may indifferently use all sorts of food, should forbear and eat herbs, rather than offend a brother. Rom. xiv., xv. Yet it is certain that, generally, Christians abstained from eating meat that had been offered to idols.

[MEDAD. See ELDAD.]

[MEDEBA. The name of a conical hill, and of a town on it, south of Heshbon. Its ruins are two miles in circumference. Num. xxi. 30: Josh. xiii. 9, 16: Isa. xv. 2.]

MEDIA. It has been commonly thought that Media was peopled by the descendants of Madai, son of Japheth. Gen. x. 2. The Greeks maintain that this country took its name from Medus, the son of Meadea. If, however, Madai and his immediate descendants did not people this country, some of his posterity might have carried his name thither, since we find it so often given to Media, from the times of the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah, and from the transportation of the ten tribes, and the destruction of Samaria under Shalmaneser, A. M. 3283. Media Proper was bounded by Armenia and Assyria Proper on the west, by Persia on the east, by the Caspian provinces on the north, and by Susiana on the south. It was an elevated and mountainous country, and formed a kind of pass between the cultivated parts of eastern and western Asia. Hence, from its geographical position, and from the temperature, verdure, and fertility of its climate, Media was one of the most important and interesting regions of Asia. Into this country the ten tribes who composed the kingdom of Israel were transplanted, in the Assyrian captivity, by Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser. The former prince carried away the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, on the east side of Jordan, to Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river of Gozan. His successor carried away the remaining seven tribes and a half, to the same places, which are said to be "cities of the Medes, by the river of Gozan." 1 Chron. v. 26: 2 Kings xvii. 6. The geographical position of Media was wisely chosen for the distribution of the great body of the captives; for it was so remote, and so impeded and intersected with great mountains and numerous and deep rivers, that it would be extremely difficult for them to escape from this natural prison, and return to their own country. They would also be opposed in their passage through Kir, or Assyria Proper, not only by the native Assyrians, but also by their enemies, the Syrians, transplanted thither before them. The superior civilization of the Israelites, and their skill in agriculture and in the arts, would tend to civilize and improve those wild and barbarous regions.

MEDIATOR, one who stands in a middle office or capacity between two differing parties, and has a power of transacting every thing between them, and of reconciling them to each other. Hence a mediator between God and man is one whose office properly is to mediate and transact affairs between them relating to the favor of Almighty God, and the duty and happiness of man. No sooner had Adam transgressed the law of God in paradise, and become a sinful creature, than the Almighty was pleased in mercy to appoint a Mediator or Redeemer, who, in due time, should be born into the world, to make an atonement both for his transgression, and for all the sins of men. This is what is justly thought to be implied in the promise, that "the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head;" that is, that there should some time or other be born, of the posterity of Eve, a Redeemer, who, by making satisfaction for the sins of men, and reconciling them to the mercy of Almighty God, should by that means bruise the head of that old serpent, the devil, who had beguiled our first parents into sin, and destroy his empire and dominion among men. Thus it became a necessary part of Adam's religion after the fall, as well as that of his posterity after him, to worship God through hope in this Mediator. To keep up the remembrance of it, God was pleased, at this time, to appoint sacrifices of expiation or atonement for sin, to be observed through all succeeding generations, till the Redeemer himself should come, who was to make the true and only proper satisfaction and atonement.

The particular manner in which Christ interposed in the redemption of the world, or his office as Mediator between God and man, is thus represented to us in the Scripture. He is the light of the world, John i. : vii. 12: the revealer of the will of God in the most eminent sense. He is a propitiatory sacrifice, Rom. iii. 25; v. 11; 1 Cor. v. 7: Eph. v. 2: 1 John ii. 2: Matt. xxvi. 28: John i. 29, 36; and as, because of his peculiar offering, of a merit transcending all others, he is styled our High-Priest. He was also described beforehand in the Old Testament, under the same character of a priest, and an expiatory victim. Isa. liii. : Dan. ix. 24: Ps. cx. 4. And whereas it is objected that all this is merely by way of allusion to the sacrifices of the Mosaic law, the apostle on the contrary affirms that "the law was a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things," Heb. x. 1; and that the "priests that offer gifts according to the law, serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle; for see, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount," Heb. viii. 4, 5; that is, the Levitical priesthood was a shadow of the priesthood of Christ; in like manner as the tabernacle made by Moses was according to that showed him in the mount. The priesthood of Christ, and the tabernacle in the mount, were the originals: of the former of which, the Levitical priesthood was a type; and of the latter, the tabernacle made by Moses was a copy. The doctrine of this Epistle, then, plainly is, that the legal sacrifices were allusions to the great atonement to be made by the blood of Christ; and not that it was an allusion to those. Nor can any thing be more express or determinate than the following passage: "It is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sin. Wherefore when he [Christ] cometh unto the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering," that is, of bulls and of goats, "thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me. Lo, I come to do thy will, O God! By which will we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." Heb. x. 4, 5, 7, 9, 10. And to add one passage more of the like kind: "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin;" that is, without bearing sin, as he did at his first coming, by being an offering for it; without having our iniquities again laid upon him; without being any more a sin-offering: "And unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Heb. ix. 28. Nor do the inspired writers at all confine themselves to this manner of speaking concerning the satisfaction of Christ; but declare that there was an efficacy in what he did and suffered for us, additional to and beyond mere instruction and example. This they declare with great variety of expression: that "he suffered for sins, the just for the unjust," 1 Pet. iii. 18; that "he gave his life a ransom," Matt. xx. 28: Mark x. 45: 1 Tim. ii. 6; that "we are bought with a price," 2 Pet. ii. 1: Rev. xiv. 4: 1 Cor. vi. 20; that "he redeemed us with his blood," "redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us," 1 Pet. i. 19: Rev. v. 9: Gal. iii. 13; that "he is our advocate, intercessor, and propitiation," Heb. vii. 25: 1 John ii. 1, 2; that "he was made perfect, through sufferings; and being thus made perfect, he became the author of salvation," Heb. ii. 10; v. 9; that "God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them," 2 Cor. v. 19: Rom. v. 10: Eph. ii. 16; and that "through death he destroyed him that had the power of death." Heb. ii. 14. Christ, then, having thus "humbled himself, and become obedient to death, even the death of the cross, God, also, hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name;" hath commanded us to pray in his name; constituted him man's advocate and intercessor; distributes his grace only through him, and in honor of his death; hath given all things into his hands; and hath committed all judgment unto him;

"that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow," and "that all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father." Phil. ii. 8-10: John iii. 35; v. 22, 23.

All the offices of Christ, therefore, arise out of his gracious appointment, and voluntary undertaking, to be "the Mediator between God and man;" between God offended, and man offending; and therefore under the penalty of God's violated law, which denounces death against every transgressor. He is the Prophet who came to teach us the extent and danger of our offences, and the means which God had appointed for their remission. He is "the great High-Priest of our profession," who, having "offered himself without spot to God," has entered the holiest to make intercession for us, and to present our prayers and services to God, securing to them acceptance by virtue of his own merits. He is King, ruling over the whole earth, for the maintenance and establishment and enlargement of his Church, and for the punishment of those who reject his authority; and he is the final Judge of the quick and the dead, to whom is given the power of distributing the rewards and penalties of eternity. See ATONEMENT and JESUS CHRIST.

There is an essential connection between the mediation of our Lord and the covenant of grace. (See COVENANT.) He is therefore called the Mediator of "a better covenant," and of a "new covenant." The word μεσίτης literally means "a person in the middle," between two parties; and the fitness of there being a Mediator of the covenant of grace arises from this, that the nature of the covenant implies that the two parties were at variance. Those who hold the Socinian principles understand a mediator to mean nothing more than a messenger sent from God to give assurance of forgiveness to his offending creatures. Those who hold the doctrine of the atonement understand that Jesus is called the Mediator of the new covenant because he reconciles the two parties, by having appeased the wrath of God which man had deserved, and by subduing that enmity to God by which their hearts were alienated from him. It is plain that this is being a mediator in the strict and proper sense of the word; and there seems to be no reason for resting in a meaning less proper and emphatical. This sense of the term mediator coincides with the meaning of another phrase applied to him, Heb. vii. 22, where he is called κρείττονος διαθήκης ἑγγυος. If he is a Mediator in the last sense, then he is also ἑγγυος, the sponsor, the surety, of the covenant. He undertook, on the part of the supreme Lawgiver, that the sins of those who repent shall be forgiven; and he fulfilled this undertaking by offering, in their stead, a satisfaction to Divine justice. He undertook, on their part, that they should keep the terms of the covenant; and he fulfils this undertaking by the influence of his Spirit upon their hearts.

If a mediator be essential to the covenant of grace, and if all who have been saved from the time of the first transgression were saved by that covenant, it follows that the Mediator of the new covenant acted in that character before he was manifested in the flesh. Hence the importance of that doctrine respecting the person of Christ; that all the communications which the Almighty condescended to hold with the human race were carried on from the beginning by this Person; that it is he who spake to the patriarchs, who gave the law by Moses, and who is called in the Old Testament, "the Angel of the covenant." These views open to us the full importance of a doctrine which manifestly unites in one faith all who obtain deliverance from that condition; for, according to this doctrine, not only did the virtue of the blood which he shed as a priest extend to the ages past before his manifestation, but all the intimations of the new covenant established in his blood were given by him as the great Prophet, and the blessings of the covenant were applied in every age by the Spirit, which he, as the King of his people, sends forth. The Socinians, who consider Jesus as a mere man, having no existence till he was born of Mary, necessarily reject the doctrine now stated; and the Church of Rome, although they admit the Divinity of our Saviour, yet, by the system which they hold with regard to the mediation of Christ, agree with the Socinians in throwing out of the dispensations of the grace of God that beautiful and complete unity which arises from their having been conducted by one Person. The Church of Rome considers Christ as Mediator only in respect of his human nature. As that nature did not exist till he was born of Mary, they do not think it possible that he could exercise the office of Mediator under the Old Testament; and as they admit that a mediator is essential to the covenant of grace, they believe that those who lived under the Old Testament, not enjoying the benefit of his mediation, did not obtain complete remission of sins. They suppose, therefore, that persons in former times who believed in a Saviour that was to come, and who obtained justification with God by this faith, were detained after death in a place of the infernal regions, which received the name of limbus patrum; a kind of prison where they did not endure punishment, but remained without partaking of the joys of heaven, in earnest expectation of the coming of Christ, who, after suffering on the cross, descended to hell that he might set them free. This fanciful system has no other foundation than the slender support which it appears to receive from some obscure passages of Scripture that admit of another interpretation. But if Christ acted as the Mediator of the covenant of grace from the time of the first transgression, this system becomes wholly unnecessary; and we may believe, according to the general strain of Scripture, and what we account the analogy of faith, that all who "died in faith," since the world began, entered immediately after death into that "heavenly country which they desired."

Although the members of the Church of Rome adopt the language of Scripture, in which Jesus is styled the Mediator of the new covenant, they differ from all Protestants in acknowledging other mediators; and the use which they make of the doctrine that Christ is Mediator only in his human nature is to justify their admitting those who had no other nature to share that office with him. Saints, martyrs, and especially the Virgin Mary, are called mediatores secundarii, because it is conceived that they hold this character under Christ, and that, by virtue of his mediation, the superfluity of their merits may be applied to procure acceptance with God for our imperfect services. Under this character, supplications and solemn addresses are presented to them; and the mediatores secundarii receive, in the Church of Rome, not only the honor due to eminent virtue, but a worship and homage which that Church wishes to vindicate from the charge of idolatry, by calling it the same kind of inferior and secondary worship which is offered to the man Christ Jesus, who in his human nature acted as Mediator. In opposition to all this, we hold that Jesus Christ was qualified to act as Mediator by the union between his Divine and his human nature; that his Divine nature gave an infinite value to all that he did, rendering it effectual for the purpose of reconciling us to God, while the condescension by which he approached to man, in taking part of flesh and blood, fulfilled the gracious intention for which a Mediator was appointed; that the introducing of any other mediator is unnecessary, derives no warrant from Scripture, and is derogatory to the honor of him who is there called the "one Mediator between God and men;" and that as the union of the Divine to the human nature is the foundation of that worship which in Scripture is often paid to the Mediator of the new covenant, this worship does not afford the smallest countenance to the idolatry and will-worship of those who ascribe divine honors to any mortal.

MEGIDDO, a city of the tribe of Manasseh, famous for the battle fought there between Pharaoh-Necho and King Josiah, in which the latter was defeated and mortally wounded. Josh. xvii. 11: Judg. i. 27: 2 Kings xxiii. 29. [It is identified with the Legio of Eusebius and Jerome, and the modern Lejjûn. Near by it is a large fountain, forming a mill-stream which enters into the Kishon. See KISHON.]

[MELCHITES. This name, meaning Royalists, is given to those Syrian and Egyptian Christians in the Levant who submitted to the council of Chalcedon, whose decrees were sanctioned by the emperor. They are governed by a patriarch of their own, who bears the title of patriarch of Antioch. Their religious follow the rule of Basil.]

[MELCHIZEDECIANS. A sect in the third century who held that Melchizedek was a heavenly power superior to Christ, and mediator for the angels.]

MELCHIZEDEK. When Abram returned from the slaughter of the Assyrians, in his way to Hebron, he was met at Shaveh, or King's Dale, afterward the valley of Jehoshaphat, between Jerusalem and Mount Olivet, by Melchizedek, King of Salem, the most ancient quarter of Jerusalem, a priest of the most high God, who gave him bread and wine, and blessed him in the name of the "most high God, Creator of heaven and earth;" to whom Abram in return piously gave tithes, or the tenth part of all the spoils, as an offering to God. Heb. vii. 2. This Canaanitish prince was early considered as a type of Christ in the Jewish Church: "Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek." Psalm cx. 4. He resembled Christ in the following particulars: 1. In the name, Melchizedek, "King of Righteousness;" 2. In his city, Salem, "Peace;" 3. In his offices of king and priest of the most high God; and, 4. In the omission of the names of his parents and genealogy, the time of his birth and length of his life, exhibiting an indefinite reign and priesthood, according to the apostle's exposition, Heb. vii. 5. The import of this is, that he came not to his office by right of primogeniture, (which implies a genealogy,) or by the way of succession, but was raised up and immediately called of God to it. In that respect Christ is said to be a priest after his "order." Then, again, that he had no successor, nor could have; for there was no law to constitute an order of succession, so that he was a priest only upon an extraordinary call. In this respect our Lord's priesthood answers to his, because it is wholly in himself, who has no successor. An infinite number of absurd opinions have been at different times held respecting this mystic personage, as that he was Shem, or Ham; or, among those who think he was more than human, that he was the Holy Ghost, or the Son of God himself; absurdities which are too obsolete to need refutation.

[MELETIANS. Followers of Meletius, Bishop of Lycopolis, who was deposed, A. D. 306, for sacrificing to the gods, and for other crimes. Epiphanius says, his only failing was undue severity toward the lapsed. They joined the Arians in opposition to the Catholics, and occasioned a prolonged strife.—Also the followers of Meletius, of Melitene, in Armenia, who was chosen bishop of the Arians, and afterward expelled on account of his orthodoxy. The Greek and Latin Churches consider him a saint.]

MELITA, now called Malta, an island in the African or Mediterranean Sea, between Africa and Sicily, twenty miles in length, and twelve in breadth, formerly reckoned a part of Africa, but now belonging to Europe. St. Paul suffered shipwreck upon the coast of Malta. Acts xxviii. 1-3. In the opinion of Dr. Hales, the island where this happened was not Malta, but Meleda. His words are: "That this island was Meleda, near the Illyrian coast, not Malta, on the southern coast of Sicily, may appear from the following considerations: 1. It lies confessedly in the Adriatic Sea, but Malta a considerable distance from it. 2. It lies nearer the mouth of the Adriatic than any other island of that sea; and would, of course, be more likely to receive the wreck of any vessel driven by tempests toward that quarter. And it lies north-west by north of the south-west promontory of Crete; and came nearly in the direction of a storm from the south-east quarter. 3. An obscure island called Melite, whose inhabitants were 'barbarous,' was not applicable to the celebrity of Malta at that time, which Cicero represents as abounding in curiosities and riches, and possessing a remarkable manufacture of the finest linen; and Diodorus Siculus more fully: 'Malta is furnished with many and very good harbors, and the inhabitants are very rich; for it is full of all sorts of artificers, among whom there are excellent weavers of fine linen. Their houses are very stately and beautiful, adorned with graceful eaves, and pargetted with white plaster. The inhabitants are a colony of Phenicians, who, trading as merchants, as far as the western ocean, resorted to this place on account of its commodious ports and convenient situation for maritime commerce; and by the advantage of this place, the inhabitants frequently became famous both for their wealth and their merchandise.' 4. The circumstance of the viper, or venomous snake, which fastened on St. Paul's hand, agrees with the damp and woody island of Meleda, affording shelter and proper nourishment for such, but not with the dry and rocky island of Malta, in which there are no serpents now, and none in the time of Pliny. 5. The disease with which the father of Publius was affected, dysentery combined with fever, probably intermittent, might well suit a country woody and damp, and probably, for want of draining, exposed to the putrid effluvia of confined moisture; but was not likely to affect a dry, rocky, and remarkably healthy island like Malta."

[The objections of Hales, Coleridge, and others, are only answered by Conybeare and Howson:—"Not only do the classical poets use the name 'Adria' for all that natural division of the Mediterranean which lies between Sicily and Greece, but the same phraseology is found in historians and geographers. Thus Ptolemy distinguishes between the Adriatic Sea and the Adriatic Gulf. It is argued that Alexandrian sailors could not possibly have been ignorant of an island so well known as Malta was then. But surely they might have been very familiar with the harbor of Valetta, without being able to recognize that part of the coast on which they came during the storm. Besides, we are told that the seamen did recognize the island as soon as they were ashore. It is contended also that the people of Malta would not have been called barbarians. But if the sailors were Greeks, (as they probably were,) they would have employed this term as a matter of course, of those who spoke a different language from their own. Again, it is argued that there are no vipers—that there is hardly any wood—in Malta. But who does not recognize here the natural changes which result from the increase of inhabitants and cultivation? Within a very few years there was wood close to St. Paul's bay; and it is well known how the fauna of any country varies with the vegetation. An argument has even been built on the supposed fact that the disease of Publius is unknown in the island. To this it is sufficient to reply by a simple denial: the writer once spent an anxious night in Malta with a fellow-traveller, who was suffering precisely in the same way. Nor can we close this rapid survey of objections without noticing the insuperable difficulties which lie against the hypothesis of the Venetian Meleda, from the impossibility of reaching it, except by a miracle, under the above-related circumstances of weather; from the disagreement of its soundings with what is required by the narrative of the shipwreck; and by the inconsistency of its position with what is related of the subsequent voyage." Penrose says, "To have drifted up the Adriatic to the island of Melita or Melida, in the requisite curve, and to have passed so many islands and other dangers in the route, would, humanly speaking, have been impossible. The distance from Claudia to this Melita is not less than 780 geographical miles, and the wind must have been from the south to make this voyage in fourteen days. Now, from Claudia to Malta there is not any one danger in a direct line, and we see that the distance and direction of drift will both agree." Malta was acquired by the English in 1800: its population in 1847 was 108,140, of whom 4500 were Protestants. Romanism is the established religion.]

MELON, אפריסקוס, Numbers xi. 5, a luscious fruit so well known that a description of it would be superfluous. It grows to great perfection and is highly esteemed in Egypt, especially by the lower class of people, during the hot months. The juice is peculiarly cooling and agreeable in that sultry climate, where it is justly pronounced one of the most delicious refreshments that nature, amidst her constant attention to the wants of man, affords in the season of violent heat. There are varieties of this fruit; but that more particularly referred to in the text must be the watermelon. It is cultivated, says Hasselquist, on the banks of the Nile, in the rich clayey earth, which subsides during the inundation. This serves the Egyptians for meat, drink, and physic. It is eaten in abundance during the season, even by the richer sort of people; but the common people, on whom Providence has bestowed nothing but poverty and patience, scarcely eat any thing but these, and account this the best time of the year, as they are obliged to put up with worse fare at other seasons. This fruit sometimes serves them for drink, the juice refreshing these poor creatures, and they have less occasion for water than if they were to live on more substantial food in this burning climate. This well explains the regret expressed by the Israelites for the loss of this fruit, whose pleasant liquor had so often quenched their thirst, and relieved their weariness in their servitude, and which would have been exceedingly grateful in a dry, scorching desert.

[MENDÆANS. Some twenty thousand families of this sect are said to exist, chiefly in the neighborhood of Bassora. As the John whom they claim for their leader resembles the person of that name who was the chief of the Jewish Hemero-Baptists, it is supposed they are the remains of that sect. Their religion consists principally in bodily ablutions. They have books which they ascribe to Adam, John the Baptist, etc. They are sometimes called CHRISTIANS of St. JOHN.]

MENNONITES, a society of Baptists in Holland, so called from Menno Simon, of Friesland, who lived in the sixteenth century. He was originally a Romish priest, but joined a party of the Anabaptists, and, becoming their leader, cured them of many extravagancies, and reduced the system to consistency and moderation. The Mennonites maintain that practical piety is the essence of religion, and that the surest mark of the true Church is the sanctity of its members. They plead for universal toleration in religion, and debar none from their societies who lead pious lives, and own the Scriptures for the word of God. They teach that infants are not the proper subjects of baptism; that ministers of the gospel ought to receive no salary. They also object to the terms person and trinity, as not consistent with the simplicity of the Scriptures. They are, like the Society of Friends, utterly averse to oaths and war, and to capital punishments, as contrary to the spirit of the Christian dispensation. In their private meetings every one has the liberty to speak, to expound the Scriptures, and to pray. They assemble, or used to do so, twice every year, from all parts of Holland, at Rynsbourg, a village two leagues from Leyden, at which time they receive the communion, sitting at a table in the manner of the Independents; but in their form of discipline they are said more to resemble the Presbyterians. The ancient Mennonites professed a contempt of erudition and science, and excluded all from their communion who deviated in the least from the most rigorous rules of simplicity and gravity; but this primitive austerity is greatly diminished in their most considerable societies. Those who adhere to their ancient discipline are called Flemings or Flandrians. The whole sect were formerly called Waterlandians, from the district in which they lived. The Mennonites in Pennsylvania do not baptize by immersion, though they administer the ordinance to none but adult persons. Their common method is this: The person to be baptized kneels, the minister holds his hands over him, into which the deacon pours water, so that it runs on the head of the baptized; after which follow imposition of hands and prayer.

Divine worship is conducted among the Mennonites much as among the churches of the Reformed, or among the Dissenters in England, only with this peculiarity, that collections are made every Sabbath day, sometimes in the middle of the sermon, in two bags, one for the poor, and the other for the expenses of public worship. They have a Mennonite college at Amsterdam, and the ministers are chosen in some places by the congregation, and in others by the elders only. As they reject infant baptism, they refuse to commune at the Lord's table with any who administer the ordinance to children, unless re-sprinkled. They train up catechumens under their ministers, and, about the age of sixteen, baptize them, taking from the candidate, before the minister and elders, an account of his repentance and faith. In some parts of North Holland, young people are baptized on the day of their marriage. They baptize by pouring or sprinkling thrice.

With respect to their confession of faith, as it is stated by one of their ministers, Mr. Gan, of Ryswick, they believe that in the fall man lost his innocence, and that all his posterity are born with a natural propensity to evil, and with fleshly inclinations, and are exposed to sickness and death. The posterity of Adam derive no moral guilt from his fall: sin is personal, and the desert of punishment cannot be inherited. The incarnate Son of God is set forth to us as inferior to the Father, not only in his state of humiliation, but in that of his exaltation, and as subject to the Father; he is nevertheless an object of religious trust and confidence in like manner as the Father. With respect to the number of Mennonites in Holland, they are calculated at only thirty thousand, including children, and form about a hundred and thirty churches. In the United States of America, it appears, there are more than two hundred Mennonite churches, some of which contain as many as three hundred members in each. They are mostly the descendants of the Mennonites who emigrated in great numbers from Paltz. [In 1856 it was estimated that they numbered 800 churches, 250 ministers, and 86,000 members. They are reported to have 14,000 in Prussia, principally on the lower Rhine. They are found also in other parts of Germany, and in Switzerland, and Russia. In Holland they are now a considerable and opulent body. They obtained a permanent settlement there under the sanction of William, Prince of Orange; and in 1626, when, by a Confession of Faith, they cleared themselves of the crimes which had been laid to their charge, their liberties were fixed on a solid basis. In addition to their other peculiarities, the primitive Mennonites held that Christ did not derive his body from Mary, but that it was produced out of nothing by the creative power of the Holy Ghost. They believed in the thousand years' reign of Christ on the earth; and they excluded magistrates from membership in the Church. The modern Mennonites, however, have diverged, in many respects, from the faith and practice of their fathers. They now have a theological school connected with their college at Amsterdam, where their candidates for the ministry attend lectures delivered in Latin. The attempt to trace the Mennonite Anabaptists to a Waldensian origin appears to be a failure.]

[MEN OF UNDERSTANDING. A sect which arose in Flanders, A. D. 1411. They were followers of Egidius Cantor and William of Hildenison, a Carmelite monk. [MERCY. חסד. Ἐλεος. Psalm li. 1: (3, Heb.) Eph. ii. 4. A modification of love, having for its object such as are in a condition of sin or misery. God's mercy extends to all men: in concert with his other perfections, it originated their redemption. Psalm cxxxvi.; cxlv. 8, 9: Rom. xi. 32: Titus iii. 5.—Mercy is a Christian grace. James ii. 13. See FORGIVENESS and JUSTIFICATION.]

MERCY-SEAT, ἱλαστήριον, propitiatory. This word is properly an adjective, agreeing with ἐπίθημα, a lid, understood, which is expressed by the LXX, Exod. xxv. 17. In that version, ἱλαστήριον generally answers to the Hebrew כפרת, from the verb כפר, to cover, expiate, and was the lid or covering of the ark of the covenant, made of pure gold, on and before which the high-priest was to sprinkle the blood of the expiatory sacrifices on the great day of atonement, and where God promised to meet his people. Exod. xxv. 17, 22; xxix. 42; xxx. 36: Lev. xvi. 2, 14. St. Paul, by applying this name to Christ, Rom. iii. 25, assures us that he is the true mercy-seat, the reality of what the כפרת represented to the ancient believers; by him our sins are covered or expiated, and through him God communes with us in mercy. The mercy-seat also represents our approach to God through Christ: we come to the "throne of grace;" which is only a variation of the term "mercy-seat."

[MERIBAH. This name, signifying strife, and MASSAH, signifying temptation, were given to the miraculous fountain at Rephidim, because of the chiding of the children of Israel, and because they tempted the Lord. Exod. xvii. 1-7. For a similar reason the miraculous fountain in Kadesh was called Meribah. Num. xx. 1-13, 24: Deut. xxxii. 51; xxxiii. 8.]

[MERODACH. Jer. l. 2. A god of the Babylonians, supposed to be the planet Mars. Some think he was an ancient king, worshipped with divine honors: the name is blended with the names of several kings, as Evil-merodach, Mero-dach-baladan, etc. 2 Kings xxv. 27: Isa. xxxix. 1.]

MEROM, WATERS OF, or Lacus Samechontis; the most northern and the smallest of the three lakes which are supplied by the waters of the Jordan. Indeed, the numerous branches of this river, descending from the mountains, unite in this small piece of water; out of which issues the single stream which may be considered as the Jordan proper. It is at present called the Lake of Houle; and is situated in a hollow or valley, about twelve miles wide, called the Ard Houle, formed by the Djebel Heish on the west, Djebel Safat on the east, the two branches into which the mountain of Hasbeya, or Djebel Esheikh, the ancient Hermon, divides itself about fifteen miles to the north. [Josh. xi. 5, 7. See JORDAN.]

MEROZ, a place in the neighborhood of the brook Kishon, whose inhabitants, refusing to come to the assistance of their brethren, when

[MESHACH. See ABEDNEGO.]

MESHECH, COUNTRY OF. [Gen. x. 2: Psalm cxx. 5: Ezek. xxxii. 26; xxxviii. 2, 3; xxxix. 1.] Meshech was the sixth son of Japheth, and is generally mentioned in conjunction with his brother Tubal; and both were first seated in the north-eastern angle of Asia Minor, from the shores of the Euxine, along to the south of Caucasus; where were the Montes Moschisi, and where, in after-times, were the Iberi, Tibareni, and Moschi; near to whom also, or mingled with them, were the Chalybes, who, it is probable, derived their Grecian appellation from the general occupation of the families of Tubal and Meshech, as workers in brass and iron, as the inhabitants of the same countries have been in all ages, for the supply of Tyre, Persia, Greece, and Armenia. There appears also to have been in the same neighborhood, namely, in Armenia, a river and country termed Rosh—for so, Bochart says, the river Araxes is called by the Arabs—and there was a people in the adjoining country called Rhossi. That passage in Ezekiel, xxxviii., also, which in our Bibles is rendered, "the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal," is, in the Septuagint, "the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." These Rossi and Moschi, who were neighbors in Asia, dispersed their colonies jointly over the vast empire of Russia; and preserve their names still in those of Russians and Muscovites. [MESHECH, in 1 Chron. i. 17, is Mash, Gen. x. 23.]

MESOPOTAMIA, an extensive province of Asia, the Greek name of which denotes "between the rivers," and on this account Strabo says, (ὅτι κεῖται μεταξύ τοῦ Εὐφράτου καὶ τοῦ Τύγριος,) that "it was situated between the Euphrates and the Tigris." In Scripture this country is called Aram, and Aramea. But as Aram also signifies Syria, it is denominated Aram Naharaim, or the Syria of the rivers. [Gen. xxiv. 10: Acts vii. 2.] This province, which inclines from the south-east to the north-west, commenced at 33° 20' N. lat., and terminated near 37° 30' N. lat. Toward the south it extended as far as the bend formed by the Euphrates at Cunaxa, and to the wall of Semiramis which separated it from Messene. Toward the north, it comprehended part of Taurus and the Mesius, which lay between the Euphrates and the Tigris. The modern name, given by the Arabs to this part, is of the same import with the ancient appellation; they call it "isle," or, in their language, Al-Dgezera. In this northern part is found Osroene, which seems to have been the same place with Anthemusir. The northern part of Mesopotamia is occupied by chains of mountains passing from north-west to south-east, in the situation of the rivers. The central parts of these mountains were called Singaræ Montes. The principal rivers were Chaboras, (Al-Kabour,) which commenced at Charra, (Harran,) east of the mountains, and discharged itself into the Euphrates at Circesium, (Kirkisieh;) the Mygdonius, (Hanali,) the source of which was near Nisibis, and its termination in the Chaboras. The principal towns in the eastern part along the Tigris and near it, are Nisibis, (Nisibin,) Bezabde, (Zabda,) Singora, (Sindja,) Labbana on the Tigris, (Mosul,) Hatru, (Harder,) and Apamea-Mesenes. At some distance to the south, upon the Tigris and on the borders of Mesopotamia, was the town of Antiochia, near which commenced the wall that passed from the Tigris to the Euphrates, under the name of Murus Media, or Semiramidis. In the western part were Edessa, called also Callin-Rhæ, (Orfa,) Charræ, (Harran,) Nicephorium, (Racca,) Circesium, at the mouth of the Chaboras, Anatho, (Anah,) Neharda, (Hadith Unnour,) upon the right of the Euphrates. There are several other towns of less importance. According to Strabo, this country was fertile in vines, and afforded abundance of good wine. According to Ptolemy, Mesopotamia had on the north a part of Armenia, on the west the Euphrates on the side of Syria, on the east the Tigris on the borders of Assyria, and on the south the Euphrates which joined the Tigris. Mesopotamia was a satrapy under the kings of Syria.

In the earliest accounts we have of this country, subsequent to the time of Abraham, it was subject to a king, called Cushan-Rishathaim, then perhaps the most powerful potentate of the east, and the first by whom the Israelites were made captive, which happened soon after the death of Joshua, and about B. C. 1400. Judges iii. 8. The name of this king bespeaks him a descendant of Nimrod; and it was probably of the Lower Mesopotamia only, or Babylonia, of which he was sovereign; the northern parts being in the possession of the Arameans. This is implied in the history of Abraham; who, when ordered to depart from his country, namely, Chaldea, in the southern part of Mesopotamia, removed to Charran, still in Mesopotamia, but beyond the boundary of the Chaldees, and in the territory of Aram. About four hundred years after Cushan-Rishathaim, we find the northern parts of Mesopotamia in the hands of the Syrians of Zobah; as we are told, in 2 Sam. x., that Hadarezer, King of Zobah, after his defeat by Joab, "sent and brought out the Syrians that were beyond the river" Euphrates. The whole country was afterward seized by the Assyrians; to whom it pertained till the dissolution of their empire, when it was divided between the Medes and the Babylonians. It subsequently formed a part of the Medo-Persian, second Syrian or Macedonian, and Parthian empires, as it does at the present day of the modern Persians. The southern part of Mesopotamia answers nearly to the country anciently called the land of Shinar; to which the prophet Daniel, i. 2, refers, and Zechariah v. 11.

"On the fifth or sixth day after leaving Aleppo," says Campbell, in his Overland Journey to India, "we arrived at the city of Diarbeker, the capital of the province of that name; having passed over an extent of country of between three and four hundred miles, most of it blessed with the greatest fertility, and abounding with as rich pastures as I ever beheld, covered with numerous herds and flocks. The air was charmingly temperate in the day-time, but, to my feeling, extremely cold at night. Yet notwithstanding the extreme fertility of this country, the bad administration of government, conspiring with the indolence of the inhabitants, leaves it unpeopled and uncultivated. Diarbeker Proper—called also Mesopotamia, from its lying between two famous rivers, and by Moses called Padan-aram, that is, 'the fruitful Syria'—abounds with corn, wine, oil, fruits, and all the necessaries of life. It is supposed to have been the seat of the earthly paradise; and all geographers agree that here the descendants of Noah settled immediately after the flood. To be treading that ground which Abraham trod, where Nahor the father of Rebecca lived, where holy Job breathed the pure air of piety and simplicity, and where Laban the father-in-law of Jacob resided, was to me a circumstance productive of delightful sensations. As I rode along, I have often mused upon the contemptible stratagems to which I was reduced in order to get through this country, for no other reason than because I was a Christian; and I could not avoid reflecting with sorrow on the melancholy effects of superstition, and regretting that this fine tract of country, which ought to be considered above all others as the universal inheritance of mankind, should now be cut off from all except a horde of senseless bigots, barbarous fanatics, and inflexible tyrants."

[MESSENGER. One sent on an errand, or an embassy. 1 Sam. xi. 7: 2 Cor. viii. 23. John the Baptist is called Christ's messenger, because he was sent to prepare the way before him, and to herald his coming. Mal. iii. 1: Mark i. 1. Christ is called the Messenger of the Covenant, because he was sent to make known and accomplish its provisions. Mal. iii. 1.]

MESSIAH. The Greek word Χριστός, from whence come Christ and Christian, exactly answers to the Hebrew Messiah, which signifies him that hath received unction, a prophet, a king, or a priest. See JESUS CHRIST.

Our Lord warned his disciples that false Messiahs should arise, Matt. xxiv. 24; and the event has verified the prediction. No less than twenty-four false Christs have arisen in different places and at different times: Caziba was the first of any note who made a noise in the world. Being dissatisfied with the state of things under Adrian, he set himself up as the head of the Jewish nation, and proclaimed himself their long-expected Messiah. He was one of those banditti that infested Judea, and committed all kinds of violence against the Romans; and had become so powerful that he was chosen king of the Jews, and by them acknowledged their Messiah. However, to facilitate the success of this bold enterprise, he changed his name from Caziba, which it was at first, to that of Barchocheba, alluding to the star foretold by Balaam; for he pretended to be the star sent from heaven to restore his nation to its ancient liberty and glory. He chose a forerunner, raised an army, was anointed king, coined money inscribed with his own name, and proclaimed himself Messiah and prince of the Jewish nation. Adrian raised an army, and sent it against him: he retired into a town called Bither, where he was besieged. Barchocheba was killed in the siege, the city was taken, and a dreadful havoc succeeded. The Jews themselves allow, that during this short war against:

the Romans in defence of this false Messiah, they lost five or six hundred thousand souls. This was in the former part of the second century. In the reign of Theodosius the Younger, A. D. 434, another impostor arose, called Moses Cretensis. He pretended to be a second Moses, sent to deliver the Jews who dwelt in Crete, and promised to divide the sea and give them a safe passage through it. Their delusion proved so strong and universal, that they neglected their lands, houses, and other concerns, and took only so much with them as they could conveniently carry. And on the day appointed, this false Moses, having led them to the top of a rock, men, women, and children threw themselves headlong down into the sea, without the least hesitation or reluctance, till so great a number of them were drowned as opened the eyes of the rest, and made them sensible of the cheat. They then began to look for their pretended leader; but he had disappeared, and escaped out of their hands. In the reign of Justin, about A. D. 520, another impostor appeared, who called himself the son of Moses. His name was Dunaan. He entered into a city of Arabia Felix, and there he greatly oppressed the Christians; but he was taken prisoner and put to death by Elesban, an Ethiopian general. The Jews and Samaritans rebelled against the Emperor Justinian, A. D. 529, and set up one Julian for their king, and accounted him the Messiah. The emperor sent an army against them, killed great numbers of them, took their pretended Messiah prisoner, and immediately put him to death. In the time of Leo Isaurus, about A. D. 721, arose another false Messiah in Spain: his name was Serenus. He drew great numbers after him, to their no small loss and disappointment; but all his pretensions came to nothing. The twelfth century was fruitful in Messiahs. About A. D. 1137, there appeared one in France, who was put to death, and numbers of those who followed him. In A. D. 1138, the Persians were disturbed with a Jew, who called himself the Messiah. He collected a vast army; but he too was put to death, and his followers treated with great inhumanity. A false Messiah stirred up the Jews at Corduba in Spain, A. D. 1157. The wiser and better sort looked upon him as a madman, but the great body of the Jews in the nation believed in him. On this occasion nearly all the Jews in Spain were destroyed. Another false Messiah arose in the kingdom of Fez, A. D. 1167, which brought great troubles and persecutions upon the Jews that were scattered throughout that country. In the same year, an Arabian professed to be the Messiah, and pretended to work miracles. When search was made for him, his followers fled, and he was brought before the Arabian king. Being questioned by him, he replied that he was a prophet sent from God. The king then asked him what sign he could show to confirm his mission. "Cut off my head," said he, "and I will return to life again." The king took him at his word, promising to believe him if his prediction was accomplished. The poor wretch, however, never came to life again, and the cheat was sufficiently discovered. Those who had been deluded by him were grievously punished, and the nation condemned to a very heavy fine. Not long after this, a Jew who dwelt beyond the Euphrates called himself the Messiah, and drew vast multitudes of people after him. He gave this for a sign of it, that he had been leprous, and had been cured in the course of one night. He, like the rest, perished, and brought great persecution on his countrymen. A magician and false Christ arose in Persia, A. D. 1174, who seduced many of the common people, and brought the Jews into great tribulation. Another of these impostors arose, A. D. 1176, in Moravia, who was called David Almusser. He pretended he could make himself invisible; but he was soon taken and put to death, and a heavy fine laid upon the Jews. A famous cheat and rebel exerted himself in Persia, A. D. 1199, called David el David. He was a man of learning, a great magician, and pretended to be the Messiah. He raised an army against the king, but was taken and imprisoned; and, having made his escape, was afterward retaken and beheaded. Vast numbers of the Jews were butchered for taking part with this impostor. Rabbi Lemlem, a German Jew of Austria, declared himself a forerunner of the Messiah, A. D. 1500, and pulled down his own oven, promising his brethren that they should bake their bread in the Holy Land next year. A false Christ arose in the East Indies, A. D. 1615, and was greatly followed by the Portuguese Jews who are scattered over that country. Another in the Low Countries declared himself to be the Messiah of the family of David, and of the line of Nathan, A. D. 1624. He promised to destroy Rome, and to overthrow the kingdom of Antichrist, and the Turkish empire. In A. D. 1666, appeared the false Messiah Sabatai Tzevi, who made a great noise, and gained a great number of proselytes. He was born at Aleppo, and imposed on the Jews for a considerable time; but afterward, with a view of saving his life, he turned Mohammedan, and was at last beheaded. The last false Christ that made any considerable number of converts was one Rabbi Mordecai, a Jew of Germany: he appeared A. D. 1682. It was not long before he was found out to be an impostor, and was obliged to flee from Italy to Poland to save his life: what became of him afterward does not seem to be recorded.

METEMPSYCHOSIS, the doctrine of the transmigration of souls into other bodies. This tenet has been attributed to the sect of the Pharisees. Josephus, who was himself a Pharisee, gives this account of their doctrine in these points: "Every soul is immortal: those of the good only enter into another body, but those of the bad are tormented with everlasting punishment." From whence it has been pretty generally concluded, that the resurrection they held was only a Pythagorean one, namely, the transmigration of the soul into another body; from which they excluded all that were notoriously wicked, who were doomed at once to eternal punishment; but their opinion was, that those who were guilty only of lesser crimes were punished for them in the bodies into which their souls were next sent. It is also supposed that it was upon this notion the disciples asked our Lord, "Did this man sin, or his parents, that he was born blind?" John ix. 2; and that some said, Christ was "John the Baptist, some Elias, others Jeremias, or one of the prophets." Matt. xvi. 14. The transmigration of souls into other bodies was undoubtedly the opinion of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, and was embraced by some among the Jews; as by the author of the Book of Wisdom, who says, that "being good, he came into a body undefiled." viii. 20. Nevertheless, it is questioned by some persons, whether the words of Josephus, before quoted, are a sufficient evidence of this doctrine of the metempsychosis being received by the whole sect of the Pharisees; for "passing into another or different body," may only denote its receiving a body at the resurrection; which will be another, not in substance, but in quality; as it is said of Christ at his transfiguration, τὸ εἶδος τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ ἔρεπον, "the fashion of his countenance was" another, or, as we render it, was "altered." Luke ix. 29. As to the opinion which some entertained concerning our Saviour, that he was either John the Baptist, or Elias, or Jeremias, or one of the prophets, Matt. xvi. 14, it is not ascribed to the Pharisees in particular, and if it were, one cannot see how it could be founded on the doctrine of the metempsychosis; since the soul of Elias, now inhabiting the body of Jesus, would no more make him to be Elias, than several others had been, in whose bodies the soul of Elias, according to this doctrine, is supposed to have dwelt since the death of that ancient prophet, near a thousand years before. Besides, how was it possible any person that saw Christ, who did not appear to be less than thirty years old, should, according to the notion of the metempsychosis, conceive him to be John the Baptist, who had been so lately beheaded? Surely this apprehension must be grounded on the supposition of a proper resurrection. It was probably, therefore, upon the same account that others took him to be Elias, and others Jeremias. Accordingly, St. Luke expresses it thus: "Others say, that one of the old prophets is risen from the dead." Luke ix. 19. It may further be observed, that the doctrine of the resurrection, which St. Paul preached, was not a present metempsychosis, but a real future resurrection, which he calls the "hope and resurrection of the dead." Acts xxiii. 6. This he professed as a Pharisee, and for this profession the partisans of the sect vindicated him against the Sadducees. Acts xxiii. 7-9. Upon the whole, therefore, it appears most reasonable to adopt the opinion of Reland, though in opposition to the sentiments of many other learned men, that the Pharisees held the doctrine of the resurrection in a proper sense.

[METHODIST ASSOCIATION, WESLEYAN. This body originated in England in 1835. It was occasioned by a controversy respecting a Wesleyan Theological Institution. The doctrinal system of the Association is purely Wesleyan, and so is their polity, except that their "Annual Assembly," as their Conference is called, is composed of such itinerant and local preachers, and official or private members, as are elected by the circuits, or churches, which contribute £50 to the support of the ministry: the number of representatives being regulated by the number of constituents. They have about 100 travelling and 1000 local preachers, and nearly 20,000 members.]

[METHODIST CONNECTION OF AMERICA, WESLEYAN. This organization grew out of a secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church on the ground of certain questions respecting slavery and Church government. The secession began in Michigan, in 1839: in 1841 the seceders formed an organization which held several Annual Conferences under the style of "Wesleyan Methodists." Meanwhile, Orange Scott and others in New England announced their withdrawal from the Methodist Episcopal Church; and a convention was called to meet at Andover in February, 1843, which was followed by a General Convention at Utica in May, 1843, at which the "Connection" was organized, and a Discipline adopted. The first General Conference was held in October, 1844, and the second in October, 1848, at both of which the Discipline was modified and revised. By referring to this volume it appears that the Connection does not depart from the Methodist Episcopal Church in doctrinal matters, though it has eliminated Articles 11, 13, 14, 15, 19, 21, 23, 24, 25, from the Confession, modified several of the rest, and inserted four entirely new ones, viz.: "Of Relative Duties," "Of Sanctification," "Of the Resurrection of the Dead," and "Of the General Judgment." It adopts the "General Rules," modifying two of them so as to make them read, "Drunkenness, or the manufacturing, buying, selling, or using intoxicating liquors, unless for mechanical, chemical, or medicinal purposes, or in any way intentionally and knowingly aiding others so to do." "The buying or selling of men, women, or children, with an intention to enslave them; or holding them as slaves; or claiming that it is right so to do." It has a section against "the practice of war in all its forms;" and one against "secret oath-bound societies." It recognizes but one order of ministers—elders—and, of course, has but one form of ordination, which, with slight verbal changes, is taken from the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The General Conference meets quadrennially, and is composed of an equal number of laymen and of elders, both stationed and unstationed. The Yearly Conferences are composed of stationed elders and laymen: unstationed elders being allowed a seat, with a right to speak but not to vote: the president must be an elder; he holds his office for a year. The Quarterly Conferences are presided over by the pastors, unless some other members of these bodies be appointed by vote. Ministers may contract permanent pastoral relations with any church; but those who are not so engaged may be appointed for three years successively to the same charge—or longer, if the Yearly Conference deem proper. Class-meetings are recognized, though attendance on them is not made a test of membership. A member accused of any offence may be tried by a standing Judiciary Committee, or by a special committee, or by the Church itself, which is also his court of appeal. A licentiate is tried by a committee composed of licentiates and laymen, his court of appeal being the Quarterly Conference. An elder, and also an "offending church," may be tried by a committee composed of elders and laymen, or by the Yearly Conference, which is also their court of appeal. The Services for the Sacraments and for the Burial of the Dead—there are none for Matrimony—are so abridged as to be little more than a directory for the performance of these rites. The Connection has a "Book Concern" at Syracuse, New York, with a branch at Mansfield, Ohio: at the former a weekly paper called the Wesleyan is issued, as also a Sunday-school paper. It has "two academical, theological, and collegiate institutions;" 12 Conferences, 275 pastors, 200 unstationed ministers, and 20,000 members. See Matlack's "Methodism and Slavery," and "Minutes of the Yearly Conferences."]

[METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The nucleus of this Church was a society organized in New York in 1766, by Philip Embury, a Methodist local preacher from Ireland. In the same year Captain Thomas Webb preached in a hired room near the barracks. About that time Robert Strawbridge, another local preacher from Ireland, formed societies in Frederick County, Maryland. A Methodist church was built in John Street, New York, in 1768; and in 1769, Mr. Wesley sent over two ministers, Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor; and in 1771, two others, Francis Asbury and Richard Wright. They were followed by more; and some were raised up in the American societies. The zealous labors of these men were crowned with so much success that in 1784 they numbered 14,988 members in their societies, and 83 preachers. In that year Mr. Wesley yielded to their importunate solicitations, and adopted measures for their perfect ecclesiastical organization. Before the Revolution they considered themselves members of the Church of England; but after that event the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London, to whose diocese the colonies were previously attached, ceased in this country, and many of the English clergy returned to Great Britain, so that it became impossible for the Methodists to perpetuate their membership in that communion. Mr. Wesley had repeatedly solicited the Bishop to ordain men to take pastoral charge of the Methodists in America, but he had failed to do so; and seeing no other available method for supplying the destitute people with the ordinances of religion, Mr. Wesley himself ordained men for this work. He had been for a long time thoroughly satisfied of the validity of presbyterial ordination—presbyters and bishops being but one order in the apostolic and primitive Church. But as he preferred an episcopal government, he set apart, by the imposition of his hands and prayer, Thomas Coke, LL. D., a presbyter of the Church of England, for the episcopal office, instructing him to set apart Francis Asbury for the same office, after ordaining him deacon and elder. Dr. Coke immediately repaired to this country, and at a General Conference of the Methodist preachers in Baltimore, in December, 1784, consecrated Mr. Asbury to the episcopal office by the imposition of his hands, accompanied by those of other ministers, one of them being the Rev. William Otterbein, a pious divine of the German Reformed Church. The Conference unanimously approved of these proceedings, and the societies under their care recognized them with gratitude and joy. Designing the Methodist Episcopal Church, thus organized, to take the place of the Church of England in America, Mr. Wesley prepared for it a judicious abridgment of the Liturgy, embracing the ordinal, sacramental, and other services. Articles 3, 8, 13, 15, 17, 18, 20, 21, 23, 26, 29, 33, 35, 36, 37, of the Anglican Confession were omitted by him, and some of the rest were shortened and modified. The twenty-third article of the Methodist Confession, "Of the Rulers of the United States of America," was not in the "Articles of Religion," printed by Mr. Wesley in the Prayer-book of 1784: it was framed by the General Conference of that year, and inserted in the "Articles" as printed in the Prayer-book of 1786. As the majority of the Episcopalians in the United States, outside of the Methodist societies, objected to many features of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and as they entertained prelatial views of Church government, they secured, through the British parliament, another organization, in 1787, called The Protestant Episcopal Church, in which they found a congenial home. The essential features of the Wesleyan system—such as an itinerant ministry, class-meetings, love-feasts, etc.—as well as the doctrinal platform of the British Connection, were adopted by the Methodist Episcopal Church. But as it increased rapidly, both in numbers and geographical extent, it was found necessary to have several Annual Conferences, with one quadrennial General Conference, composed of delegates from the Annual Conferences. The first session of the delegated General Conference was held at New York, in May, 1812. This body has power, within certain restrictions, to make rules for the government of the Church: it is a court of appeal for the travelling preachers, and of trial for the bishops; and by it also they are elected. The Annual Conferences are courts of trial for the travelling preachers, and of appeal for the local preachers. They receive preachers into their own connection, after they are recommended by the Quarterly Conferences. These are composed of all the preachers and other officers of a circuit or station: they are courts of trial for local preachers and of appeal for private members: they take cognizance of all the affairs of the circuit or station, and license men to preach, when they are recommended by a society or leaders' meeting. A society comprehends the members who meet at a particular place for Divine worship. A leaders' meeting is composed of the class-leaders, who meet once a week, with the stewards and preachers, for spiritual and financial purposes. The bishops remain in office during life or good behavior, provided they continue to itinerate. They preside in the Conferences, and ordain and station the ministers; though they are not allowed to let a minister remain more than two years successively in the same station or circuit. As the

Conferences are divided into districts, each of which comprehends about a dozen circuits or stations, the bishops appoint presiding elders to supervise those districts, and preside in the Quarterly Conferences; though they are not allowed to let a presiding elder remain more than four years successively in the same district. The preachers in charge of circuits, or stations, receive, try, and expel members, according to prescribed forms: they appoint leaders, trustees, and stewards, license exhorters, and perform, with the aid of their colleagues and the local preachers, all the duties of the pastoral office. The stewards manage all the financial affairs of the charges to which they belong; and the trustees hold the property for the uses to which it is appropriated. The manner in which all these officers are appointed, and the directions concerning the discharge of their duties respectively, and numerous other matters which cannot be here detailed, are minutely described in the "Discipline." As the Church has been recently divided into two jurisdictions, the following section from the Discipline of the Southern division may not be inappropriately introduced in this place: "In the judgment of the delegates of the several Annual Conferences in the slaveholding States, the continued agitation of the subject of slavery and abolition in a portion of the Church, the frequent action on that subject in the General Conference, and especially the proceedings of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of 1844, in the case of the Rev. James O. Andrew, D. D., one of the bishops, who had become connected with slavery by marriage, produced a state of things in the South which rendered a continuance of the jurisdiction of that General Conference over the Conferences aforesaid inconsistent with the success of the ministry in their proper calling. This conviction they declared in solemn form to the General Conference, accompanied with a protest against the action referred to, assured that public opinion in the slaveholding States would demand, and that a due regard to the vital interests of Christ's kingdom would justify, a separate and independent organization. The developments of a few months vindicated their anticipations. The Church in the South and South-west, in her primary assemblies, her Quarterly and Annual Conferences, with a unanimity unparalleled in ecclesiastical history, approved the course of their delegates, and declared her conviction that a separate jurisdiction was necessary to her existence and prosperity. The General Conference of 1844 having adopted a 'Plan of Separation,' provided for the erection of the Annual Conferences in the slaveholding States into a separate ecclesiastical connection, under the jurisdiction of a Southern General Conference, the delegates of the aforementioned Conferences, in a published address, recommended that a convention of delegates from the said Conferences, duly instructed as to the wishes of the ministry and laity, should assemble at Louisville, Kentucky, on the first day of May, 1845. The convention met, delegates having been formally appointed in pursuance of this recommendation; and, after a full and minute representation of all the facts in the premises, acting under the provisional 'Plan of Separation,' declared, by solemn resolution, the jurisdiction hitherto exercised by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church over the Conferences in the slaveholding States entirely dissolved, and erected the said Annual Conferences into a separate ecclesiastical connection, under the style and title of The Methodist Episcopal Church, South: the first General Conference of which was held in the town of Petersburg, Virginia, on the first day of May, 1846." The Northern division of the Church has seven bishops, forty-seven Conferences, (one being in Liberia, Africa,) 5588 travelling and 6590 local preachers, 799,431 lay communicants, and an annual revenue for Home and Foreign Missions of $250,000. It has several universities and colleges, two theological institutions, a large number of seminaries, male and female, a "Book Concern," or Publishing House, at New York, and another at Cincinnati, and quarterly, monthly, and weekly periodicals, issued in various sections. The Southern division has six bishops, twenty-three Conferences, 2229 travelling and 4628 local preachers, 621,135 lay communicants, and a revenue for Foreign and Home Missions, principally to colored people, amounting to $150,000. It has several universities and colleges, a large number of seminaries, male and female, a Publishing House at Nashville, Tennessee, and quarterly, monthly, and weekly periodicals, issued in various sections. It is believed that in no Church in Christendom have the laity more influence than in the Methodist Episcopal Church; nevertheless, its government has been called by some a priestly despotism, and on this ground several secessions have been made from its ranks; and for this and other reasons—as dislike to a change in the ministry, free seats in churches, and strictness of discipline—thousands of persons have gone from it into other communions. By this means the ministry and membership of some Churches have been greatly augmented. The catholic spirit of Methodism cherishes the hope that the interests of the common Christianity are thereby promoted; and no matter how many may leave its ranks, while Methodism continues to be "Christianity in earnest," their places can be readily filled by new converts from the world. Those wishing more information concerning the Methodist Episcopal Church, are referred to the Discipline, Emory's "Defence of our Fathers," Bangs's "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church," "History of the Organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South," "Journals of the General Conferences," and "Minutes of the Annual Conferences," North and South.]

[METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, AFRICAN. This Connection was organized at Philadelphia, in 1816, by certain colored persons who seceded from the Methodist Episcopal Church. One of the prime movers in the secession was named Richard Allen; hence they are sometimes called Allenites. The grounds of the secession are traced back to 1787, when some of the colored members of the Methodist Episcopal Church began to be dissatisfied with the relations they sustained to their white brethren.

They were not opposed to the doctrines and discipline of the Church, which they have adopted, with the exception of the presiding eldership—which, as one of their bishops expresses it, “has been omitted, chiefly because we are too poor to sustain it.” They have a General Conference, eight Annual Conferences, mostly in the free States, three bishops, and about twenty-nine thousand members. Their numbers are increasing. They had a Conference in Canada, which became independent in 1856. There have been several secessions from the Connection, as “The First Colored Methodist Protestant Church,” organized June, 1850; and “The First Colored Congregational Church,” organized in 1852 or 1853, in New York. “The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church,” was organized in 1820. It is next in numbers to the African Methodist Episcopal Church. It has no bishops, eo nomine, but retains the episcopal office. The existence of these bodies in the Northern States will, in part, account for the fact that the Northern division of the Methodist Episcopal Church reports but twenty-seven thousand seven hundred and forty-six colored members, while the Southern division reports one hundred and seventy thousand one hundred and fifty.]

[METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN CANADA. The Methodists in Upper Canada were formerly under the jurisdiction of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States; but from political considerations, chiefly, it was deemed advisable that they should be transferred to the jurisdiction of the British Conference. This change was effected in 1830. But as many of the ministers and members preferred the episcopal mode of government, they formed a separate organization, which they called the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada. They have two bishops, two Annual Conferences, 126 travelling and 188 local preachers, and 11,310 communicants. They publish a “Canada Christian Advocate” at Hamilton.]

[METHODIST NEW CONNECTION. This body originated in a separation from the Wesleyan Methodists, in 1797. The “Plan of Pacification” adopted by the Conference of 1795, allowing Methodist services in “Church hours,” the administration of the ordinances by Methodist ministers, under certain conditions, and the participation of the laity in the government of the circuits, though giving general satisfaction, did not satisfy some—among whom was Alexander Kilham, a native of Epworth, the birthplace of the Wesleys. He wished to introduce lay-representation in the Conference; but failing in this, he originated the “New Connection,” which accordingly is frequently known by the name of “Kilhamites.” The Conference is composed of an equal number of ministers and laymen. Their doctrinal system is purely Wesleyan.]

[METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. The nucleus of this Church was formed in Baltimore, in 1827, by seceders from the Methodist Episcopal Church and some who had been excluded from that communion under the charge of “sowing dissensions.” The “Associated Methodists,” as they called themselves, held a convention, at Baltimore, in November, 1827, and prepared a memorial which was presented to the General Conference of 1828, praying that body to adopt measures to secure lay-representation in the Conferences. As the Conference did not comply with their wishes, they held another convention, at Baltimore, in November, 1828, and drew up seventeen “Articles of Association,” for a provisional government; and at another convention, at Baltimore, in November, 1830, Francis Waters, D. D., being president, the “Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church” was adopted. Since that time the system has undergone various alterations, none of them, however, affecting the doctrinal platform of the Church, which is identical with that of the original body. The Methodist Protestants retain, with some modifications, the Wesleyan economy of classes, love-feasts, leaders’ meetings, Quarterly, District, and General Conferences, itinerant and local preachers. Instead of bishops and presiding elders, they have presidents, elected annually; and they have a lay-representation in all the Conferences. They have a Board of Domestic and Foreign Missions and a Book Concern at Baltimore, and several religious periodicals and literary institutions, 916 ministers, and 70,015 members. See the “Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church,” “History of the Methodist Protestant Secession,” by Dr. Jennings, “History of the Methodist Episcopal Church,” by Dr. Bangs, “Defence of our Fathers,” by Bishop Emory.]

METHODISTS, a name given in derision at different times to religious persons and parties which have appeared in this country; but which now principally designates the followers of the Rev. John Wesley. [It has been suggested that the young gentleman at Christ Church College who said, in reference to the Wesleys and their friends, “Here is a new sect of Methodists sprung up,” alluded to an ancient school of physicians, who reduced the healing art to a few principles and a simple method, hence called “Medical Methodists.” But it is doubted whether the wits of Oxford knew any thing of that sect. They may, however, have been acquainted with the fact that certain religious persons in England, in the seventeenth century, were called Methodists. In a sermon preached at Lambeth in 1639, occurs this passage: “Where are now our Anabaptists and plain packstaff Methodists, who esteem of all flowers of rhetoric in sermons no better than stinking weeds, and of all elegancies of speech no better than profane spells?” It seems those early Methodists were both plain in speech and dress. In 1693, a Calvinistic pamphlet was published against “the principles of the New Methodists in the great point of justification.” They renounced the dogma of the imputation of Christ’s righteousness, as held by Calvinists, and taught the imputation of faith for justification, somewhat after the manner of the Wesleyan Methodists. These Nonconformists, however, did not constitute a distinct sect. The name of Methodists was also applied to certain popish polemical doctors of the seventeenth century. See METHODISTS, DIALECTIC.] The societies raised up by the instrumentality of the

Rev. George Whitefield were also called Methodists, and in Wales especially are still known by that appellation. For distinction's sake, therefore, and also because a number of smaller sects have broken off from the Methodist societies since Mr. Wesley's death, the religious body which he raised up and left organized under his rules, have of late been generally denominated the WESLEYAN METHODISTS. In the year 1729, Mr. John Wesley, being then fellow of Lincoln College, began to spend some evenings in reading the Greek Testament with Charles Wesley, student, and Mr. Morgan, commoner of Christ Church, and Mr. Kirkham, of Merton College. Not long after, two or three of the pupils of Mr. John Wesley, and one pupil of Mr. Charles Wesley, obtained leave to attend these meetings. They then began to visit the sick in different parts of the town, and the prisoners, also, who were confined in the castle. Two years after, they were joined by Mr. Ingham, of Queen's College, Mr. Broughton, and Mr. Hervey; and in 1735, by the celebrated Mr. George Whitefield, then in his eighteenth year. At this time their number in Oxford amounted to about fourteen. They obtained the name of Methodists from the exact regularity of their lives, and the manner of spending their time. In October, 1735, John and Charles Wesley, Mr. Ingham, and Mr. Delamotte, son of a merchant in London, embarked for Georgia, having been engaged by the trustees of that colony as chaplains; but their ultimate design was to preach the gospel to the Indians. No favorable opportunity offering itself for this pious work, and the strict and faithful preaching of the Wesleys having involved them in much persecution, and many disputes with the colonists, they returned to England.—Mr. Charles Wesley in 1737, Mr. John Wesley in 1738. On the passage to America, and while in Georgia, Mr. John had met with several pious Moravians; whose doctrines of justification by faith alone, conscious pardon of sin, and peace with God, confirmed by their own calmness in danger and freedom from the fear of death, greatly impressed him. On his return to England, he was more fully instructed in these views by Böhler, a Moravian minister; and having proved their truth in his own experience, he began to preach in the churches of the metropolis, and other places, and then in rooms, fields, and streets, the doctrine of salvation by faith. In this his brother Charles was his zealous coadjutor; and the effect was the awakening of great multitudes to a religious concern, and the commencement of a great revival of religion throughout the land, which has in its effects extended itself to the most distant parts of the world. At the time of Mr. Wesley's death, the societies in connection with him in Europe, America, and the West Indies, amounted to eighty thousand members: they are now [1831] upward of three hundred thousand, besides about half a million in the United States of America, who since the acquisition of independence by that country have formed a separate Church. The rules of this religious society were drawn up by Messrs. John and Charles Wesley in 1743, and continue to be in force. They state the nature and design of a

Methodist society in the following words: "Such a society is no other than a company of men, having the form and seeking the power of godliness: united, in order to pray together, to receive the word of exhortation, and to watch over one another in love, that they may help each other to work out their own salvation. That it may the more easily be discerned whether they are indeed working out their own salvation, each society is divided into smaller companies, called classes, according to their respective places of abode. There are about twelve persons, sometimes fifteen, twenty, or even more, in each class; one of whom is styled the leader. It is his business, 1. To see each person in his class once a week, at least, in order to inquire how their souls prosper: to advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require: to receive what they are willing to give to the poor, or toward the support of the gospel. 2. To meet the minister and the stewards of the society once a week: to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly and will not be reprov'd: to pay to the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding; and to show their account of what each person has contributed. There is only one condition previously required of those who desire admission into these societies, namely, a desire to flee from the wrath to come—to be saved from their sins; but wherever this is really fixed in the soul, it will be shown by its fruits. It is therefore expected of all who continue therein, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation: 1. By doing no harm; by avoiding evil in every kind, especially that which is most generally practiced, such as taking the name of God in vain; profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work thereon, or by buying or selling; drunkenness; buying and selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity; fighting, quarrelling, brawling; brother going to law with brother; returning evil for evil, or railing for railing; the using many words in buying or selling; the buying or selling uncustomed goods; the giving or taking things on usury, that is, unlawful interest; uncharitable or unprofitable conversation, particularly speaking evil of magistrates or of ministers; doing to others as we would not they should do unto us; doing what we know is not for the glory of God, as the putting on of gold or costly apparel; the taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus; singing those songs, or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God; softness, or needless self-indulgence; laying up treasure upon earth; borrowing without a probability of paying; or taking up goods without a probability of paying for them. It is expected of all who continue in these societies, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation, 2. By doing good; by being in every kind merciful after their power, as they have opportunity; doing good of every possible sort, and, as far as possible, to all men: to their bodies, of the ability which God giveth, by giving food to the hungry, by clothing the naked, by visiting or helping them that are sick or in prison; to their souls, by instructing, re-proving, or exhorting all we have any intercourse with; trampling under foot that enthusiastic doctrine of devils, that we are not to do good unless our hearts be free to it; by doing good, especially to them that are of the household of faith, or groaning so to be; employing them preferably to others; buying one of another; helping each other in business, and so much the more, as the world will love its own, and them only; by all possible diligence and frugality, that the gospel be not blamed; by running with patience the race set before them, denying themselves, and taking up their cross daily; submitting to bear the reproach of Christ, to be as the filth and offscouring of the world, and looking that men should say all manner of evil of them falsely for the Lord's sake. It is expected of all who continue in these societies, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation, 3. By attending on all the ordinances of God: such are, the public worship of God; the ministry of the word, either read or expounded; the supper of the Lord; family and private prayer; searching the Scriptures, and fasting and abstinence. These are the general rules of our societies, all which we are taught of God to observe, even in his written word, the only rule, and the sufficient rule, both of our faith and practice; and all these, we know, his Spirit writes on every truly awakened heart. If there be any among us who observe them not, who habitually breaks any of them, let it be made known to them who watch over that soul, as they that must give an account. We will admonish him of the error of his ways; we will bear with him for a season; but then, if he repent not, he hath no more place among us: we have delivered our own souls."

The effect produced by the preaching of the two brothers in various parts of the kingdom, and those frequently the most populous and rude, rendered it necessary to call out preachers to their assistance, and especially since the clergy generally remained negligent, and rather opposed and persecuted than encouraged the Wesleys in their endeavors to effect a national reformation. The association of preachers with themselves in the work led to an annual meeting of the ministers, then and since called the Conference. The first Conference was held in June, 1744, at which Mr. Wesley met his brother, two or three other clergymen, and a few of the preachers, whom he had appointed to come from various parts, to confer with them on the affairs of the societies. "Monday, June 25," observes Mr. Wesley, "and the five following days, we spent in conference with our preachers, seriously considering by what means we might the most effectually save our own souls, and them that heard us; and the result of our consultations we set down to be the rule of our future practice." Since that time a Conference has been annually held; Mr. Wesley himself having presided at forty-seven. The subjects of their deliberations were proposed in the form of questions, which were amply discussed; and the questions, with the answers agreed upon, were afterward printed under the title of "Minutes of several Conversations between the Rev. Mr. Wesley and others," commonly called Minutes of Conference.

As the kingdom had been divided into circuits, to each of which several preachers were appointed for one or two years, a part of the work of every Conference was to arrange these appointments and changes. In the early Conferences various points of doctrine were discussed with reference to the agreement of all in a common standard; and when this was settled, and the doctrinal discussions discontinued, new regulations continued to be adopted, as the state of the societies, and the enlarging opportunities of doing good, required. The character of all those who were engaged in the ministry was also annually examined; and those who had passed the appointed term of probation were solemnly received into the ministry. All the preachers were itinerants, and, animated by the example of Mr. Wesley, went through great labors, and endured many privations and persecutions, but with such success that societies and congregations were in a few years raised up in almost every part of England, and in a very considerable number of places in Ireland, Wales, and Scotland. The doctrines held by the Methodists, Mr. Wesley declared repeatedly in his writings to be those contained in the Articles of the Church of England; for he understood the article on predestination, as many others have done, in a sense not contrary to the doctrine of the redemption and the possible salvation of the whole human race. It will, therefore, be merely necessary to state those views of certain doctrines which it has been thought the Wesleyan Methodists hold in a somewhat peculiar way, or on which they have been most liable to misrepresentation.

They maintain the total fall of man in Adam, and his utter inability to recover himself, or take one step toward his recovery, "without the grace of God preventing him, that he may have a good will, and working with him when he has that good will." They assert that "Christ, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man." This grace they call free, as extending itself freely to all. They say that "Christ is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe;" and that, consequently, they are authorized to offer salvation to all, and to "preach the gospel to every creature." They hold justification by faith. "Justification," says Mr. Wesley, "sometimes means our acquittal at the last day, Matt. xii. 37; but this is altogether out of the present question; for that justification whereof our Articles and Homilies speak, signifies present forgiveness, pardon of sins, and consequently acceptance with God, who therein declares his righteousness, or justice, and mercy, by or for the remission of sins that are past, Romans iii. 25, saying, 'I will be merciful to thy unrighteousness, and thine iniquities I will remember no more.' I believe the condition of this is faith, Rom. iv. 5, etc.: I mean, not only that without faith we cannot be justified, but also that as soon as any one has true faith, in that moment he is justified. Faith, in general, is a Divine supernatural evidence, or conviction, of things not seen, not discoverable by our bodily senses, as being either past, future, or spiritual.

Justifying faith implies, not only a Divine evidence, or conviction, that 'God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself,' but a full reliance on the merits of his death, a sure confidence that Christ died for my sins; that he loved me, and gave himself for me; and the moment a penitent sinner believes this, God pardons and absolves him." This faith, Mr. Wesley affirms, "is the gift of God. No man is able to work it in himself. It is a work of Omnipotence. It requires no less power thus to quicken a dead soul, than to raise a body that lies in the grave. It is a new creation; and none can create a soul anew but He who at first created the heavens and the earth. It is the free gift of God, which he bestows not on those who are worthy of his favor, not on such as are previously holy, and so fit to be crowned with all the blessings of his goodness; but on the ungodly and unholy, on those who till that hour were fit only for everlasting destruction: those in whom is no good thing, and whose only plea was, 'God be merciful to me, a sinner!' No merit, no goodness, in man, precedes the forgiving love of God. His pardoning mercy supposes nothing in us but a sense of mere sin and misery; and to all who see and feel and own their wants, and their utter inability to remove them, God freely gives faith, for the sake of Him in whom he is always well pleased. Good works follow this faith, Luke vi. 43, but cannot go before it; much less can sanctification, which implies a continued course of good works springing from holiness of heart." As to repentance, he insisted that it is conviction of sin, and that repentance, and works meet for repentance, go before justifying faith; but he held, with the Church of England, that all works, before justification, had "the nature of sin;" and that, as they had no root in the love of God, which can only arise from a persuasion of his being reconciled to us, they could not constitute a moral worthiness preparatory to pardon. That true repentance springs from the grace of God, is most certain; but, whatever fruits it may bring forth, it changes not man's relation to God. He is a sinner, and is justified as such; "for it is not a saint, but a sinner, that is forgiven, and under the notion of a sinner." God justifieth the ungodly, not the godly. Repentance, according to his statement, is necessary to true faith; but faith alone is the direct and immediate instrument of pardon. They hold also the direct internal testimony of the Holy Spirit to the believer's adoption: for an exposition of which, see HOLY SPIRIT.

They maintain also that, by virtue of the blood of Jesus Christ, and the operations of the Holy Spirit, it is their privilege to arrive at that maturity in grace, and participation of the Divine nature, which excludes sin from the heart, and fills it with perfect love to God and man. This they denominate Christian perfection. On this doctrine Mr. Wesley observes, "Christian perfection does not imply an exemption from ignorance or mistake, infirmities or temptations; but it implies the being so crucified with Christ as to be able to testify, 'I live not, but Christ liveth in me,' Gal. ii. 23, and 'hath purified their hearts by faith,' Acts xv. 9."

Again: "To explain myself a little further on this head: 1. Not only sin, properly so called, that is, a voluntary transgression of a known law; but sin, improperly so called, that is, an involuntary transgression of a Divine law known or unknown, needs the atoning blood. 2. I believe there is no such perfection in this life as excludes these involuntary transgressions, which I apprehend to be naturally consequent on the ignorance and mistakes inseparable from mortality. 3. Therefore, sinless perfection is a phrase I never use, lest I should seem to contradict myself. 4. I believe a person filled with the love of God is still liable to these involuntary transgressions. 5. Such transgressions you may call sins, if you please: I do not, for the reasons above mentioned."

The rules of the Methodist societies have been already given; but, in order to have a general view of their ecclesiastical economy, it must be remarked, that a number of these societies united together form what is called a circuit. A circuit generally includes a large market-town, and the circumjacent villages to the extent of ten or fifteen miles. To one circuit two or three, and sometimes four, preachers are appointed, one of whom is styled the superintendent; and this is the sphere of their labor for at least one year, or not more than three years. Once a quarter the preachers meet all the classes, and speak personally to each member. Those who have walked orderly the preceding quarter then receive a ticket. These tickets are in some respects analogous to the tesserae of the ancients, and answer all the purposes of the commendatory letters spoken of by the apostle. Their chief use is to prevent imposture. After the visitation of the classes a meeting is held, consisting of all the preachers, leaders, and stewards in the circuit. At this meeting the stewards deliver their collections to a circuit steward, and every thing relating to temporal matters is publicly settled. At this meeting the candidates for the ministry are proposed, and the stewards, after officiating a definite period, are changed. A number of circuits, from five to ten, more or fewer, according to their extent, form a district, the preachers of which meet annually. Every district has a chairman, who fixes the time of meeting. These assemblies have authority, 1. To examine candidates for the ministry, and probationers, and to try and suspend preachers who are found immoral, erroneous in doctrine, or deficient in abilities. 2. To decide concerning the building of chapels. 3. To examine the demands from the poorer circuits respecting the support of the preachers and of their families, from the public funds. 4. To elect a representative to attend and form a committee to sit previously to the meeting of the Conference, in order to prepare a draught of the stations of all the preachers for the ensuing year. The judgment of this meeting is conclusive until Conference, to which an appeal is allowed in all cases.

The Conference, strictly speaking, consists only of a hundred of the senior preachers, according to the arrangements prescribed in a Deed of Declaration, executed by Mr. Wesley, and enrolled in chancery. But the preachers elected at the preceding district meetings as representatives, the superintendents of the circuits, and such preachers as the districts allow to attend, sit and vote usually as one body. At the Conference, every preacher's character undergoes the strictest scrutiny; and if any charge be proved against him, he is dealt with accordingly. The preachers are also stationed, the proceedings of the subordinate meetings reviewed, and the state of the Connection at large is considered. The Conference is commonly held in London, Leeds, Bristol, Manchester, Liverpool, and Sheffield, in rotation, at the latter end of July.

By the minutes of the last Conference, 1831, it appears that this religious body had three hundred and sixty-three circuits in England, Wales, and Scotland; forty-five in Ireland; and a hundred and fifty-six mission stations, most of them being also circuits, in Sweden, France, the Mediterranean, Continental India, Ceylon, the South Seas, Africa, the West Indies, and British America. The number of members in the societies were, in Great Britain, two hundred and forty-nine thousand one hundred and nineteen; in Ireland, twenty-two thousand four hundred and seventy; in the foreign stations, forty-two thousand seven hundred and forty-three. Their regular preachers were eight hundred and forty-six in Great Britain; in Ireland, a hundred and forty-six; in foreign stations, exclusive of catechists, a hundred and eighty-seven.

[The ecclesiastical system of the Wesleyan Methodists is sometimes represented as essentially Presbyterian: it, however, contains many Episcopal and Congregational elements. It has reached its present form and proportions by a gradual process; and the Conference has not generally adopted the technicalities by which the various officers and functions of government are designated in other Churches. In 1769 the disciplinary regulations of former Conferences were published. In 1789 Mr. Wesley enlarged that collection, and issued a pamphlet containing the substance of all the minutes on discipline published from the first Conference in 1744, entitled, "Minutes of several Conferences between the Rev. John Wesley, A. M., and others." In 1797, Mr. Wesley's code was revised, and all the rules made before his death, whether deemed essential or prudential, together with the regulations passed that year, were signed by the Conference, and published in "The Form of Discipline;" this, with the "Deed of Declaration," constitutes the basis of the Wesleyan code—all subsequent legislation being conformed to the essential principles of these documents. All decisions of the Annual Conference, according to the "Deed," must be confirmed by the legal hundred. A president of Conference must be annually elected. No one can be ordained to the ministry but by the Conference, ordination being now performed by the laying on of the hands of the president and other leading ministers. Candidates for the ministry must, however, be recommended by the annual district meeting. Besides this meeting, which is held in May, a financial district meeting is held in September: a special district meeting is convened in cases in which the local tribunals cannot maintain the discipline of the Church: there are also minor and mixed district meetings. The transactions of all these bodies are reported to the Conference. Besides the quarterly meeting, a local preachers' meeting is held quarterly in every circuit, for the examination of these officers. Trustee meetings are held according to the provisions of their respective trusts. The leaders' meeting is the special meeting for each society in a circuit: it votes on the admission of members when appealed to by any parties concerned; sits as a jury in the trial of members; and confirms or rejects the nominations of its own leaders and stewards. It is composed of the ministers of the circuit, the stewards, poor-stewards, and leaders of the society to which it belongs, the superintendent presiding. Committees composed equally of ministers and laymen manage all the funds of the Connection—as the "Chapel," "Educational," "Auxiliary Worn-out Ministers and Widows," "Contingent" or Home Missionary, etc. This system has been substantially adopted by the affiliated Conferences in Ireland, Canada, France, Australia, and Eastern British America. The presidents of these bodies are annually appointed by the British Conference, the president of the latter always presiding in the Irish Conference. The Wesleyan Methodists are sometimes called the pioneers in the modern missionary movements of the Church—their itinerant ministry being essentially aggressive in its character and design. In 1769, missionaries were sent by Mr. Wesley to America; and after Dr. Coke entered the Connection, he inspired it with no ordinary zeal in the cause of foreign missions. Three years after his death—which took place in 1814, when he was on a missionary voyage to the East Indies—the Wesleyan Missionary Society was organized; and from that time to the present it has proved the most successful agency for the propagation of the gospel in heathen lands which has been put in operation since the primitive ages of Christianity. The report of the year ending December 31, 1855, shows that the revenue of the society for that year was £119,122 4s. 9d. It has 425 central and principal stations called circuits; 3288 chapels and other preaching-places; 588 missionaries; 858 catechists, interpreters, day-school teachers, etc.; 9534 unpaid agents, as Sunday-school teachers, etc.; 113,470 full, and 3695 probationary members; 93,906 scholars in week-day and Sunday-schools; and 8 printing establishments. The Wesleyans have two colleges in England for the training of ministers, two institutions for the education of ministers' sons, a normal training institution for the reception of 100 students and 1000 scholars, two collegiate institutions which are colleges of the London University, and an establishment for the publication of books and periodicals. The Connection has recently passed through a severe ordeal. Attacks having been made on several of the most distinguished members of the Conference, in an anonymous publication called "Fly-Sheets," the Conference, suspecting that some of its own members were the authors, tendered to every one a "Declaration" to sign, reproaching the "Fly-Sheets," and denying all connection with the authorship of them. Several ministers refused to submit to the test, but the Conference, justifying it as scriptural and Methodist, expelled them for contumacy. This stringent measure caused a quasi secession, which in a short time reached a fearful magnitude—the enemies of Methodism not failing, of course, to sympathize with it. By an organized system of agitation, the "Reformers" drew off several hundreds of local preachers, appropriated a number of chapels, and occasioned the withdrawal or expulsion of some one hundred thousand members. They did not, however, form a separate Connection; and since some of the leaders in the movement have abandoned it, many of the disaffected members have resumed their old position. The principles of Wesleyan polity have been thoroughly examined and ably defended; concessions, not affecting the essential features of the system, have been made to those desiring them; special occasions for humiliation and prayer have been appointed by the Conference, and the tide of prosperity seems to have returned. The Minutes for 1856 report 432,164 full members, and 23,032 probationary members; 1692 official ministers; 292 supernumeraries; and 279 ministers on trial, in the British and affiliated Conferences. Those who wish to study the doctrinal system of the Wesleyan Methodists are referred to Wesley's Sermons—the first fifty-three of which, together with Wesley's Notes on the New Testament, are recognized in the "Deed of Declaration"—the Wesleyan Catechisms, and Watson's Theological Institutes. The polity of the Church is exhibited in the "Form of Discipline," Grindrod's "Compendium of the Laws and Regulations of Wesleyan Methodism," and the Annual Minutes of the Conference.]

[METHODISTS, BRYANITE. This body originated with William O'Bryan, who seceded from the Wesleyan Methodists in 1815. Their first Conference was held in 1819. Mr. O'Bryan withdrew from the Connection in 1829. Their ranks have been increased from time to time by accessions of Wesleyan local preachers and others, who wished greater liberty than is allowed in the old Connection. Their Conference of 1853 reported 148 travelling and 1241 local preachers; 15,612 members in Great Britain, Canada, and Australia. They are sometimes called "Bryanites," but they prefer to be known as "Bible Christians." They are purely Wesleyan in their doctrinal system, and substantially so in their polity.]

[METHODISTS, CALVINISTIC. These are divided into three sections. The WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODISTS date their origin about 1737. Howell Harris, of Trevecka, Wales, shocked at the immorality which he witnessed at Oxford, whither he had gone as a divinity student, quit the university and returned to Wales, where he operated as a lay preacher. He formed societies similar to those which Mr. Wesley organized in England; in 1739 he had three hundred of them. He was much persecuted by mobs and magistrates; but after awhile several clergymen came to his aid—among them the Rev. Daniel Rowlands, whose popularity was so great that persons have been known to come one hundred miles to hear him preach on the Sabbaths of his administering the Lord's Supper, and he had two thousand communicants in his own church. In 1742 ten clergymen and forty or fifty lay itinerant preachers were engaged in the movement. The first chapel was built in 1747. Till 1811 they considered themselves members of the Established Church, their own preachers not being allowed by them to administer the ordinances. But at the Conference held that year, twenty-one of them were ordained by their clerical brethren, and they thus became an independent Church. In 1823 they published a Confession of Faith, which is strictly Calvinistic. They have "monthly meetings" of all the preachers and leaders of a county, to superintend the societies within its limits. They have two Quarterly Associations—one in North and the other in South Wales—composed of all the preachers and leaders. The ministers are itinerant: they are selected by the societies and reported to the monthly meetings, which examine them and permit them to commence on trial. The Quarterly Association select a certain number, who have preached at least five years, and ordain them. The preachers are appointed each to a particular county, but generally they make an annual tour through the Principality, preaching twice a day. They have two theological institutions, and Home and Foreign Missions which have an annual revenue of some £3000. The Dyddiadwr Methodistiaidd for 1853 gives the number of ministers 207, preachers 234, communicants 58,577. There are also Welsh Methodists in the United States and other countries.—The "TABERNACLE CONNECTION," formed by Mr. Whitefield on his separation from Mr. Wesley, is so called from the name given to several chapels in London, Bristol, etc. Some of the congregations are large, and are supplied by congregational ministers—their affairs being managed by trustees.—LADY HUNTINGDON'S CONNECTION is superintended by trustees under the will of the Countess. She intended the ministry to be itinerant, but it has assumed a settled Congregational form. No minister, however, can be permanently settled without the approbation of the trustees and an engagement to serve the Connection when required. The English Liturgy is used in some of the chapels. The census of 1851 reports one hundred and nine chapels belonging to the "English Calvinistic Methodists," affording accommodation to thirty-eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven persons, though the average attendance on Census Sunday was but fourteen thousand eight hundred and eighty-one persons. They have a theological college at Cheshunt—it was first established at Trevecka, Wales.—There are in the United States 98 Welsh Calvinistic churches, numbering 81 ministers, 3950 members.]

[METHODISTS, DIALECTIC. Popish doctors of the seventeenth century, deriving their name from the peculiar methods adopted by them in opposing Protestants. One class demanded Protestants to prove their doctrines by explicit texts of Scripture, without allowing them the liberty of illustration or argument. The Jesuit Véron, the two Wallenburgs, and Cardinal Richelieu, were of this class. The other class defended Popery by prescription, and by reference to the wicked lives of Protestant princes who had abjured Popery, to the crime of schism, the variations of Protestantism, and the uniformity of Popery.]

[METHODISTS, GERMAN. Besides numerous Germans in the Methodist Episcopal Church, North and South, there is a sect in the United States known as German Methodists, which originated in 1770, with the Reverend Messrs. Otterbein, Boehm, Geeting, and other German ministers. See BRETHREN, UNITED.—There is also another sect of German Methodists, called the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, which was founded in 1800, by the Reverend Jacob Albright, hence sometimes called "Albrights." They have several Conferences, divided into districts, circuits, stations, and missions, numbering two bishops, 195 travelling and 250 local preachers, and 21,076 members.]

[METHODISTS, PRIMITIVE. This body originated in a secession from the Wesleyan Methodists in 1807, when the Conference passed a resolution adverse to the movements of certain preachers, which were considered irregular. It is said the first class of the Primitive Methodists was organized at Standley, Staffordshire, in 1810, and consisted of ten members. In 1855, they reported 585 travelling and 9981 local preachers, and 105,658 communicants, including the foreign missions. Their doctrinal system is purely Wesleyan, and so is their polity, with the exception of lay-representation in the Conference and some minor matters. They are very zealous, preach frequently in the open air, and from their noisy method of conducting worship are sometimes called RANTERS.]

[METHODISTS, REPUBLICAN. Seceders from the Methodist Episcopal Church, under the leadership of James O'Kelly, in 1792. They were dissatisfied with the episcopal government of the Church. Mr. O'Kelly was a presiding elder in Virginia, and drew off a considerable number from the Church, but the secession did not prosper—scarcely a vestige of it now remains. See O'Kelly's "Apology" and "Vindication," and Sneath's "Reply" to the Apology and "Answer" to the Vindication.]

[METHUSAEL. Father of Lamech. Gen. iv. 18.]

METHUSELAH, the son of Enoch, and father of Lamech. Gen. v. 21. He was born A. M. 687, and died A. M. 1656, being the very year of the deluge, at the age of nine hundred and sixty-nine, the greatest age to which any mortal man ever attained.

[METROPOLITAN. The bishop, or archbishop, who had his seat in the metropolis of a province. The title was adopted at the council of Nice, A. D. 325, though it existed at an earlier date. The metropolitan had a decisive vote in the election of the bishops of his province, and the power of confirming and ordaining them. He summoned provincial councils, presided in them, and drew up the decrees. In extreme cases he could control a provincial bishop without the concurrence of other bishops. He was elected and ordained by the bishops of the province.]

[MICAHA. An idolater of Mount Ephraim. Judg. xvii., xviii.]

MICAH, the sixth in order of the twelve lesser prophets, is supposed to have prophesied about B. C. 750. He was commissioned to denounce the judgments of God against both the kingdoms of Judah and Israel for their idolatry and wickedness. The principal predictions contained in this book are, the invasions of Shalmaneser and Sennacherib; the destruction of Samaria and of Jerusalem, mixed with consolatory promises of the deliverance of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, and of the downfall of the power of their Assyrian and Babylonian oppressors; the cessation of prophecy in consequence of their continued deceitfulness and hypocrisy; and a desolation in a then distant period, still greater than that which was declared to be impending. The birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem is also expressly foretold; and the Jews are directed to look to the establishment and extent of his kingdom as an unfailing source of comfort amidst general distress. The style of Micah is nervous, concise, and elegant; often elevated and poetical, but sometimes obscure from sudden transitions of subject; and the contrast of the neglected duties of justice, mercy, humility, and piety, with the punctilious observance of the ceremonial sacrifices, affords a beautiful example of the harmony which subsists between the Mosaic and Christian dispensations, and shows that the law partook of that spiritual nature which more immediately characterizes the religion of Jesus.

The prophecy of Micah contained in the fifth chapter, is, perhaps, the most important single prophecy in all the Old Testament, and the most comprehensive respecting the personal character of the Messiah and his successive manifestations to the world. It crowns the whole chain of predictions respecting the several limitations of the promised seed: to the line of Shem; to the family of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; to the tribe of Judah, and to the royal house of David, terminating in his birth at Bethlehem, "the city of David." It carefully distinguishes his human nativity from his Divine nature and eternal existence; foretells the casting off of the Israelites and Jews for a season; their ultimate restoration; and the universal peace which should prevail in the kingdom and under the government of the Messiah. This prophecy, therefore, forms the basis of the New Testament revelation, which commences with the birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem, the miraculous circumstances of which are recorded by St. Matthew and St. Luke in the introduction to their respective histories; the eternal subsistence of Christ as "the Word," in the sublime introduction to St. John's Gospel; his prophetic character and second coming, illustrated in the four Gospels and in the apostolic Epistles.

[MICAIAH. A prophet in the time of Ahab. 1 Kings xxii.]

MICHAEL. See ARCHANGEL.

[MICHAIAH. A prince of Judah. 2 Chron. xvii. 7.—Also, a son of Gemariah. Jer. xxxvi. 11–13.]

[MICHAL. Daughter of Saul and wife of David. 1 Sam. xiv. 49; xviii. 17-30; xix. 11-17; xxv. 44; 2 Sam. iii. 18-16; vi. 16-23.]

[MICHMASH. A town of Benjamin, about nine miles north-east of Jerusalem. 1 Sam. xiii. 2; Neh. vii. 31; Isa. x. 28, 29. It was a large village in the days of Jerome. It is now called Mukhmās. It stands on the slope of a valley, supposed to be "the passage of Michmash," near which are two spherical hills, with steep rocky sides, one toward Jeba, and the other toward Mukhmās. 1 Sam. xiii. 28; xiv. 4, 5.]

MIDIAN, LAND OF, a country of the Midianites, derived its name and its inhabitants from Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah. This country extended from the east of the land of Moab, on the east of the Dead Sea, southward, along the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea, stretching some way into Arabia. It farther passed to the south of the land of Edom, into the peninsula of Mount Sinai, where Moses met with the daughter of Jethro, the priest of Midian, whom he married. [Exod. ii. 15; Acts vii. 29.] The Midianites, together with their neighbors, the Ishmaelites, were early engaged in the trade between the east and the west, as we find the party to whom Joseph was sold, carrying spices, the produce of the east, into Egypt, and taking Gilead in their way, to add the celebrated and highly-prized balm of that country to their merchandise. It appears that at the time of the passage of the Israelites through the country of the Amorites, the Midianites had been subdued by that people, as the chiefs or kings of their five principal tribes are called dukes of Sihon, and dwelt in his country. Josh. xiii. 21. It was at this time that the Midianites, alarmed at the numbers and the progress of the Israelites, united with the Moabites in sending into Syria for Balaam the soothsayer, thinking to do that by incantation which they despaired of effecting by force. The result of this measure, the constraint imposed on Balaam to bless instead of to curse, and the subsequent defeat and slaughter of the Midianites, form one of the most interesting narratives in the early history of the Jews. Num. xxii.-xxv., xxxi. About two hundred years after this, the Midianites, having recovered their numbers and their strength, were permitted by God to distress the Israelites for the space of seven years, as a punishment for their relapse into idolatry. But at length their armies, "like grasshoppers for multitude, with camels out of number as sand by the seaside for multitude," which had encamped in the valley of Jezreel, were miraculously defeated by Gideon. Judg. vi.-viii. The Midianites appear not to have survived this second discomfiture as a nation; but their remains became gradually incorporated with the Moabites and Arabians.

MIGDOL. Moses writes, that when the Israelites came out of Egypt, the Lord commanded them to encamp over against Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon. Exod. xiv. 2. It is not known whether this Migdol was a city, or only a fortress; probably the latter, in which a garrison was stationed. [It appears to have been a frontier town of Egypt. Jer. xliv. 1; xlv. 14.]

[MIGRON. A town supposed to have commanded "the passage of Michmash." 1 Sam. xiv. 2; Isa. x. 28.]

MILE, a measure of length, containing a thousand paces. Eight stadia or furlongs make a mile. The Romans commonly measured by miles, and the Greeks by furlongs. The furlong was a hundred and twenty-five paces: the pace was five feet. The ancient Hebrews had neither miles, furlongs, nor feet, but only the cubit, the reed, and the line. The rabbins make a mile to consist of two thousand cubits, and four miles make a parasang. [The Roman foot was rather more than eleven inches and a half; so that the Roman mile was 1618 English yards.]

MILETUS, a city on the continent of Asia Minor, and in the province of Caria, memorable for being the birthplace of Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, of Anaximander and Anaximenes, the philosophers, and of Timotheus, the musician. It was about thirty-six miles south of Ephesus, and the capital of both Caria and Ionia. The Milesians were subdued by the Persians, and the country passed successively into the power of the Greeks and Romans. At present the Turks call it Molas, and it is not far distant from the true Meander, which encircles all the plain with many mazes and innumerable windings. It was to this place that St. Paul called the elders of the church of Ephesus to deliver his last charge to them. Acts xx. 15, etc. There was another Miletus, in Crete, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 20. [This is, however, generally considered the same place as the former, the ruins of which comprise a large theatre and a church.]

MILL. In the first ages they parched or roasted their grain—a practice which the people of Israel, as we learn from the Scriptures, long continued: afterward they pounded it in a mortar, to which Solomon thus alludes: "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." Prov. xxvii. 22. This was succeeded by mills, similar to the handmills formerly used in this country, of which there were two sorts: the first were large, and turned by the strength of horses or asses; the second were smaller and wrought by men, commonly by slaves condemned to this hard labor as a punishment for their crimes. Chardin remarks, in his manuscript, that the persons employed are generally female slaves, who are least regarded, or are least fitted for any thing else; for the work is extremely laborious, and esteemed the lowest employment about the house. Most of their corn is ground by these little mills, although they sometimes make use of large mills, wrought by oxen or camels. Near Ispahan, and some of the other great cities of Persia, he saw water-mills; but he did not meet with a single windmill in the east. Almost every family grind their wheat and barley at home, having two portable millstones for that purpose, of which the uppermost is turned round by a small handle of wood or iron that is placed in the rim. When this stone is large, or expedition is required, a second person is called in to assist; and as it is usual for the women only to be concerned in this employment, who seat themselves over against each other, with the mill-stone between them, we may see the propriety of the expression in the declaration of Moses: "And all the first-born in the land of Egypt shall die, from the first-born of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne, even unto the first-born of the maid-servant that is behind the mill." Exod. xi. 5. The manner in which the hand-mills are worked is well described by Dr. E. D. Clarke, in his Travels: "Scarcely had we reached the apartment prepared for our reception, when, looking from the window into the court-yard belonging to the house, we beheld two women grinding at the mill, in a manner most forcibly illustrating the saying of our Saviour, 'Two women shall be grinding at the mill: the one shall be taken and the other left.' They were preparing flour to make our bread, as is always customary in the country when strangers arrive. The two women, seated upon the ground opposite to each other, held between them two round flat stones, such as are seen in Lapland, and such as in Scotland are called querns. In the centre of the upper stone was a cavity for pouring in the corn, and by the side of this an upright wooden handle for moving the stone. As this operation began, one of the women opposite received it from her companion, who pushed it toward her, who again sent it to her companion; thus communicating a rotatory motion to the upper stone, their left hand being all the while employed in supplying fresh corn, as fast as the bran and flour escaped from the sides of the machine." When they are not impelled, as in this instance, to premature exertions by the arrival of strangers, they grind their corn in the morning at break of day: the noise of the mill is then to be heard everywhere, and is often so great as to rouse the inhabitants of the cities from their slumbers; for it is well known they bake their bread every day, and commonly grind their corn as it is wanted. The noise of the mill-stone is, therefore, with great propriety selected by the prophet as one of the tokens of a populous and thriving country: "Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, the sound of mill-stones, and the light of a candle, and their whole land shall be a desolation." Jer. xxv. 10. The morning shall no more be cheered with the joyful sound of the mill, nor the shadows of evening by the light of a candle; the morning shall be silent, and the evening dark and melancholy, where desolation reigns. "At the earliest dawn of the morning," says Mr. Forbes, "in all the Hindoo towns and villages, the hand-mills are at work, when the menials and widows grind meal for the daily consumption of the family. This work is always performed by women, who resume their task every morning, especially the forlorn Hindoo widows, divested of every ornament, and with their heads shaved, degraded to almost a state of servitude." How affecting, then, is the call to the daughter of Babylon!—"Come down and sit in the dust, O daughter of Babylon; sit on the ground: there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate. Take the mill-stones and grind meal; uncover thy locks, make bare the leg, un-

The custom of daily grinding their corn for the family, shows the propriety of the law: "No man shall take the nether or the upper mill-stone to pledge, for he taketh a man's life to pledge;" because if he take either the upper or the nether mill-stone, he deprives him of his daily provision, which cannot be prepared without them. That complete and perpetual desolation which, by the just allotment of Heaven, is ere long to overtake the mystical Babylon, is clearly signified by the same precept: "The sound of the mill-stone shall be heard no more at all in thee." Rev. xviii. 22. The means of subsistence being entirely destroyed, no human creature shall ever occupy the ruined habitations more. In the book of Judges, the sacred historian alludes, with characteristic accuracy, to several circumstances implied in that custom, where he describes the fall of Abimelech. A woman of Thebez, driven to desperation by his furious attack on the tower, started up from the mill at which she was grinding, seized the upper mill-stone, פלך רכב, and, rushing to the top of the gate, cast it on his head and fractured his skull. This was the feat of a woman, for the mill is worked only by females: it was not a piece of a mill-stone, but the rider, the distinguishing name of the upper mill-stone, which literally rides upon the other, and is a piece or division of the mill. It was a stone of two feet broad, and therefore fully sufficient, when thrown from such a height, to produce the effect mentioned in the narrative. It displays, also, the vindictive contempt which suggested the punishment of Samson, the captive ruler of Israel, that the Philistines, with barbarous contumely, compelled him to perform the meanest service of a female slave: they sent him to grind in the prison, Judges xvi. 21, but not for himself alone; this, although extremely mortifying to the hero, had been more tolerable: they made him grinder for the prison, perhaps while the vilest malefactor was permitted to look on and join in the mockery. Samson, the ruler and avenger of Israel, labors, as Isaiah foretold the virgin daughter of Babylon should labor: "Come down and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon: there is no throne," no seat for thee, "O daughter of the Chaldeans. Take the mill-stones and grind meal," but not with the wonted song: "Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness," there to conceal thy vexation and disgrace. Isaiah xlvii. 1, 2, 5. The females engaged in this operation endeavored to beguile the lingering hours of toilsome exertion with a song. We learn from an expression of Aristophanes, preserved by Athenæus, that the Grecian maidens accompanied the sound of the mill-stones with their voices. This circumstance imparts force to the description of the prophet: the light of a candle was no more to be seen in the evening; the sound of the mill-stones, the indication of plenty, and the song of the grinders, the natural expression of joy and happiness, were no more to be heard at the dawn. The grinding of corn at so early an hour throws light on a passage of considerable obscurity: "And the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, Rechab and Baanah, went, and came about the heat of the day to the house of Ishbosheth, who lay on a bed at noon; and they came thither into the midst of the house, as though they would have fetched wheat; and they smote him under the fifth rib; and Rechab and Baanah his brother escaped." 2 Sam. iv. 5-7. It is still a custom in the east, according to Dr. Perry, to allow their soldiers a certain quantity of corn, with other articles of provisions, together with some pay; and as it was the custom, also, to carry their corn to the mill at break of day, these two captains very naturally went to the palace the day before to fetch wheat, in order to distribute it to the soldiers, that it might be sent to the mill at the accustomed hour in the morning. The princes of the east in those days, as the history of David shows, lounged in their divan, or reposed on their couch, till the cool of the evening began to advance. Rechab and Baanah therefore came in the heat of the day, when they knew that Ishbosheth, their master, would be resting on his bed; and as it was necessary, for the reason just given, to have the corn the day before it was needed, their coming at that time, though it might be a little earlier than usual, created no suspicion, and attracted no notice.

MILLENARIANS are those who believe, according to an ancient tradition in the Church, grounded on some doubtful texts in the book of Revelation and other scriptures, that our Saviour shall reign a thousand years with the faithful upon earth after the first resurrection, before the full completion of final happiness; and their name, taken from the Latin word mille, "a thousand," has a direct allusion to the duration of this spiritual empire, which is styled the millennium. A millennium, or a future paradisiacal state of the earth, is viewed by some as a doctrine not of Christian but of Jewish origin. The tradition which fixes the duration of the world, in its present imperfect state, to six thousand years, and announces the approach of a Sabbath of one thousand years of universal peace and plenty, to be ushered in by the glorious advent of the Messiah, has been traced up to Elias, a rabbinical writer, who flourished about two centuries before the birth of Christ. It certainly obtained among the Chaldeans from the earliest times; and it is countenanced by Barnabas, Irenæus, and other primitive writers, and also by the Jews at the present day. But though the theory may not be very improbable, yet, as it has not the sanction of Scripture to support it, we are not bound to respect it any further than as a doubtful tradition. The Jews understood several passages of the prophets, as Zechariah xiv. 16, etc., of the millennium; in which, according to their carnal apprehensions, the Messiah is to reign on earth, and to bring all nations within the pale, and under subjection to the ordinances, of the Jewish Church.

Justin Martyr, the most ancient of the fathers, was a great supporter of the doctrine of the millennium, or that our Saviour shall reign with the faithful upon earth, after the resurrection, for a thousand years; which he declares was the belief of all orthodox Christians. But this opinion is not generally followed; for though there has been, perhaps, no age of the Church in which this doctrine was not admitted by one or more divines of the first eminence, it yet appears, from the writings of Eusebius, Irenæus, and others among the ancients, as well as from the histories of Dupin, Mosheim, and other moderns, that it was never adopted by the whole Church, nor formed an article in the established creed in any nation. Origen, the most learned of the fathers, and Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria—usually, for his immense erudition, surnamed the Great—both opposed the doctrine that prevailed on the subject in their day; and Dr. Whitby, in his learned treatise on the subject, proves, first, that the millennium was never generally received in the Church of Christ; and, secondly, that there is no just ground to think it was derived from the apostles. On the other hand, Dr. T. Burnet and others maintain that it was very generally admitted till the Nicene Council, in 325, or till the fourth century. The Doctor supposes Dionysius of Alexandria, who wrote against Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, before the middle of the third century, to have been the first that attacked this doctrine; but Origen had previously assailed it in many of his fictitious additions. The truth seems to be, as one well remarks, "that a spiritual reign of Christ was believed by all who carefully examined the Scriptures, though the popular notions of the millennium were often rejected; and ancient as well as modern writers assailed the extravagant superstructure, not the scriptural foundation of the doctrine." During the interregnum in England in the time of Cromwell, there arose a set of enthusiasts sometimes called Millenarians, but more frequently Fifth Monarchy Men, who expected the sudden appearance of Christ, to establish on earth a new monarchy or kingdom. In consequence of this, some of them aimed at the subversion of all human government. In ancient history we read of four great monarchies, the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and the Roman; and these men, believing that this new spiritual kingdom of Christ was to be the fifth, obtained the name by which they were called. They claimed to be the saints of God, and to have the dominion of saints, Dan. vii. 27; expecting that when Christ was come into this kingdom, to begin his reign on earth, they, as his deputies, were to govern all things under him. They went so far as to give up their own Christian names, and assume others from Scripture, like the Manichæans of old.

The opinions of the moderns on this subject may be reduced to two: 1. Some believe that Christ will reign personally on the earth, and that the prophecies of the millennium point to a resurrection of martyrs and other just men, to reign with him a thousand years in a visible kingdom. 2. Others are inclined to believe, that by the reign of Christ and the saints for a thousand years on earth, "nothing more is meant than that, before the general judgment, the Jews shall be converted, genuine Christianity be diffused through all nations, and mankind enjoy that peace and happiness which the faith and precepts of the gospel are calculated to confer on all by whom they are sincerely embraced." The state of the Christian Church, say they, will be, for a thousand years before the general judgment, so pure and so widely extended, that, when compared with the state of the world in the ages preceding, it may, in the language of Scripture, be called a resurrection from the dead. In support of this interpretation, they quote two passages from St. Paul, in which a conversion from Paganism to Christianity, and a reformation of life, is called a "resurrection from the dead." Rom. vi. 13: Eph. v. 14. There is, indeed, an order in the resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 24; but we nowhere observe mention made of a first and second resurrection at the distance of a thousand years from each other; yet, were the millenarian hypothesis well founded, the words should rather have run thus: "Christ, the first-fruits, then the martyrs at his coming, and a thousand years afterward the residue of mankind,—then cometh the end," etc.

Mr. Joseph Mede, Dr. Gill, Bishop Newton, Mr. Winchester, Mr. Eyre, Mr. Kett, and a host of writers recently, are advocates for the first of these opinions, and contend for the personal reign of Christ on earth. "When these great events shall come to pass," says Bishop Newton, "of which we collect from the prophecies this to be the proper order,—the Protestant witnesses shall be greatly exalted, and the twelve hundred and sixty years of their prophesying in sackcloth, and of the tyranny of the beast, shall end together; the conversion and restoration of the Jews succeed; then follows the ruin of the Ottoman empire; and then the total destruction of Rome and of Antichrist; when these great events, I say, shall come to pass, then shall the kingdom of Christ commence, or the reign of saints upon earth. So Daniel expressly informs us that the kingdom of Christ and the saints will be raised upon the ruins of the kingdom of Antichrist. Daniel vii. 26, 27. So likewise St. John saith, that, upon the final destruction of the beast and of the false prophet, 'Satan is bound,' etc. Rev. xx. 2-6. It is, I conceive, to these great events, the fall of Antichrist, the reestablishment of the Jews, and the beginning of the glorious millennium, that the three different dates in Daniel, of twelve hundred and sixty years, twelve hundred and ninety years, and thirteen hundred and thirty-five years, are to be referred. And as Daniel saith, 'Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thirteen hundred and thirty-five years,' Daniel xii. 12; so St. John saith, 'Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection.' Rev. xx. 6. Blessed and happy, indeed, will be this period; and it is very observable, that the martyrs and confessors of Jesus, in Pagan as well as Pagan times, will be raised to partake of this felicity. Then shall all those gracious promises in the Old Testament be fulfilled, of the amplitude and extent of the peace and prosperity, of the glory and happiness of the Church in the latter days. Then, in the full sense of the words, 'shall the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.' Rev. xi. 15. According to tradition, these thousand years of the reign of Christ and the saints will be the seventh millenary of the world; for, as God created the world in six days, and rested on the seventh, so the world, it is argued, will continue six thousand years, and the seventh thousand will be the great sabbatism, or holy rest of the people of God; 'one day being with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.' 2 Pet. iii. 8. According to tradition, too, these thousand years of the reign of Christ and the saints are the great day of judgment, in the morning or beginning whereof shall be the coming of Christ in flaming fire, and the particular judgment of Antichrist, and the first resurrection; and in the evening or conclusion whereof shall be the general resurrection of the dead, small and great; 'and they shall be judged every man according to his works.'"

Such is the representation of the millennium, as given by those who embrace the opinion of Christ's reigning personally on earth during the period of one thousand years. But Dr. Whitby, Mr. Lowman, etc., contend against the literal interpretation of the millennium, both as to its nature and duration. Mr. Faber observes that, "respecting the yet future and mysterious millennium, the less that is said upon the subject the better. Unable myself to form the slightest conception of its specific nature, I shall weary neither my own nor my reader's patience with premature remarks upon it. That it will be a season of great blessedness is certain; further than this we know nothing definitely." The millenarians do not form a sect distinct from others; but their distinguishing tenet, in one view or other, prevails, in a greater or less degree, among most denominations into which the Christian world is divided.

The following observations from Jones's Biblical Cyclopædia are worthy great attention for their sobriety: Some have supposed that the passage, Rev. xx. 4, is to be taken literally, as importing that at that time Jesus Christ will come, in his human nature, from heaven to earth, and set his kingdom up here, reigning visibly and personally, with distinguished glory on earth; that the bodies of the martyrs and of other eminent Christians will then be raised from the dead, in which they shall live and reign with Christ here on earth a thousand years. And some suppose that all the saints, the true friends to God and Christ, who have lived before that time, will then be raised from the dead, and live on earth perfectly holy, during this thousand years. And this they suppose is meant by the first resurrection. Those who agree in general in this notion of the millennium differ with respect to many circumstances, which it is needless to mention here. Others have understood this paragraph of Scripture in a figurative sense: that by this reign of Christ on earth, is not meant his coming from heaven to earth, in his human visible nature; but his taking to himself his power, and utterly overthrowing the kingdom of Satan, and setting up his own kingdom throughout the world, which, before this, had been confined to very narrow bounds; subduing all hearts to a willing subjection, and thus reigning generally over the men who shall then be in the world, and live in that thousand years. And by 'the souls of them which were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands," living again and reigning with Christ a thousand years, they suppose is not meant a literal resurrection, or the resurrection of their bodies, which is not asserted here, as there is nothing said of their bodies, or of their being raised to life, but that they shall live again, and reign with Christ, in the revival, prosperity, reign, and triumph of that cause and interest in which they lived, and for the promotion of which they died; and in whose death the cause seemed to languish and become extinct. Thus they shall live again in their successors, who shall arise and stand up with the same spirit, and in the same cause, in which they lived and died, agreeable to ancient prophecies: "The meek shall inherit the earth." "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High; whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve him." And they suppose that this revival of the cause of Christ, by the numerous inhabitants of the earth rising up to a new and holy life, is that which is here called the first resurrection, in distinction from the second, which will consist in the resurrection of the body; whereas this is a spiritual resurrection—a resurrection of the cause of Christ, which had been, in a great degree, dead and lost—a resurrection of the souls of men, by the renovation of the Holy Spirit. That this important passage of Scripture is to be understood in the figurative sense, last mentioned, is probable, and the following considerations are thought sufficient to support it:

1. Most if not all the prophecies in this book are delivered in figurative language, referring to types and events recorded in the Old Testament; and in imitation of the language of the ancient prophets. And this was proper, and even necessary, in the best manner to answer the ends of prophecy, as might easily be shown were it necessary. The first part of this passage, all must allow, is figurative. Satan cannot be bound with a literal, material chain. The key, the great chain, and the seal, cannot be understood literally. The whole is a figure, and can mean no more than that, when the time of the millennium arrives, or rather previous to it, Jesus Christ will lay effectual restraints on Satan, so that his powerful and prevailing influence, by which he had before deceived and destroyed a great part of mankind, shall be wholly taken from him for a thousand years. And it is most natural to understand the other part of the description of this remarkable event to be represented in the same figurative language, as the whole is a representation of one scene; especially, since no reason can be given why it should not be so understood.

2. To suppose that Christ shall come in his human nature to this earth, and live here in his whole person, visible a thousand years before the day of judgment, appears to be contrary to several passages of Scripture. The coming of Christ, and his appearing at the day of judgment in his human nature, is said to be his second appearance, answering to his first appearance, in his human nature, on earth, from his birth to his ascension into heaven, which was past. "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them who look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation." Heb. ix. 27, 28. The appearance here spoken of is the appearance of Christ at the day of judgment, to complete the salvation of his Church. This could not be his appearing the second time, were he thus to appear, and to be bodily present in his human nature on earth, in the time of the millennium, which is to take place before the day of judgment. The coming of Christ does not always intend his coming visibly in his human nature; but he is said to come, when he destroyed the temple and nation of the Jews, and appeared in favor of his Church. So his destruction of heathen Rome, and delivering his Church from that persecuting power, was an instance of his coming. And he will, in the same way, come to destroy Antichrist, and the kingdom of Satan in the world, and introduce the millennium; and in these instances, and others, he may be said to appear. But his coming to judgment, and appearing to complete the final destruction of all his enemies, and to perfect the salvation of his Church, is his last coming and appearance. But if he were here on earth, visible in his human nature, and reigning in his glorified body, during the millennium, he would be already here to attend the last judgment, and he could not be properly said to come from heaven, and to be revealed from heaven, because this was done a thousand years before. Besides, that Christ should come from heaven, and appear and reign in his human nature and presence before the day of judgment, seems to be contrary to the following scriptures: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first." "When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God," etc. "When he shall come to be glorified in his saints." 1 Thess. iv. 16: 2 Thess. i. 7, 8, 10. This is evidently his appearing the second time, for the salvation of all them that look for him; but were he on earth before this, in the human nature, during the time of the millennium, how could he be said to be revealed, to descend and come from heaven to judge the world?

3. There is nothing expressly said of the resurrection of the body in this passage. The Apostle John saw the souls of them which were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, etc., and they lived and reigned with Christ. The resurrection of the body is nowhere expressed in Scripture by the soul's living. And as there is nothing said of the body, and he only saw their souls to live, this does not appear to be a proper expression to denote the resurrection of the body, and their living in that. As this, therefore, does not seem to be the natural meaning of the words, and certainly is not the necessary meaning, we are warranted to look for another meaning, and to acquiesce in it, if one can be found which is more easy and natural, and more agreeable to the whole passage, and to the Scripture in general. Therefore,

4. The most easy and probable meaning is, that the souls of the martyrs, and all the faithful followers of Christ, who have lived in the world, and have died before the millennium shall commence, shall revive and live again in their successors, who shall rise up in the same spirit, and in the same character, in which they lived and died; and in the revival and flourishing of that cause which they espoused, and spent their lives in promoting. This is, therefore, a spiritual resurrection, denoting that all Christ's people shall appear in the spirit and power of those martyrs and holy men who had before lived in the world, and who shall live again in these their successors, and in the revival of their cause, or in the resurrection of the Church from the very low state in which it had been before the millennium, to a state of great prosperity and glory. This is agreeable to the way of representing things in Scripture in other instances. John the Baptist was Elijah, because he rose in the spirit of Elijah, and promoted the same cause in which Elijah lived and died; and Elijah revived and lived in John the Baptist, because he went before Christ, in the spirit and power of Elijah. Luke i. 17. Therefore, Christ says of John, "This is Elijah who was to come." Matt. xi. 14.

With regard to the nature of the millennial state, or the blessings which shall be more particularly enjoyed during that period, the following things seem to be marked out in prophecy:

1. It is expressly said of those who shall partake of this first resurrection, that they shall be "blessed and holy;" by which the inspired writer seems to denote that it will be a time of eminent holiness. This will constitute the peculiar glory and the source of the happiness of the millennium state. Zech. xiv. 20, 21. And that such will be the case, we may infer, also, from the consideration that,

2. There is reason to expect a remarkable effusion of the Spirit about the commencement of this happy period, even as there was at the first setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world. Besides the promises of the Spirit, which were accomplished in the apostolic age, there are others which from the connection appear to refer to the time we are now speaking of. Thus Isaiah, after having described Christ's kingdom which was set up at his first coming, and then the succeeding desolate state of the Jews, represents this as continuing "until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high, and the wilderness be a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be counted for a forest." Isa. xxxii. 15-19. The Apostle Paul, speaking of the conversion of the Jews at this period, refers to a passage in Isaiah where a promise of the Spirit is made to them: "As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord: My Spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever." Isa. lix. 20, 21: Rom. xi. 26, 27. The Lord having mentioned the forlorn dispersed state of Israel throughout the nations, among whom they had profaned his name, promises to gather them, cleanse them, and give them a new heart and spirit, and adds, "And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes; and ye shall keep my judgments and do them." Ezek. xxxvi. 27; xxxix. 28, 29. The promise of pouring upon them the Spirit of grace and supplication has also a view to this period. Zech. xii. 10. Though we are not to expect the miraculous gifts of the apostolic age, yet the work of the Spirit will abundantly appear in qualifying men for propagating the gospel throughout the world, filling them with light, zeal, courage, and activity in that work; in giving success and effect to the gospel by converting multitudes to the faith, quickening the dead in trespasses and sins, and translating them into the kingdom of Christ; and in enlightening, quickening, purifying, and comforting the children of God, stirring them up to greater liveliness, love, zeal, activity, and fruitfulness in his service.

3. A universal spread of the gospel, diffusing the knowledge of the Lord throughout the world in a more extensive and effectual manner than ever it was before. This is repeatedly promised: "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea;" and this shall take place in that day when the Gentiles shall seek to the branch of the root of Jesse, whose rest shall be glorious, and when "the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, and shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah, from the four corners of the earth." Isaiah xi. 9-12. The same promise of the universal knowledge of the glory of the Lord is repeated in the prophecy of Habakkuk, ii. 14. This will be attended with corresponding effects: "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him," Psalm xxii. 27; yea, all kings shall fall down before him, "all nations shall serve him." Psalm lxxii. 11. And though we may not imagine that all the inhabitants of the globe will have the true and saving knowledge of the Lord, yet we may expect such a universal spread of light and religious knowledge as shall root up Pagan, Mohammedan, and anti-Christian delusions, and produce many good effects upon those who are not really regenerated, by awing their minds, taming their ferocity, improving their morals, and making them peaceable and humane.

4. The Jews will then be converted to the faith of the Messiah, and partake with the Gentiles of the blessings of his kingdom. The Apostle Paul, in the eleventh chapter of his Epistle to the Romans, treats of this at large, and confirms it from the prophecies of the Old Testament. He is speaking of Israel in a literal sense, the natural posterity of Abraham; for he distinguishes them both from the believing Gentiles and the Jewish converts of his time, and describes them as the rest who were blinded, had stumbled and fallen, and so had not obtained, but were broken off and cast away. Rom. xi. 7, 11, 12, 15, 17. Yet he denies that they have stumbled that they should fall, that is, irrecoverably, so as in no future period to be restored; but shows that God's design in permitting this was, that through their fall salvation might come unto the Gentiles, and that this again might provoke them to jealousy or emulation: verse 11. He argues that if their fall and diminishing was the riches of the Gentiles, and the casting away of them was the reconciling of the world, their fulness will be much more so, and the receiving of them be life from the dead: verses 12, 15. He further argues, that if the Gentiles "were grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree, how much more shall these which be the natural branches be grafted into their own olive tree?" verse 24. Nor did he consider this event as merely probable, but as absolutely certain; for he shows that the present blindness and future conversion of that people is the mystery or hidden sense of prophecies concerning them; and he cites two of these prophecies where the context foretells both their rejection and recovery. Isaiah lix. 20, 21; xxvii. 9.

5. The purity of visible Church communion, worship, and discipline, will then be restored according to the primitive apostolic pattern. During the reign of Antichrist a corrupted form of Christianity was drawn over the nations, and established in the political constitutions of the kingdoms which were subject to that monstrous power. By this means the children of God were either mixed in visible religious communion with the profane world, in direct opposition to the word of God, or persecuted for their nonconformity. In reference to this state of things, the angel commands St. John to leave out the court which is without the temple, and not to measure it, for this reason, because "it is given to the Gentiles; and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months," Rev. xi. 2; that is, they shall pollute and profane the worship and communion of the Church during the one thousand two hundred and sixty years of Antichrist's reign, so that it cannot be measured by the rule of God's word. But when the period we are speaking of shall arrive, the sanctuary shall be cleansed, Dan. viii. 14: the visible communion, worship, order, and discipline of the house of God will then be restored to their primitive purity, and accord with the rule of the New Testament. So it is promised to Zion, "Henceforth there shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean." Isaiah lii. 1. "They people shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land for ever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hand, that I may be glorified." Isaiah lx. 21. "And in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts." Zech. xiv. 21.

6. The Lord's special presence and residence will then be in the midst of his people. Christ hath promised to be with his people in every period of the Church, even unto the end of the world, Matt. xxviii. 20, and that he will be in the midst even of two or three of them when gathered together in his name. Matt. xviii. 20.

He also calls them to purity of communion and personal holiness, and promiseth to dwell in them and walk in them, 2 Cor. vi. 16, 17; but this will be fulfilled in an eminent and remarkable manner during the millennial period. The Lord, having promised to raise Israel out of their graves, to gather them from among the heathen, and bring them into the Church and kingdom of Christ, as one fold having one shepherd, adds, "And I will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore; my tabernacle also shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people." Ezek. xxxvii. 11-27. This alludes to his dwelling among Israel in the tabernacle and sanctuary of old, Lev. xxvi. 11, 12; and imports his manifesting himself unto them, admitting them into the most intimate correspondence and communion with himself in his ordinances, communicating light, life, and consolation to them by his Spirit, and also his protection and care of them as his peculiar people. It is intimated that there will be such visible tokens of the Divine presence and residence among them as will fall under the notice of the world, and produce conviction and awe, as was in some measure the case in the first Churches, Acts ii. 47; v. 11, 13: 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25; for it is added, "And the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore." Ezek. xxxvii. 28. Indeed, this is that very promise which is represented to St. John as accomplished: "And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." Rev. xxi. 3.

7. This will be a time of universal peace, tranquillity, and safety. Persons naturally of the most savage, ferocious, and cruel disposition, will then be tame and harmless: so it is promised, Isaiah xi. 6-10. Whether we consider the persons represented by these hurtful animals to be converted or not, it is certain they will then be effectually restrained from doing harm, or persecuting the saints. There shall be no war nor bloodshed among the nations during this happy period; for we are told that in the last days, when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it, the Lord "shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Isaiah ii. 4. The same promise is repeated word for word in the prophecies of Micah, iv. 3. Much to the same purpose is that promise in Hosea ii. 18. Though war has hitherto deluged the world with human blood, and been a source of complicated calamities to mankind, yet, when Satan is bound, his influence upon wicked men restrained, and the saints bear rule, it must necessarily cease.

8. The civil rulers and judges shall then be all maintainers of peace and righteousness. Though

Christ will put down all that rule, power, and authority which opposeth the peace and prosperity of his kingdom; yet as rulers are the ordinance of God, and his ministers for good—as some form of government seems absolutely necessary to the order and happiness of society in this world—it is thought that when the kingdoms of this world are become our Lord's and his Christ's, the promise will be accomplished, "I will also make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness;" and in consequence of this, "violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls salvation, and thy gates praise." Isaiah lx. 17, 18. Peace and righteousness are the two great ends of government: Christ himself is King of righteousness, and King of peace, and the civil rulers during that happy period will resemble him in their character and administration; for then shall that promise be fulfilled: "In righteousness shalt thou be established: thou shalt be far from oppression; for thou shalt not fear; and from terror, for it shall not come near thee." Isaiah liv. 14.

9. The saints shall then have the dominion, and the wicked shall be in subjection. This is clear from the united voice of prophecy: "The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." Dan. vii. 27. "The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever." Dan. vii. 18. "The meek shall inherit the earth;" Matt. v. 5; "shall reign on the earth;" Rev. v. 10; shall reign "with Christ a thousand years," Rev. xx. 4; "they shall be priests of God, and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." Rev. xx. 6. The saints are at present made kings and priests unto God, a kingly priesthood, 1 Peter ii. 9; but then they shall be more eminently so, when, by the holiness of their lives, the purity of their faith and worship, and their diligence in promoting pure and undefiled religion, the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord. Then shall that promise be fully accomplished, "Ye shall be named the priests of the Lord; men shall call you the ministers of our God." Isaiah lxi. 6. With regard to the nature of their reign, it will undoubtedly correspond in all respects with the spiritual and heavenly nature of Christ's kingdom, to the promotion of which all their power will be subservient. Those who cannot conceive of any reign upon earth but such as consists in lordly and oppressive dominion, maintained by policy and force, and made subservient to the purposes of pride, ambition, avarice, and other worldly lusts, can have no idea at all of this reign of the saints with Christ, which is a reign of peace on earth and good will to men; a reign of truth and righteousness, of true godliness and universal humanity. In short, it is the prevalence and triumph of the cause of Christ in this world over that of Satan and all his instruments. How delightful, then, the prospects which open upon the eye of faith in the prophetic vision! Christianity prevails universally, and the consequences are most blissful. Our race assumes the appearance of one vast virtuous and peaceful family: our world becomes the seat of one grand triumphant adoring assembly. At length the scene mingles with the heavens, and, rising in brightness, is blended with the glories on high. The mysteries of God on earth are finished, the times of the regeneration are fulfilled. The Son of God descends. The scene closes with divine grandeur: "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of many thunders, saying, Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ. And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God."

MILLET, מילת, Ezek. iv. 9, a kind of plant, so called from its thrusting forth such a quantity of grains. Thus, in Latin it is called millium, as if one stalk bore a thousand seeds. It has been supposed that the dochan means what is now called in the east durra; which, according to Niebuhr, is a sort of millet, and when made into bad bread with camel's milk, oil, butter, or grease, is almost the only food which is eaten by the common people in Arabia Felix. "I found it so disagreeable," says he, "that I should willingly have preferred plain barley bread to it." This illustrates the appointment of it to the prophet Ezekiel as a part of his hard fare. Durra is also used in Palestine and Syria, and it is generally agreed that it yields much more than any other kind of grain. Hiller and Celsius insist that the dochan is the panic; but Forskal has expressly mentioned the dokn, holcus dochna, as a kind of maize, of considerable use in food; and Brown, in his Travels, describes the mode of cultivating it.

MILLO, a part or suburb of Jerusalem. "David built round about from Millo and inward," 2 Sam. v. 9; that is, he built round about from the place where Millo was afterward erected by Solomon, or where, more probably, the senate house, or Millo of the Jebusites, had stood, which was pulled down to make room for the more sumptuous edifice of Solomon, to his own house; so that David built from Mount Zion quite round to the opposite point. Hence the residence of David, even in the reign of that renowned monarch, began to assume the size and splendor of a city. [1 Kings ix. 15, 24; xi. 27.—MILLO in Judg. ix. 6, 20, is supposed to be the same as the tower of Shechem, verses 46, 49; though some think it is the name of a person.]

century, by Francis di Paola. They wore, night and day, a black woollen habit and girdle, tied in five knots. They live a quadragesimal life, abstaining from flesh, butter, eggs, and cheese all the time, except in cases of great sickness. The order is divided into thirty-one provinces—twelve in Italy, eleven in France and Flanders, seven in Spain, and one in Germany.]

MINISTER, one who attends or waits on another; so we find Elisha was the minister of Elijah, and did him services of various kinds, 2 Kings iii. 11. So Joshua was the servant of Moses, Exod. xxiv. 18; xxxiii. 11. And these persons did not by any means feel themselves degraded by their stations; but in due time they succeeded to the offices of their masters. In like manner John Mark was minister to Paul and Barnabas. Acts xiii. 6. Christ is called a minister of the true, that is, the heavenly sanctuary. The minister of the synagogue was appointed to keep the book of the law, to observe that those who read it, read it correctly, etc. Luke iv. 20. The rabbins say, he was the same as the angel of the church, or overseer. Lightfoot says, Baal Aruch expounds the chazan, or minister of the congregation, by sheliach hatzibbor, or angel of the congregation; and from this common platform and constitution of the synagogue, we may observe the apostle's expression of some elders ruling and laboring in word and doctrine, others in the general affairs of the synagogue. Ministers were servants, yet servants not menial but honorable; those who explain the word, and conduct the service of God; those who dispense the laws and promote the welfare of the community: the holy angels who, in obedience to the Divine commands, protect, preserve, succor, and benefit the godly, are all ministers, beneficial ministers, to those who are under their charge. Heb. viii. 2: Exod. xxx. 10: Lev. xvi. 15: 1 Cor. iv. 1: Rom. xiii. 6: Psalm civ. 4.

[MINISTRATION, MINISTRY. Λειτουργία. A public religious service, Luke i. 23: Heb. viii. 6; ix. 21. This word, in reference to works of charity, is rendered "service," 2 Cor. ix. 12: Phil. ii. 30. Διακονία, office or function, as of proclaiming the law and the gospel; 2 Cor. iii. 7-9; v. 18: Eph. iv. 12. Distribution of alms, Acts vi. 1: 2 Cor. ix. 1, 12, 13. Any ordinary service: Luke x. 40.]

[MINNI. A province of Armenia, in Mount Taurus. It is supposed that the name Armenia is derived from Minni. Jer. li. 27.]

[MINNITH. A town four miles north of Heshbon. Judg. xi. 23: Ezek. xxvii. 17.]

[MINSTRELS. Matt. ix. 23. Those who played on pipes at funerals, leading the dirges of the vocalists. Maimonides says that a poor man, when his wife died, had not less than two pipers and one mourning woman. The rich employed a great number. Compare 2 Chron. xxxv. 25.]

MINT, Matt. xxiii. 23; Luke xi. 42; a garden herb well known. The law did not oblige the Jews to give the tithe of this sort of herbs; it only required it of those things which could be comprehended under the name of income or revenue. But the Pharisees, desirous of distinguishing themselves by a more scrupulous and literal observance of the law than others, gave the tithes

"of mint, anise, and cummin." Matt. xxiii. 23. Christ reproved them because that, while they were so precise in these lesser matters, they neglected the more essential commandments of the law, and substituted observances, frivolous and insignificant, in the place of justice, mercy, and truth.

MIRACLES. A miracle, in the popular sense, is a prodigy, or an extraordinary event, which surprises us by its novelty. In a more accurate and philosophic sense, a miracle is an effect which does not follow from any of the regular laws of nature, or which is inconsistent with some known law of it, or contrary to the settled constitution and course of things. Accordingly, all miracles presuppose an established system of nature, within the limits of which they operate, and with the order of which they disagree. Of a miracle in the theological sense, many definitions have been given. That of Dr. Samuel Clarke is: "A miracle is a work effected in a manner unusual, or different from the common and regular method of providence, by the interposition of God himself, or of some intelligent agent superior to man, for the proof or evidence of some particular doctrine, or in attestation of the authority of some particular person." Mr. Hume has insidiously or erroneously maintained that a miracle is contrary to experience; but in reality it is only different from experience. Experience informs us that one event has happened often: testimony informs us that another event has happened once or more. That diseases should be generally cured by the application of external causes, and sometimes at the mere word of a prophet, and without the visible application of causes, are facts not inconsistent with each other in the nature of things themselves, nor irreconcilable according to our ideas. Each fact may arise from its own proper cause; each may exist independently of the other; and each is known by its own proper proof, whether of sense or testimony. As secret causes often produce events contrary to those we do expect from experience, it is equally conceivable that events should sometimes be produced which we do not expect. To pronounce, therefore, a miracle to be false, because it is different from experience, is only to conclude against its general existence from the very circumstance which constitutes its particular nature; for if it were not different from experience, where would be its singularity? or what particular proof could be drawn from it, if it happened according to the ordinary train of human events, or was included in the operation of the general laws of nature? We grant that it does differ from experience; but we do not presume to make our experience the standard of the Divine conduct. He that acknowledges a God must, at least, admit the possibility of a miracle. The atheist, that makes him inseparable from what is called nature, and binds him to its laws by an insurmountable necessity; that deprives him of will, and wisdom, and power as a distinct and independent Being, may deny even the very possibility of a miraculous interposition which can in any instance suspend or counteract those general laws by which the world is governed. But he who allows of a First Cause in itself perfect and intelligent, abstractedly from those effects which his wisdom and power have produced, must at the same time allow that this Cause can be under no such restraints as to be debarred the liberty of controlling its laws as often as it sees fit. Surely the Being that made the world can govern it, or any part of it, in such a manner as he pleases; and he that constituted the very laws by which it is in general conducted, may suspend the operation of those laws in any given instance, or impress new powers on matter, in order to produce new and extraordinary effects.

In judging of miracles, there are certain criteria peculiar to the subject, sufficient to conduct our inquiries, and warrant our determination. Assuredly they do not appeal to our ignorance, for they presuppose not only the existence of a general order of things, but our actual knowledge of the appearance which that order exhibits, and of the secondary material causes from which it, in most cases, proceeds. If a miraculous event were effected by the immediate hand of God, and yet bore no mark of distinction from the ordinary effects of his agency, it would impress no conviction, and probably awaken no attention. Our knowledge of the ordinary course of things, though limited, is real; and therefore it is essential to a miracle both that it differ from that course, and be accompanied with peculiar and unequivocal signs of such difference. We have been told that the course of nature is fixed and unalterable, and therefore it is not consistent with the immutability of God to perform miracles. But, surely, they who reason in this manner beg the point in question. We have no right to assume that the Deity has ordained such general laws as will exclude his interposition; and we cannot suppose that he would forbear to interfere where any important end could be answered. This interposition, though it controls, in particular cases, the energy, does not diminish the utility of those laws. It leaves them to fulfil their own proper purposes, and affects only a distinct purpose, for which they were not calculated. If the course of nature implies the general laws of matter and motion, into which the most opposite phenomena may be resolved, it is certain that we do not know them in their full extent; and, therefore, that events which are related by judicious and disinterested persons, and at the same time imply no gross contradiction, are possible in themselves, and capable of a certain degree of proof. If the course of nature implies the whole order of events which God has ordained for the government of the world, it includes both his ordinary and extraordinary dispensations, and among them miracles may have their place, as a part of the universal plan. It is, indeed, consistent with sound philosophy, and not inconsistent with pure religion, to acknowledge that they might be disposed by the Supreme Being at the same time with the more ordinary effects of his power; that their causes and occasions might be arranged with the same regularity; and that, in reference chiefly to their concomitant circumstances of persons and times, to the specific ends for which they were employed, and to our idea of the immediate necessity there is for a Divine agent, miracles would differ from common events, in which the hand of God acts as efficaciously, though less visibly. On this consideration of the subject, miracles, instead of contradicting nature, might form a part of it. But what our limited reason and scanty experience may comprehend, should never be represented as a full and exact view of the possible or actual varieties which exist in the works of God.

2. If we be asked whether miracles are credible, we reply that, abstractedly considered, they are not incredible; that they are capable of indirect proof from analogy, and of direct from testimony; that in the common and daily course of worldly affairs, events, the improbability of which, antecedently to all testimony, was very great, are proved to have happened, by the authority of competent and honest witnesses; that the Christian miracles were objects of real and proper experience to those who saw them; and that whatsoever the senses of mankind can perceive, their report may substantiate. Should it be asked whether miracles were necessary, and whether the end proposed to be effected by them could warrant so immediate and extraordinary an interference of the Almighty as such extraordinary operations suppose; to this we might answer, that, if the fact be established, all reasonings à priori concerning their necessity must be frivolous and may be false. We are not capable of deciding on a question which, however simple in appearance, is yet too complex in its parts, and too extensive in its object, to be fully comprehended by the human understanding. Whether God could or could not have effected all the ends designed to be promoted by the gospel, without deviating from the common course of his providence, and interfering with its general laws, is a speculation that a modest inquirer would carefully avoid; for it carries on the very face of it a degree of presumption totally unbecoming the state of a mortal being. Infinitely safer is it for us to acquiesce in what the Almighty has done, than to embarrass our minds with speculations about what he might have done. Inquiries of this kind are generally inconclusive, and always useless. They rest on no solid principles, are conducted by no fixed rules, and lead to no clear conviction. They begin from curiosity or vanity, they are prosecuted amidst ignorance and error, and they frequently terminate in impious presumption or universal skepticism. God is the best and indeed the only judge how far miracles are proper to promote any particular design of his providence, and how far that design would have been left unaccomplished, if common and ordinary methods only had been pursued. So, from the absence of miracles, we may conclude, in any supposed case, that they were not necessary; from their existence, supported by fair testimony, in any given case, we may infer with confidence that they are proper. A view of the state of the world in general, and of the Jewish nation in particular, and an examination of the nature and tendency of the Christian religion, will point out very clearly the great expediency of a miraculous interposition; and when we reflect on the gracious and important ends that were to be effected by it, we shall be convinced that it was not an idle and useless display of Divine power; but that while the means effected and confirmed the end, the end fully justified and illustrated the means. If we reflect on the almost irresistible force of prejudice, and the strong opposition it universally made to the establishment of a new religion on the demolition of rites and ceremonies which authority had made sacred and custom had familiarized; if we reflect on the extent and importance as well as the singularity of the Christian plan; what was its avowed purpose to effect, and what difficulties it was necessarily called to struggle with before that purpose could be effected; how much it was opposed by the opinions and the practice of the generality of mankind, by philosophy, by superstition, by corrupt passions and inveterate habits, by pride and sensuality, in short, by every engine of human influence, whether formed by craft, or aided by power;—if we seriously reflect on these things, and give them their due force, (and experience shows us that we can scarcely give them too much,) we shall be induced to admit even the necessity of a miraculous interposition at a time when common means must inevitably, in our apprehensions, have failed of success.

The revelation of the Divine will by inspired persons is, as such, miraculous; and therefore, before the adversaries of the gospel can employ with propriety their objections to the particular miracles on which its credibility is based, they should show the impossibility of any revelation. In whatever age the revelation is given, succeeding ages can know it only from testimony; and if they admit, on the report of their fellow-creatures, that God had inspired any being with the preternatural knowledge of his will, why should they deny that he had enabled the same being to heal the sick, or to cleanse the leprosy? How, may it be asked, should the Divine Teacher give a more direct and consistent proof of his preternatural commission, than by displaying those signs and wonders which mark the finger of God? That the apostles could not be deceived, and that they had no temptation to deceive, has been repeatedly demonstrated. So powerful, indeed, is the proof adduced in support of their testimony, that the infidels of these later days have been obliged to abandon the ground on which their predecessors stood: to disclaim all moral evidences arising from the character and relation of eye-witnesses; and to maintain, upon metaphysical rather than historical principles, that miracles are utterly incapable, in their own nature, of existing in any circumstances, or of being supported by any evidence.

Miracles may be classed under two heads: those which consist in a train or combination of events, which distinguish themselves from the ordinary arrangements of Providence; and those particular operations which are performed by instruments and agents incompetent to effect them without a preternatural power. In the conduct of Providence respecting the Jewish people, from the earliest periods of their existence as a distinct class of society to the present time, we behold a singularity of circumstance and procedure which we cannot account for on common principles. Comparing their condition and situation with that of other nations, we can meet with nothing similar to it in the history of mankind. So remarkable a difference, conspicuous in every revolution of their history, could not have subsisted through mere accident. There must have been a cause adequate to so extraordinary an effect. Now, what should this cause be, but an interposition of Providence in a manner different from the course of its general government? For the phenomenon cannot be explained by an application of those general causes and effects that operate in other cases. The original propagation of Christianity was likewise an event which clearly discovered a miraculous interposition. The circumstances which attended it were such as cannot rationally be accounted for on any other postulatam. (See the article CHRISTIANITY.) It may now be observed, that the institutions of the law and the gospel may not only appeal for their confirmation to a train of events which, taken in a general and combined view, point out an extraordinary designation, and vindicate their claim to a Divine authority, but also to a number of particular operations which, considered distinctly, or in a separate and detached light, evidently display a supernatural power, immediately exerted on the occasion.

Since Christ himself constantly appealed to these works as the evidences of his Divine mission and character, we may briefly examine how far they justified and confirmed his pretensions. That our Lord laid the greatest stress on the evidence they afforded—nay, that he considered that evidence as sufficient to authenticate his claims to the office of the Messiah with all reasonable and well-disposed inquirers, is manifest not only from his own words, John x. 25, but also from a great variety of other passages in the evangelists. Thus, when the disciples of John were sent to Christ, to receive from his own lips the most satisfactory proofs of his Divine mission, he referred them to his miracles. "Go," said he, "and show to John again those things which ye hear and see: the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up." Matt. xi. 4, 5. Again: "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not; but if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works." John x. 37. This appeal to miracles was founded on the following just and obvious grounds:

First: That they are visible proofs of Divine approbation, as well as of Divine power; for it would have been quite inconclusive to rest an appeal on the testimony of the latter, if it had not at the same time included an evidence of the former; and it was, indeed, a natural inference, that working of miracles in defence of a particular cause, was the seal of Heaven to the truth of that cause. To suppose the contrary, would be to suppose that God not only permitted his creatures to be deceived, but that he deviated from the ordinary course of his providence purposely with a view to deceive them. The conclusion which the man whom our Saviour restored to sight drew from this miracle was exceedingly just, and founded on the common sentiments and impressions of the human heart. "We know," says he, "that God heareth not sinners; but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth. Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. If this man were not of God, he could do nothing." John ix. 31-33. If the cause which our Saviour was engaged in had not been approved of by God, it would not have been honored with the seal of miracles; for the Divine power can never be supposed to counteract the Divine will. This would be to set his nature at variance with itself; and, by destroying his simplicity, would destroy his happiness, and terminate in confusion and misery. Hence we may justly reject, as incredible, those miracles which have been ascribed to the interposition of wicked spirits. The possibility of their interference is a mere hypothesis, depending upon gratuitous assumption, and leading to very dangerous consequences; and the particular instances in which credulous superstition, or perverted philosophy, has supposed them to interfere, are, as facts, destitute of any clear and solid evidence; or, as effects, often resolvable into natural causes.

Secondly: When our Lord appealed to his miracles, as proofs of his Divine mission, it presupposed that those miracles were of such a nature as would bear the strictest examination; that they had all those criteria which could possibly distinguish them from the delusions of enthusiasm and the artifices of imposture; else the appeal would have been fallacious and equivocal. He appealed to them with all the confidence of an upright mind totally possessed with a consciousness of their truth and reality. This appeal was not drawn out into any labored argument, nor adorned by any of the embellishments of language. It was short, simple, and decisive. He neither reasoned nor declaimed on their nature or their design: he barely pointed to them as plain and indubitable facts, such as spoke their own meaning, and carried with them their own authority. The miracles which our Lord performed were too public to be suspected of imposture; and, being objects of sense, they were secured against the charge of enthusiasm. An impostor would not have acted so absurdly as to have risked his credit on the performance of what he must have known it was not in his power to effect; and though an enthusiast, from the warmth of imagination, might have flattered himself with a full persuasion of his being able to perform some miraculous work, yet, when the trial was referred to an object of sense, the event must soon have exposed the delusion. The impostor would not have dared to say to the blind, Receive thy sight; to the deaf, Hear; to the dumb, Speak; to the dead, Arise; to the raging of the sea, Be still, lest he should injure the credit of his cause by undertaking more than he could perform; and though the enthusiast, under the delusion of his passions, might have confidently commanded disease to fly, and the powers of nature to be subject to his control, yet their obedience would not have followed his command.

The miracles of Christ, then, were such as an impostor would not have attempted, and such as an enthusiast could not have effected. They had no disguise; and were in a variety of instances of such a nature as to preclude the very possibility of collusion. They were performed in the midst of his bitterest enemies; and were so palpable and certain, as to extort the following acknowledgment even from persons who were most eager to oppose his doctrines and to discredit his pretensions: "This man doeth many miracles. If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him." John xi. 47, 48. The miracles Christ performed were indeed sufficient to alarm the fears of those whose downfall was involved in his success. And it was impossible for them to deny the facts, which so many thousands were ready to attest on evidence too certain to admit even the possibility of mistake, delusion, or imposture. But his enemies, who admitted their reality and yet resisted their design, by not acknowledging the person who wrought them to be the Messiah, had recourse to the most impious and most absurd suppositions, in order to evade their evidence. The heathen imputed them to some occult power of magic; and thus applied what has no existence in nature, in order to account for a phenomenon that existed out of its common course. The stories of the Jews, who confessed the miracles, but denied what they were intended to establish, are too ridiculous to be mentioned. We must not, however, omit to take notice of the wicked and blasphemous cavil of the Pharisees, and the noble reply which our Lord made to it. They could not deny the fact, but they imputed it to the agency of an infernal spirit: "This fellow," said they, "doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils. And Jesus knew their thoughts, and said unto them, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand; and if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself: how shall then his kingdom stand?" Matt. xii. 24-26. The purity of the doctrine which was taught by our blessed Lord was totally adverse to the kingdom of darkness. It tended to overthrow it, by the introduction of principles far different from those which Satan would inspire, and by prosecuting objects totally opposite to those which that wicked and malignant spirit would tempt us to pursue; so that in proportion to the prevalence of the kingdom of Christ, the kingdom of Satan would of course be diminished. Now, supposing miracles to be in the power of an infernal spirit, can it be imagined that he would communicate an ability of performing them to persons who were counteracting his designs? Would he by them give credit to a cause that tended to bring his own into disgrace? Thus, as our Saviour appealed to miracles as proofs of his power, so he appealed to the inherent worth and purity of the doctrines they were intended to bear witness to, as a proof that the power was of God. In this manner do the external and internal evidences give and receive mutual confirmation and mutual lustre.

The truth of the Christian religion does not, however, depend wholly on the miracles wrought by its Divine Founder, though sufficient in themselves to establish his claims; but, in order to give the evidence of miracles the strongest force they could possibly acquire, that evidence was extended still farther; and the same power that our Lord possessed was communicated to his disciples, and their more immediate successors. While yet on earth he imparted to them this extraordinary gift, as the seal of their commission, when he sent them to preach the gospel; and after his glorious resurrection and ascension into heaven, they were endowed with powers yet more stupendous. Sensible of the validity of this kind of evidence, the apostles of our Lord, with the same artless simplicity and the same boldness of conscious integrity which distinguished their great Master, constantly insisted upon the miracles they wrought, as strong and undeniable proofs of the truth of their doctrines. Thus the miracles of our blessed Lord may be justly considered as the evidence of his Divine mission and character. If we consider their nature, their greatness, and their number; and if to this consideration we add that which respects their end and design, we must acknowledge that no one could have performed them unless God was with him. They were too public to be the artifices of imposture; too substantial and too numerous to afford the slightest suspicion of undesigned and fortuitous coincidence. In a word, supposing that the Most High should in any instance so far counteract the common laws of nature as to produce a miracle, and should design that miracle as a monument to future times of the truth of any peculiar doctrine, we cannot conceive any mode of communicating it more effectual than that which he has chosen. Stronger proofs could not be afforded, consistently with the design of the gospel, which is not to overpower our understandings by an irresistible and compulsory light, but to afford us such rational evidence as is sufficient to satisfy moral inquirers, who are endowed with faculties to perceive the truth; but at the same time who also have power totally to resist it, and finally to forfeit all its blessings. These miracles were of a nature too palpable to be mistaken. They were the objects of sense, and not the precarious speculations of reason concerning what God might do, or the chimerical suggestions of fancy concerning what he did. The facts were recorded by those who must have known whether they were true or false. The persons who recorded them were under no possible temptations to deceive the world. We can only account for their conduct on the supposition of their most perfect conviction and disinterested zeal. That they should assert what they knew to be false; that they should publish it with so much ardor; that they should risk every thing dear to humanity, in order to maintain it; and at last submit to death, in order to attest their persuasion of its truth in those moments when imposture usually drops its mask, and enthusiasm loses its confidence; that they should act thus in opposition to every dictate of common sense, and every principle of common honesty, every restraint of shame, and every impulse of selfishness, is a phenomenon not less irreconcilable to the moral state of things than miracles are to the natural constitution of the world. Falsehood naturally entangles men in contradiction, and confounds them with dismay; but the love of truth invigorates the mind; the consciousness of integrity anticipates the approbation of God; and conscience creates a fortitude, to which mere unsupported nature is often a stranger.

3. How long miracles were continued in the Church has been a matter of keen dispute, and has been investigated with as much anxiety as if the truth of the gospel depended upon the manner in which it was decided. Assuming, as we are here warranted to do, that real miraculous power was conveyed in the way detailed by the inspired writers, it is plain that it may have been exercised in different countries, and may have remained, without any new communication of it, throughout the first and a considerable part of the second century. The apostles, wherever they went to execute their commission, would avail themselves of the stupendous gift which had been imparted to them; and it is clear, not only that they were permitted and enabled to convey it to others, but that spiritual gifts, including the power of working miracles, were actually conferred on many of the primitive disciples. Allusions to this we find in the Epistles of St. Paul: such allusions, too, as it is utterly inconceivable that any man of a sound judgment could have made, had he not known that he was referring to an obvious fact, about which there could be no hesitation. Of the time at which several of the apostles died, we have no certain knowledge. St. Peter and St. Paul suffered at Rome about A. D. 66 or 67; and it is fully established that the life of John was much longer protracted, he having died a natural death, A. D. 100 or 101. Supposing that the two former of these apostles imparted spiritual gifts till the time of their suffering martyrdom, the persons to whom they were imparted might, in the course of nature, have lived through the earlier part of the second century; and if John did the same till the end of his life, such gifts as were derived from him might have remained till more than the half of that century had elapsed. That such was the fact, is asserted by ancient ecclesiastical writers. Whether, after the generation immediately succeeding the apostles had passed away, the power of working miracles was anew communicated, is a question, the solution of which cannot be nearly so satisfactory. The probability is that there was no such renewal; and this opinion rests upon the ground that natural causes were now sufficient to accomplish the end for which miracles were originally designed; and it does not appear to have been any part of the scheme of the blessed Author of our religion, that, solely for the purpose of hastening that conversion of the nations which might gradually be accomplished, miracles should be wrought, when these could be of no use in establishing after-ages in the faith.

MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION. By this is meant, that the human nature of Jesus Christ was formed, not in the ordinary method of generation, but out of the substance of the Virgin Mary, by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost. The evidence upon which this article of the Christian faith rests is found in Matt. i.

18-23, and in the more particular narration which St. Luke has given in the first chapter of his Gospel. If we admit this evidence of the fact, we can discern the emphatical meaning of the appellation given to our Saviour when he is called "the seed of the woman," Gen. iii. 15; we can perceive the meaning of a phrase which St. Luke has introduced into the genealogy of Jesus, Luke iii. 23, and of which, otherwise, it is not possible to give a good account, ὁ, ὅς ἐκ τοῦ ἁνδρός, υἱὸς Ἰωσήφ; [being, as was supposed, the son of Joseph;] and we can discover a peculiar significance in an expression of the Apostle Paul, Gal. iv. 4, "God sent forth his Son, made of a woman." The conception of Jesus is the point from which we date the union between his Divine and human nature; and, this conception being miraculous, the existence of the person in whom they are united was not physically derived from Adam. But, as Dr. Horsley speaks in his sermon on the incarnation, the union with the uncreated Word is the very principle of personality and individual existence in the son of Mary. According to this view of the matter, the miraculous conception gives a completeness and consistency to the revelation concerning Jesus Christ. Not only is he the Son of God, but, as the Son of man, he is exalted above his brethren, while he is made like them. He is preserved from the contamination adhering to the race whose nature he assumed; and when the only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, was made flesh, the intercourse which, as man, he had with God, is distinguished, not in degree only, but in kind, from that which any prophet ever enjoyed; and it is infinitely more intimate, because it did not consist in communications occasionally made to him, but arose from the manner in which his human nature had its existence.

MIRIAM, sister of Moses and Aaron, and daughter of Amram and Jochebed, was born about A. M. 2424. She might be ten or twelve years old when her brother Moses was exposed on the banks of the Nile, since Miriam was watching there, and offered herself to Pharaoh's daughter to fetch him a nurse. The princess accepting the offer, Miriam fetched her own mother, to whom the young Moses was given to nurse. Exod. ii. 4, 5, etc. It is thought that Miriam married Hur, of the tribe of Judah; but it does not appear that she had any children by him. Exod. xvii. 10, 11. Miriam had the gift of prophecy, as she intimates, Num. xii. 2: "Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses? hath he not spoken also by us?" After the passage of the Red Sea, Miriam led the choirs and dances of the women, and sang with them the canticle, "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea;" while Moses led the choir of men. Exod. xv. 21. When Zipporah, the wife of Moses, arrived in the camp of Israel, Miriam and Aaron disputed with her, speaking against Moses on her account. Num. xii. This conduct the Lord punished by visiting Miriam with a leprosy. Aaron interceded with Moses for her recovery, and he besought the Lord, who ordered her to be shut out of the camp seven days. We are acquainted with no subsequent particulars of the life of Miriam. Her death happened in the first month of the fortieth year after the exodus, at the encampment of Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin. Num. xx. 1. The people mourned for her, and she was there buried.

MIRRORS, usually, but improperly, rendered looking-glasses. The eastern mirrors were made of polished metal, and for the most part convex. So Callimachus describes Venus as "taking the shining brass," that is, to adjust her hair. If they were thus made in the country of Elihu, the image made use of by him will appear very lively: "Hast thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking-glass?" Job xxxvii. 18. Shaw informs us that "in the Levant, looking-glasses are a part of female dress. The Moorish women in Barbary are so fond of their ornaments, and particularly of their looking-glasses, which they hang upon their breasts, that they will not lay them aside, even when, after the drudgery of the day, they are obliged to go two or three miles with a pitcher or a goat's skin, to fetch water." The Israelitish women used to carry their mirrors with them, even to their most solemn place of worship. The word mirror should be used in the passages here referred to. To speak of "looking-glasses made of steel," and "glasses molten," is palpably absurd; whereas the term mirror obviates every difficulty, and expresses the true meaning of the original.

MISHNA, or MISNA, מִשְׁנָה, signifies repetition, and is properly the code of the Jewish civil law. The Mishna contains the text; and the Gemara, which is the second part of the Talmud, contains the commentaries; so that the Gemara is, as it were, a glossary on the Mishna. The Mishna consists of various traditions of the Jews, and of explanations of several passages of Scripture. These traditions, serving as an explication of the written law, and supplementary to it, are said to have been delivered to Moses during the time of his abode upon the mount; which he afterward communicated to Aaron, Eleazar, and his servant Joshua. By these they were transmitted to the seventy elders; by them to the prophets, who communicated them to the men of the great sanhedrim, from whom the wise men of Jerusalem and Babylon received them. According to Dr. Prideaux, they passed from Jeremiah to Baruch, from him to Ezra, and from Ezra to the men of the great synagogue, the last of whom was Simon the Just, who delivered them to Antigonus of Socho. From him they came down in regular succession to Simeon, who took our Saviour in his arms; to Gamaliel, at whose feet St. Paul was brought up; and last of all to Rabbi Judah the holy, who committed them to writing in the Mishna. Dr. Prideaux, rejecting this Jewish fiction, observes, that after the death of Simon the Just, about B. C. 299, arose the Tannaim or Mishnical doctors, who, by their comments and conclusions, added to the number of those traditions which had been received and allowed by Ezra and the men of the great synagogue. Hence, toward the middle of the second century after Christ, under the reign of the Roman Emperor Antoninus Pius, it was found necessary to commit these traditions to writing. This was requisite, because the traditions had been so much increased that they could no longer be preserved by the memory of man; and also because their country had suffered considerably in the reign of the Emperor Adrian, and many of their schools being dissolved, and their learned men cut off, the usual method of preserving their traditions had failed. Lest, therefore, the traditions should be forgotten and lost, it was resolved that they should be collected and committed to writing. Rabbi Judah, who was at that time rector of the school at Tiberias in Galilee, and president of the sanhedrim at that place, undertook the work. He compiled it in six books, each consisting of several tracts, which altogether form the number of sixty-three. Dr. Prideaux computes that the Mishna was composed about A. D. 150. Dr. Lightfoot, however, says that Rabbi Judah compiled the Mishna about A. D. 190, in the latter end of the reign of Commodus; or, as some compute, A. D. 220. Dr. Lardner is of opinion that this work could not have been finished before A. D. 190, or later. Thus the book called the Mishna was formed; a book which was received by the Jews with great veneration, and which has been always held in high esteem among them. Their opinion of it is, that all the particulars which it contains were dictated by God himself to Moses upon Mount Sinai, as well as the written word itself; and, consequently, that it must be of the same Divine authority, and ought to be as religiously observed. See CABALA, GEMARA, JEWS.

MITE. See MONEY, [and the TABLES at the end of the book.]

[MITRE. In the early Church, this cover for the head was one of the insignia of the episcopal office. Its cloven form represents the pentecostal tongues of fire. There are different styles of mitres, according to the grade of the bishops and abbots by whom and the services during which they are worn.]

MITYLENE, the capital of the island of Lesbos, through which St. Paul passed as he went from Corinth to Jerusalem. Acts xx. 14. [The island is now called Metelin. The principal town is Castro, on the eastern coast, near which are the ruins of the ancient Mitylene. This city had two harbors. It was greatly adorned and beautified by art; and is celebrated as the birth-place of Theophrastus, Alcæus, Sappho, Helianicus, and Myrsilus. Pittacus long presided over its councils.]

MIZPAH, or MIZPEH, a city of the tribe of Benjamin, situated in a plain, about eighteen miles west of Jerusalem. [Robinson locates it at Neby Samwil, five or six miles north-west of Jerusalem. Compare Jer. xli. 10, 12, 16: 1 Macc. iii. 46.] Here Samuel dwelt; and here he called Israel together, to observe a solemn fast for their sins, and to supplicate God for his assistance against the Philistines; after which they sallied out on their enemies, already discomfited by the thunders of heaven, and gave them a total defeat. 1 Sam. vii. Here, also,

Saul was anointed king. 1 Sam. x. 17-25. It appears that between this and the time of Asa, King of Judah, Mizpeh had suffered probably in some of the intervening wars, as we are told that Asa built it with the stones and timber of Ramah. 1 Kings xv. 22. There was another MIZPEH, in Gilead, on the spot where Jacob set up the pillar or heap of stones, to commemorate the covenant there made between him and Laban. Gen. xxxi. 49. [Jephthah dwelt in Mizpeh of Gilead. Judges x. 17; xi. 11, 84.] (See GILEAD.) There was also a third MIZPEH, in the land of Moab, where David placed his father and mother, while he remained in his retreat at Adullam. 1 Sam. xxii. 3. [A valley near Mount Hermon is also called MIZPEH. Joshua xi. 3, 8.] It is to be observed, that Mizpeh implies a beacon or watch-tower, a pillar or heap of commemoration; and at all the places bearing this name, it is probable that a single pillar, or a rude pile, was erected as the witness and the record of some particular event. These, subsequently, became altars and places of convocation on public occasions, religious and civil.

MIZRAIM, or MESRAIM, son of Ham, and father of Ludim, Anamim, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim, and Casluhim. Gen. x. 6. Meser or Misor was father of the Mizraim, the Egyptians; and he himself is commonly called Mizraim, although there is very strong probability that Mizraim, being of the plural number, signifies rather the Egyptians themselves, than the father of that people. Mizraim is also put for the country of Egypt: thus it has three significations, which are perpetually confounded and used promiscuously, sometimes denoting the land of Egypt, sometimes him who first peopled Egypt, and sometimes the inhabitants themselves. Cairo, the capital of Egypt, and even Egypt itself, are to this day called Mezer by the Arabians. But the natives call Egypt Chemi, that is, the land of Cham, or Ham, as it is also sometimes called in Scripture. Psalm lxxviii. 12; cv. 23; cvi. 22. The prophet Micah, vii. 15, gives to Egypt the name of Mezor, or Matzor; and Rabbi Kimchi, followed in this by several learned commentators, explains by Egypt what is said of the rivers of Mezor, 2 Kings xix. 24: Isaiah xix. 6; xxxvii. 25.

[MNASON. An old disciple, with whom Paul lodged at Jerusalem. He was of Cyprus. Acts xxi. 17.]

MOAB was the son of Lot, and of his eldest daughter. Gen. xix. 31, etc. He was born about the same time as Isaac, A. M. 2108, and was father of the Moabites, whose habitation lay beyond Jordan and the Dead Sea, on both sides of the river Arnon. Their capital city was situated on that river, and was called Ar or Areopolis; or Ariol of Moab, or Rabbah Moab, that is, the capital of Moab, or Kir-haresh, that is, a city with brick walls. This country was originally possessed by a race of giants called Emim. Deut. ii. 11, 12. The Moabites conquered them, and afterward the Amorites took a part from the Moabites. Judges xi. 13. Moses conquered that part which belonged to the Amorites, and gave it to the tribe of Reuben.

The Moabites were spared by Moses, for God had restricted him. Deut. ii. 9. But there always was a great antipathy between the Moabites and the Israelites, which occasioned many wars between them. Balaam seduced the Hebrews to idolatry and uncleanness, by means of the daughters of Moab, Num. xxv. 1, 2; and Balak, king of this people, endeavored to prevail on Balaam to curse Israel. God ordained that the Moabites should not enter into the congregation of his people, because they had the inhumanity to refuse the Israelites a passage through their country, nor would they supply them with bread and water in their necessity. Eglon, King of the Moabites, was one of the first that oppressed Israel after the death of Joshua. Ehud killed Eglon, and Israel expelled the Moabites. Judges iii. 12, etc. Hanun, King of the Ammonites, having insulted David's ambassadors, David made war against him, and subdued Moab and Ammon; under which subjection they continued till the separation of the ten tribes. The Ammonites and the Moabites continued in subjection to the kings of Israel to the death of Ahab. Presently after the death of Ahab the Moabites began to revolt. 2 Kings iii. 4, 5. Mesha, King of Moab, refused the tribute of a hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams, which till then had been customarily paid, either yearly, or at the beginning of every reign; which of these two is not clearly expressed in Scripture. The reign of Ahaziah was too short to make war with them; but Jehoram, son of Ahab, and brother to Ahaziah, having ascended the throne, thought of reducing them to obedience. He invited Jehoshaphat, King of Judah, who, with the King of Edom, then his vassal, entered Moab, where they were near perishing with thirst, but were miraculously relieved. 2 Kings iii. 16, etc.

It is not easy to ascertain what were the circumstances of the Moabites from this time; but Isaiah, at the beginning of the reign of King Hezekiah, threatens them with a calamity which was to happen three years after his prediction, and which probably referred to the war that Shalmaneser, King of Assyria, made with the ten tribes and the other people beyond Jordan. Amos (i. 13, etc.) also foretold great miseries to them, which, probably, they suffered under Uzziah and Jotham, kings of Judah, or under Shalmaneser, 2 Chron. xxvi. 7, 8; xxvii. 5; or, lastly, in the war of Nebuchadnezzar, five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. This prince carried them captive beyond the Euphrates, as the prophets had threatened, Jer. ix. 26; xii. 14, 15; xxv. 11, 12; xlviii. 47, etc.; xlix. 3, 6, 8, 9; l. 16; and Cyrus sent them home again as he did the rest of the captives. After their return from captivity they multiplied, and fortified themselves, as the Jews did, and other neighboring people, still in subjection to the kings of Persia. They were afterward conquered by Alexander the Great, and were in obedience to the kings of Syria and Egypt successively, and finally to the Romans. There is a probability, also, that in the later times of the Jewish republic they obeyed the Asmonean kings, and afterward Herod the Great. The principal deities of the Moabites were Chemosh and Baal-peor.

The prophecies concerning Moab are numerous and remarkable. There are, says Keith, abundant predictions which refer so clearly to its modern state, that there is scarcely a single feature peculiar to the land of Moab, as it now exists, which was not marked by the prophets in their delineation of the low condition to which, from the height of its wickedness and haughtiness, it was finally to be brought down.

The land of Moab lay to the east and south-east of Judea, and bordered on the east, north-east, and partly on the south of the Dead Sea. Its early history is nearly analogous to that of Ammon; and the soil, though, perhaps, more diversified, is, in many places where the desert and plains of salt have not encroached on its borders, of equal fertility. There are manifest and abundant vestiges of its ancient greatness: the whole of the plains are covered with the sites of towns, on every eminence or spot convenient for the construction of one; and as the land is capable of rich cultivation, there can be no doubt that the country now so deserted, once presented a continued picture of plenty and fertility. The form of fields is still visible, and there are the remains of Roman highways which, in some places, are completely paved, and on which there are milestones of the times of Trajan, Marcus Aurelius, and Severus, with the number of the miles legible upon them. Wherever any spot is cultivated, the corn is luxuriant, and the riches of the soil cannot, perhaps, be more clearly illustrated than by the fact that one grain of Heshbon wheat exceeds in dimensions two of the ordinary sort, and more than double the number of grains grow on the stalk. The frequency, and almost, in many instances, the close vicinity of the sites of the ancient towns, prove that the population of the country was formerly proportioned to its natural fertility. Such evidence may surely suffice to prove that the country was well cultivated and peopled at a period so long posterior to the date of the predictions, that no cause less than supernatural could have existed at the time when they were delivered, which could have authorized the assertion with the least probability or apparent possibility of its truth, that Moab would ever have been reduced to that state of great and permanent desolation in which it has continued for so many ages, and which vindicates and ratifies to this hour the truth of the scriptural prophecies. The cities of Moab were to be "desolate without any to dwell therein;" no city was to escape: Moab was to "flee away." And the cities of Moab have all disappeared. Their place, together with all the adjoining part of Idumæa, is characterized, in the map of Volney's Travels, by the ruins of towns. His information respecting these ruins was derived from some of the wandering Arabs; and its accuracy has been fully corroborated by the testimony of different European travellers of high respectability and undoubted veracity, who have since visited this devastated region. The whole country abounds with ruins; and Burckhardt, who encountered many difficulties in so desolate and dangerous a land, thus records the brief history of a few of them: "The ruins of Eleale, Heshbon, Meon, Medeba, Dibon, Aroer, still subsist to illustrate the history of the Beni Israel." And it might with equal truth have been added, that they still subsist to confirm the inspiration of the Jewish Scriptures, or to prove that the seers of Israel were the prophets of God; for the desolation of each of these very cities was a theme of a prediction. Every thing worthy of observation respecting them has been detailed, not only in Burckhardt's "Travels in Syria," but also by Seetzen, and, more recently, by Captains Irby and Mangles, who, along with Mr. Banks and Mr. Leigh, visited this deserted district. The predicted judgment has fallen with such truth upon these cities, and upon all the cities of the land of Moab far and near, and they are so utterly "broken down," that even the prying curiosity of such indefatigable travellers could discover among a multiplicity of ruins only a few remains so entire as to be worthy of particular notice. The subjoined description is drawn from their united testimony: Among the ruins of El Aal (Eleale) are a number of large cisterns, fragments of buildings, and foundations of houses. At Heshban, (Heshbon,) are the ruins of a large ancient town, together with the remains of a temple, and some edifices. A few broken shafts of columns are still standing, and there are a number of deep wells cut in the rock. The ruins of Medeba are about two miles in circumference. There are many remains of the walls of private houses constructed with blocks of silex, but not a single edifice is standing. The chief object of interest is an immense tank or cistern of hewn stones, "which, as there is no stream at Medeba," Burckhardt remarks, "might still be of use to the Bedouins, were the surrounding ground cleared of the rubbish to allow the water to flow into it; but such an undertaking is far beyond the views of the wandering Arabs." There is also the foundation of a temple built with large stones, and apparently of great antiquity, with two columns near it. The ruins of Dibon, (Dibon,) situated in the midst of a fine plain, are of considerable extent, but present nothing of interest. The neighboring hot wells, and the similarity of the name, identify the ruins of Myoun with Meon, or Beth Meon of Scripture. Of this ancient city, as well as of Araayr, (Aroer,) nothing is now remarkable but what is common to them with all the cities of Moab, their entire desolation. The extent of the ruins of Rabba, (Rabbath Moab,) formerly the residence of the kings of Moab, sufficiently proves its ancient importance; though no other object can be particularized among the ruins than the remains of a palace or temple, some of the walls of which are still standing; a gate belonging to another building, and an insulated altar. There are many remains of private buildings, but none of them is entire. There being no springs on the spot, the town had two birkets, the largest of which is cut entirely out of the rocky ground, together with many cisterns. Mount Nebo was completely barren when Burckhardt passed over it, and the site of the ancient city had not been ascertained. "Nebo is spoiled." [In the list of ruined towns in the Belka, given by Robinson, is Neba, which he thinks may not improbably represent Nebo.]

While the ruins of all these cities still retain their ancient names, and are the most conspicuous amidst the wide scene of general desolation, and while each of them was in like manner particularized in the visions of the prophet, they yet formed but a small number of the cities of Moab; and the rest are also, in similar verification of the prophecies, "desolate, without any to dwell therein." None of the ancient cities of Moab now remains as tenanted by men. Kerek, which neither bears any resemblance in name to any of the cities of Moab which are mentioned as existing in the time of the Israelites, nor possesses any monuments which denote a very remote antiquity, is the only nominal town in the whole country, and, in the words of Seetzen, who visited it, "in its present ruined state it can only be called a hamlet, and the houses have only one floor." [See KILR-HARASETH.] But the most populous and fertile province in Europe, especially any situated in the interior of a country like Moab, is not covered so thickly with towns as Moab is plentiful in ruins, deserted and desolate though now it be. Burckhardt enumerates about fifty ruined sites within its boundaries, many of them extensive. In general they are a broken-down and undistinguishable mass of ruins, and many of them have not been closely inspected. But, in some instances, there are the remains of temples, sepulchral monuments, the ruins of edifices constructed of very large stones, in one of which buildings some of the stones are twenty feet in length, and so broad that one constitutes the thickness of the wall; traces of hanging-gardens; entire columns lying on the ground, three feet in diameter, and fragments of smaller columns; and many cisterns cut out of the rock. When the towns of Moab existed in their prime, and were at ease—when arrogance, and haughtiness, and pride prevailed among them—the desolation, and total desertion and abandonment of them all, must have utterly surpassed all human conception. And that such numerous cities which subsisted for many ages, some of them being built on eminences, and naturally strong; others on plains, and surrounded by the richest soil; some situated in valleys by the side of a plentiful stream; and others, where art supplied the deficiencies of nature, and where immense cisterns were excavated out of the rock, and which exhibit in their ruins many monuments of ancient prosperity, and many remains easily convertible into present utility; should have all fled away, all met the same indiscriminate fate, and be all "desolate, without any to dwell therein," notwithstanding all these ancient indications of permanent durability, and their existing facilities and inducements for becoming the habitations of men, is a matter of just wonder in the present day. "They shall cry of Moab, How is it broken down!"

The strong contrast between the ancient and the actual state of Moab is exemplified in the condition of the inhabitants as well as of the land; and the coincidence between the prediction and the fact is as striking in the one case as in the other. "The days come, saith the Lord, that I will send unto him [Moab] wanderers that shall cause him to wander, and shall empty his vessels." The Bedouin (wandering) Arabs are now the chief and almost the only inhabitants of a country once studded with cities. Traversing the country, and fixing their tents for a short time in one place, and then decamping to another, depasturing every part successively, and despoiling the whole land of its natural produce, they are wanderers who have come up against it, and who keep it in a state of perpetual desolation. They lead a wandering life; and the only regularity they know or practice, is to act upon a systematic scheme of spoliation. They prevent any from forming a fixed settlement who are inclined to attempt it; for although the fruitfulness of the soil would abundantly repay the labor of settlers, and render migration wholly unnecessary, even if the population were increased more than tenfold, yet the Bedouins forcibly deprive them of the means of subsistence, compel them to search for it elsewhere, and, in the words of the prediction, literally "cause them to wander." "It may be remarked generally of the Bedouins," says Burckhardt, in describing their extortions in this very country, "that wherever they are the masters of the cultivators, the latter are soon reduced to beggary by their unceasing demands." "O ye that dwell in Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock, and be like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth." In a general description of the condition of the inhabitants of that extensive desert which now occupies the place of these ancient flourishing states, Volney, in plain but unmeant illustration of this prediction, remarks, that the "wretched peasants live in perpetual dread of losing the fruit of their labors; and no sooner have they gathered in their harvest, than they hasten to secrete it in private places, and retire among the rocks which border on the Dead Sea." Toward the opposite extremity of the land of Moab, and at a little distance from its borders, Seetzen relates that "there are many families living in caverns;" and he actually designates them "the inhabitants of the rocks." And at the distance of a few miles from the ruined site of Heshbon, according to Captains Irby and Mangles, "there are many artificial caves in a large range of perpendicular cliffs, in some of which are chambers and small sleeping apartments." While the cities are desolate, without any to dwell therein, the rocks are tenanted. But whether flocks lie down in the city without any to make them afraid, or whether men are to be found dwelling in the rocks, and are "like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth," the wonderful transition, in either case, and the close accordance in both of the fact to the prediction, assuredly mark it, in characters that may be visible to the purblind mind, as the word of that God before whom the darkness of futurity is as light, and without whom a sparrow cannot fall unto the ground.

MOHAMMEDANISM. Mohammed, its distinguished founder, was born in Arabia, toward the conclusion of the sixth century. Although he had been reduced to poverty, he was descended from ancestors who had long been conspicuous by rank and by influence; but having been shut out from the advantages of education, which in his peculiar case might have rather cramped than invigorated the astonishing powers of his mind, he had been compelled to seek his subsistence by devoting himself to a menial occupation. Yet although thus unfavorably situated, he was led, in conducting the commercial transactions which, in the service of Cadijah, a woman of great wealth, he was employed to arrange, to survey the state of several of the neighboring nations; became acquainted with the most striking features in the characters of those by whom he was surrounded; and he was enabled to profit by the information which he thus procured, from his adding to the graces of personal elegance and beauty, the most captivating manners and the most winning address. Exalted by the partiality of Cadijah, who conferred on him her hand and her extensive possessions, he seems early to have formed the scheme of announcing himself as the author of a new religion, and, in virtue of this sacred office, of ascending to that supremacy of political influence which it was his singular fortune, soon after he unfolded his pretensions, to attain. Taking advantage of that insensibility into which, by the attacks of epilepsy, he was occasionally thrown, he pretended that he was wrapped in divine contemplation, or was actually holding communication with higher orders of beings, who were committing to him the divine instructions which he was to disseminate through the world.

When the time which he conceived to be favorable for the grand object of his ambition had arrived, he openly declared that he was the prophet of the most high God; but the magistrates of Mecca, despising his pretensions, or dreading the evils which might result from religious innovation, vigorously opposed him, and he found himself compelled, in order to avoid the punishment which they were preparing to inflict on him, to have recourse to flight. He did not, however, relinquish the scheme upon which he had so long meditated, and which he was convinced that he was qualified to carry into execution. After his departure from Mecca, from which event the Mohammedan era of the hegira takes its commencement, he was joined by a few followers determined to share his fate; and having solemnly consecrated the banner under which he was to extend his power and propagate his tenets, he commenced hostilities against those by whom he had been opposed. His first efforts, however, were not crowned with success, but he had infused into his attendants a spirit which misfortune could not subdue: they renewed their enterprise, and Mecca at length submitted to his arms. From this period his exaltation was very rapid: he was venerated as the favored messenger of Heaven, and his countrymen bowed down before a sovereign protected, as they believed, by the Omnipotent, and commissioned to reveal his will. There were many causes which satisfactorily account for his success. The Christian religion, in the corrupted form in which it existed in the regions contiguous to the country of the prophet, was not interwoven with the affections of its professors: they were split into factions, contending about the most frivolous distinctions and the most ridiculous tenets; and the sword of persecution was mutually wielded by them all, to spread misery where there should have been the ties of charity and love. Thus divided, they presented no steady resistance to the attempt made to wrest from them their religion; and, indeed, as many of them had adopted that religion, not from conviction, but from dread of the tyranny by which it had been imposed on them, they only did what they had previously done, when, shrinking from the ferocious zeal of the emissaries of the prophet, they submitted to his doctrine. With admirable address, too, he had framed his religious system, so as to gratify those to whom it was announced. Laying down the sublime and unquestionable doctrine of the unity of God, he professed to revere the patriarchs, whose memory the Arabs held in veneration; he admitted that Moses was a messenger from God; he acknowledged Jesus as an exalted prophet; and he founded his own pretensions upon the intimation which our Saviour had given that the Paraclete, or Comforter, was to be sent to lead the world into all truth. Thus each party found in the Koran much of what it had been accustomed to believe; and the transition was in this way rendered more easy to the admission that a new revelation had been vouchsafed.

This effect was facilitated by the ignorance which prevailed in Arabia. Accustomed to a wandering life, the Arabs had devoted no time to the acquisition of knowledge: most of them were even unable to read the Koran, the sublimity and beauty of which were held forth to them as incontestable proofs of the inspiration of its author. Had Mohammed, indeed, rested his doctrine upon miracles, it might have happened that the imposture by some would have been detected; but, with his usual policy, he avoided what he knew was so hazardous; and, with the exception of his reference to the Koran, as surpassing the capacity of man, he explicitly disclaimed having been authorized to do such mighty works as had been wrought to establish the previous dispensations of the Almighty. The fascinating representation that he gave of the joys of paradise, which he accommodated to the conceptions and wishes of the eastern nations, also made a deep and favorable impression: the wantonness of imagination was gratified with the anticipation of a state abounding with sensual gratification raised to the highest degree of exquisiteness; while the dismal fate allotted through eternity to all who rejected the message which he brought, alarmed the fears of the credulous and superstitious multitude whom he was eager to allure. When with these causes are combined the vigor of his administration, and the certainty of suffering or of death in the event of withstanding his doctrine, there is sufficient to account for the success of his religion; and there is in that success nothing which can, with the shadow of reason, be employed—as, with strange perversion of argument, it has sometimes been—to invalidate the proof for the truth of Christianity deduced from its rapid diffusion. That proof does not rest upon the mere circumstance that the religion of Jesus was widely and speedily propagated—there might, under particular circumstances, have been in this nothing wonderful—but on the facts that it was so propagated, when all the human means to which they who preached it could have recourse would have retarded rather than promoted what actually took place; that it employed no force; that it held out no earthly advantages; that it accommodated itself to no previous religious prejudices; and that it opposed and reprov'd all, and did not gratify any, of the corruptions and lusts of human nature.

But Mohammed did not limit his views to the sovereignty of Arabia: he was elevated by the hope of universal empire; and he moulded his system so as to promote what he was eager to attain. For this purpose he promised to all who enrolled themselves under his banner full license to plunder the nations against which they were led; and he made it a fundamental tenet of his faith that they who fell in the warlike enterprises destined to enlarge the number of believers were at once delivered from the guilt and misery of their sins, and were admitted to the happy scenes prepared for the faithful. He thus collected around him an army thoroughly devoted, prepared for meeting every danger, stimulated to the most laborious exertions by the hope of plunder, and steeled against all which can weaken courage or exhaust resolution, by the enthusiasm of hope: whatever was their fate, they had nothing to dread: if they escaped the weapons of their enemies, they were loaded with spoil, and invited to indulgence; and if they fell, they were canonized by those who survived, and exchanged the vicissitudes and troubles of this world for the delights of a sensual paradise. An army thus constituted and thus impelled must, under any circumstances, have been formidable: against them the usual methods to defeat invasion and to prevent conquest would have failed: they could have been successfully encountered only by men who had imbibed a similar spirit, and who identified patience and courage in the field with the most sacred duty required by religion. Of the advantages which, after Arabia had acknowledged his sway, and hailed him as the prophet of the Lord, he might confidently anticipate, Mohammed was abundantly sensible; but while he was preparing to bring into action the mighty machine which he had erected, his earthly career was terminated, and he left to others to execute the schemes which he had fondly devised.

The energy of the system remained after the author of it was removed from the world; and his successors lost no time in extending their dominions far beyond the bounds of Arabia. The obstacles opposed to them instantly yielded: a feeble and degenerate empire, sinking under its own weight, and unable to resist any power acting against it, at once submitted to the host of fanatical plunderers, who spread desolation as they advanced; the richest provinces soon were wrested from it; and the most fertile regions of Asia fell under the conquering fury of the caliphs. Persia, which had long persecuted Christianity, was added to their increasing territories; Syria submitted to their yoke; and, what filled with horror and with anguish the believers in the gospel, Palestine, that holy land from which the light of Divine truth had beamed upon the nations, which had been the scene of those awful or interesting events recorded in the inspired Scriptures, which had witnessed the life, the ministry, the death, the resurrection, and ascension of the Redeemer of mankind, bent under the iron sceptre of an infidel sovereign, nominally, indeed, revering the Founder of its religion, but filled with bigotry and implacable hatred against the most attached and conscientious of his disciples. But the caliphs did not accomplish their principal object when they reduced to subjection the countries which they ravaged; to them it was of infinitely more moment to propagate the Mussulman faith; and, accordingly, although in the commencement of that faith some indulgence was, from political considerations, granted to the Christians, there was soon no alternative left to the trembling captives but to embrace the doctrine of the prophet, or to submit to slavery or death. We cannot wonder that tenets thus enforced rapidly spread; they supplanted, in many extensive regions, the religion of Jesus; and, incorporating themselves with civil governments, or rather founding all governments upon the Koran, they continue, at the distance of eleven hundred years, to be believed through a large proportion of the world.

The effect of this signal revolution was first experienced by those Christians who inhabited the eastern parts of the empire; but the account of it must have been speedily conveyed throughout Christendom, and the gigantic enterprises of the Saracens soon threatened all nations with slavery and superstition. The successors of the prophet, in the eighth century, directed their steps toward Europe; and having at length crossed the narrow sea which separates Africa from Spain, they dispersed the troops of Roderick, King of the Goths, took possession of the greater part of his dominions, subverted the empire of the Visigoths, which had been established in Spain for upward of three centuries, and planted themselves along the coast of Gaul, from the Pyrenean mountains to the Rhine. Charlemagne, alarmed at their progress, made a great effort to crush them; but he failed in accomplishing his object, and they committed, in various parts of Europe which they visited, the most shocking devastations.

When a great part of the life of Mohammed had been spent in preparatory meditation on the system he was about to establish, the chapters of the Alcoran, or Koran, which was to contain the rule of the faith and practice of his followers, were dealt out slowly and separately during the long period of three-and-twenty years. He intrusted his beloved wife, Raphsa, the daughter of Omar, with the keeping of the chest of his apostleship, in which were laid up all the originals of the revelations he pretended to have received by the ministration of the Angel Gabriel, and out of which the Koran, consisting of one hundred and fourteen surats, or chapters, of very unequal length, was composed after his death.

Yet, defective in its structure, and not less exceptionable in its doctrines and precepts, was the work which he thus delivered to his followers as the oracles of God. We will not detract from the real merit of the Koran: we allow it to be generally elegant and often sublime; but at the same time we reject with disdain its arrogant pretensions to any thing supernatural. Nay, if, descending to a minute investigation of it, we consider its perpetual inconsistency and absurdity, we shall indeed have cause for astonishment at that weakness of humanity which could ever have received such compositions as the work of the Deity, and which could still hold it in such high admiration as it is held by the followers of Mohammed to the present day. Far from supporting its arrogant claim to a supernatural work, it sinks below the level of many compositions confessedly of human original; and still lower does it fall when compared with that pure and perfect pattern which we justly admire in the Scriptures of truth. The first praise of all the productions of genius is invention; but the Koran bears little impression of this transcendent character. It does not contain one single doctrine which may not fairly be derived either from the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, from the spurious and apocryphal Gospels, then current in the east, from the Talmudical legends, or from the traditions, customs, and opinions of the Arabians. And the materials collected from these several sources are here heaped together with perpetual and needless repetitions, without any settled principle or visible connection. The most prominent feature of the Koran—that point of excellence in which the partiality of its admirers has ever delighted to view it—is the sublime notion it generally impresses of the nature and attributes of God. But if its author had really derived these just conceptions from the inspiration of that Being whom they attempt to describe, they would not have been surrounded, as they now are, on every side with error and absurdity. By attempting to explain what was inconceivable, to describe what was ineffable, and to materialize what in itself is spiritual, he absurdly and impiously aimed to sensualize the purity of the Divine essence. But it might easily be proved, that whatever the Koran justly defines of the Divine attributes, was borrowed from our Holy Scriptures; which even from their first promulgation, but especially from the completion of the New Testament, have extended the views and enlightened the understandings of mankind.

The Koran, indeed, everywhere inculcates that grand and fundamental doctrine of the unity of the Supreme Being, the establishment of which was constantly alleged by the impostor as the primary object of his pretended mission; but on the subject of the Christian trinity, its author seems to have entertained very gross and mistaken ideas, and to have been totally ignorant of the perfect consistency of that opinion with the unity of the Deity. With respect to the great doctrine of a future life, and the condition of the soul after its departure from the body, it must indeed be acknowledged that the prophet of Arabia has presented us with a nearer prospect of the invisible world, and disclosed to us a thousand particulars concerning it, which the Holy Scriptures had wrapped in the most profound and mysterious silence. But in his various representations of another life, he generally descends to an unnecessary minuteness and particularity, which excite disgust and ridicule, instead of reverence. He constantly pretended to have received these stupendous secrets by the ministry of the Angel Gabriel, from that eternal book in which the Divine decrees have been written by the finger of the Almighty from the foundation of the world; but the learned inquirer will discover a more accessible, and a far more probable, source whence they might be derived, partly in the wild and fanciful opinions of the ancient Arabs, and chiefly in those exhaustless stores of marvellous and improbable fiction, the works of the rabbins. Hence that romantic fable of the angel of death, whose peculiar office it is, at the destined hour, to dissolve the union between soul and body, and to free the departing spirit from its prison of flesh. Hence, too, the various descriptions of the general resurrection and final judgment with which the Koran everywhere abounds; and hence the vast but ideal balance in which the actions of all mankind shall then be impartially weighed, and their eternal doom be assigned them, either in the regions of bliss or misery, according as their good or evil deeds shall preponderate. Here, too, may be traced the grand and original outlines of that sensual paradise, and those luxurious enjoyments, which were so successfully employed in the Koran, to gratify the ardent genius of the Arabs, and allure them to the standard of the prophet.

The same observation which has been applied with respect to the sources whence the doctrines were drawn, may, with some few limitations, be likewise extended to the precepts which the Arabian legislator has enjoined. That the Koran, amidst a various and confused heap of ridiculous and even immoral precepts, contains many interesting and instructive lessons of morality, cannot with truth be denied. Of these, however, the merit is to be ascribed, not to the feeble imitation, but to the great and perfect original from which they were manifestly drawn. Instead of improving on the Christian precepts by a superior degree of refinement—instead of exhibiting a purer and more perfect system of morals than that of the gospel—the prophet of Arabia has miserably debased and weakened even what he has borrowed from that system. We are told by our Saviour, that a man is to be the husband of one wife, and that there is to be an inseparable union between them. By Mohammed's confession, Jesus Christ was a prophet of the true God, and the Holy Spirit was with him. Yet in the Koran we find permission for any person to have four wives, and as many concubines as he can maintain. Again: our Saviour expressly tells us that, at the resurrection, "they will neither marry nor be given in marriage; but be like the angels of God in heaven." We are informed also by St. Paul, that we shall be changed, and have a spiritual and glorified body: "for flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven; neither can corruption inherit incorruption." But Mohammed gives a very different account: it is clear, from his own confession, that the happiness promised in the Koran consists in base and corporeal enjoyments. According to its author, there will not only be marriage, but also servitude in the next world. The very meanest in paradise will have eighty thousand servants, and seventy-two wives of the girls of paradise, besides the wives he had in this world: he will also have a tent erected for him of pearls, hyacinths, and emeralds. And as marriage will take place, so a new race will be introduced in heaven; for, says the Koran, "If any of the faithful in paradise be desirous of issue, it shall be conceived, born, and grown up in the space of an hour." But on the contradictions in point of doctrine, though sufficient of themselves to confute the pretensions of Mohammed, we forbear to insist.

The impure designs which gave birth to the whole system may be traced in almost every subordinate part; even its sublimest descriptions of the Deity, even its most exalted moral precepts, not unfrequently either terminate in, or are interwoven with, some provision to gratify the inordinate cravings of ambition, or some license for the indulgence of the corrupt passions of the human heart. It has allowed private revenge, in the case of murder; it has given a sanction to fornication; and, if any weight be due to the example of its author, it has justified adultery. It has made war, and rapine, and bloodshed, provided they be exercised against unbelievers, not only meritorious acts, but even essential duties to the good Mussulman; duties by the performance of which he may secure the constant favor and protection of God and his prophet in this life, and in the next entitle himself to the boundless joys of paradise. In the Koran are advanced the following assertions, among others already noticed: That both Jews and Christians are idolaters; that the patriarchs and apostles were Mohammedans; that the angels worshipped Adam, and that the fallen angels were driven from heaven for not doing so; that our blessed Saviour was neither God, nor the Son of God; and that he assured Mohammed of this in a conference with the Almighty and him; yet that he was both the Word and Spirit of God; not to mention numberless absurdities concerning the creation, the deluge, the end of the world, the resurrection, the day of judgment, too gross to be received by any except the most debased understandings.

It was frequently the triumphant boast of St. Paul, that the gospel of Jesus Christ had for ever freed mankind from the intolerable burden of ceremonial observances. But the Koran renews and perpetuates the slavery, by prescribing to its votaries a ritual still more oppressive, and entangling them again in a yoke of bondage yet more severe, than that of the law. Of this kind, amidst a variety of instances, is that great and meritorious act of Mohammedan devotion, the pilgrimage to the holy city of Mecca; an act which the Koran has enjoined, and the pious Mussulman implicitly performs, as necessary to the obtaining pardon of his sins, and qualifying him to be a partaker of the alluring pleasures and exquisite enjoyments of paradise. To the several articles of faith to which all his followers were to adhere, Mohammed added four fundamental points of religious practice; namely, prayer five times a day, fasting, almsgiving, and the pilgrimage to Mecca. Under the first of these are comprehended those frequent washings or purifications which he prescribed as necessary preparations for the duty of prayer. So necessary did he think them, that he is said to have declared that the practice of religion is founded upon cleanliness, which is one half of faith, and the key of prayer. The second of these he conceived to be a duty of so great moment, that he used to say it was the gate of religion, and that the odor of the mouth of him who fasteth is more grateful to God than that of musk. The third is looked upon as so pleasing in the sight of God, that the Caliph Omar Ebn Abdalaziz used to say, "Prayer carries us half way to God; fasting brings us to the door of his palace; and alms procure us admission." The last of these practical religious duties is deemed so necessary, that, according to a tradition of Mohammed, he who dies without performing it, "may as well die a Jew or a Christian." As to the negative precepts and institutions of this religion, the Mohammedans are forbidden the use of wine, and are prohibited from gaming, usury, and the eating of blood and swine's flesh, and whatever dies of itself, or is strangled, or killed by a blow, or by another beast. They are said, however, to comply with the prohibition of gaming (from which chess seems to be excepted) much better than they do with that of wine, under which all strong and inebriating liquors are included; for both the Persians and the Turks are in the habit of drinking freely.

However successful and triumphant from without, the progress of the followers of Mohammed received a considerable check by the civil dissensions which arose among themselves soon after his death. Abubeker and Ali, the former the father-in-law, the latter the son-in-law, of this pretended prophet, aspired both to succeed him in the empire which he had erected. Upon this arose a cruel and tedious contest, whose flames produced that schism which divided the Mohammedans into two great factions; and this separation not only gave rise to a variety of opinions and rites, but also excited the most implacable hatred and the most deadly animosities, which have been continued to the present day. With such furious zeal is this contention still carried on between these two factions, who are distinguished by the name of Sunnites and Shiites, that each party detest and anathematize the other as abominable heretics, and farther from the truth than either the Christians or the Jews. The chief points in which they differ are: 1. The Shiites reject Abubeker, Omar, and Othman, the first three caliphs, as usurpers and intruders; but the Sunnites acknowledge and respect them as rightful caliphs or imams. 2. The Shiites prefer Ali to Mohammed, or, at least, esteem them both equal; but the Sunnites admit neither Ali, nor any of the prophets, to be equal to Mohammed. 3. The Sunnites charge the Shiites with corrupting the Koran, and neglecting its precepts; and the Shiites retort the same charge on the Sunnites. 4. The Sunnites receive the Sonna, or book of traditions of their prophet, as of canonical authority; but the Shiites reject it as apocryphal, and unworthy of credit. The Sunnites are subdivided into four chief sects, of which the first is that of the Hanefites, who generally prevail among the Turks and Tartars; the second, that of the Malecites, whose doctrine is chiefly followed in Barbary, and other parts of Africa; the third, that of the Shafeites, who are chiefly confined to Arabia and Persia; and the fourth orthodox sect is that of the Hanbalites, who are not very numerous, and seldom to be met with out of the limits of Arabia. The heretical sects among the Mohammedans are those which are counted to hold heterodox opinions in fundamentals, or matters of faith; and they are variously compounded and compounded of the opinions of four chief sects—the Motazalites, the Safatians, the Kharejites, and the Shiites.

Ever since the valor of John Sobieski rolled back the hosts of Islamism from Eastern and Central Europe, the civil dominion of the false prophet has been rather retrograde than advancing. A free philosophy in many places is destroying the influence of the system among the better informed; and the barbarism and misery which a bad government inflicts upon the people, weakens its power, and is preparing the way for great changes. The throwing off the Turkish yoke by the Greeks, and the rising greatness of Russia, are symptoms of the approaching subversion of Mohammedanism as a power; and thus the fall of this Eastern Antichrist cannot long be delayed. It is, indeed, even now supported only by the rival interests of Christian powers; and a new combination among them would suddenly withdraw its only support.

[MOLADAH. A town in the south of Judah, toward Edom, assigned to Simeon. Joshua xv. 21, 26; xix. 2: 1 Chron. iv. 28. It was inhabited after the captivity. Neh. xi. 26. Josephus speaks of Malatha as a castle of Idumæa. Eusebius and Jerome speak of it as four miles from Arad, which they placed twenty miles from Hebron. Robinson identifies it with el-Milh, which exhibits "the vestiges of an extensive town with important wells, on the great route from Hebron to the Red Sea through the 'Arabah.]"

MOLE. This word, in our version of Lev. xi. 30, answers to the word מוֹלֵךְ, which Bochart has shown to be the camelion; but he conjectures, with great propriety, that מוֹלֵךְ, translated "weasel," in the preceding verse, is the true word for the mole. The present name for the mole in the east is khuld, which is undeniably the same word as the Hebrew choled. The import of the Hebrew word is, "to creep into," and the same Syriac word implies, "to creep underneath," to creep into by burrowing; which are well-known characteristics of the mole.

MOLECH, מוֹלֵךְ, signifies king. Molech, Mo

loch, Milcom, or Melchom, was a god of the Ammonites. The word Molech signifies "king," and Melchom signifies "their king." Moses in several places forbids the Israelites, under the penalty of death, to dedicate their children to Molech, by making them pass through the fire in honor of that god. Lev. xviii. 21; xx. 2-5. God himself threatens to pour out his wrath against such offenders. There is a great probability that the Hebrews were addicted to the worship of this deity, even before their coming out of Egypt; since the prophet Amos, v. 26, and after him St. Stephen, reproached them with having carried in the wilderness the tabernacle of their god Moloch. Acts vii. 43. Solomon built a temple to Molech upon the Mount of Olives, 1 Kings xi. 7; and Manasseh a long time after imitated his impiety, making his son pass through the fire in honor of Molech. 2 Kings xxi. 3-6. It was chiefly in the valley of Tophet and Hinnom, east of Jerusalem, that this idolatrous worship was paid. Jer. xix. 5, 6, etc. Some are of opinion that they contented themselves with making their children leap over a fire sacred to Molech, by which they consecrated them to some false deity, and by this lustration purified them; this being a usual ceremony among the heathens on other occasions. Some believe that they made them pass through two fires opposite to each other, for the same purpose. But the word הקביר, "to cause to pass through," and the phrase, "to cause to pass through the fire," are used in respect to human sacrifices in Deut. xii. 31; xviii. 10: 2 Kings xvi. 3; xxi. 6: 2 Chron. xxviii. 3; xxxiii. 6. These words are not to be considered as meaning in these instances literally to pass through, and that alone. They are rather synonymous with בשר, to burn, and זבח, to immolate, with which they are interchanged, as may be seen by an examination of Jer. vii. 31; xix. 5: Ezek. xvi. 20, 21: Psalm cvi. 38. In the later periods of the Jewish kingdom, this idol was erected in the valley south of Jerusalem, namely, in the valley of Hinnom, and in the part of that valley called Tophet, תופת, so named from the drums, תופים, which were beaten to prevent the groans and cries of children sacrificed from being heard. Jer. vii. 31, 32; xix. 6-14: Isaiah xxx. 33: 2 Kings xxiii. 10. The place was so abhorrent to the minds of the more recent Jews, that they applied the name ge hinnom or gehenna to the place of torments in a future life. The word gehenna is used in this way, namely, for the place of punishment beyond the grave, very frequently in oriental writers, as far as India. There are various sentiments about the relation that Molech had to the other Pagan divinities. Some believe that Molech was the same as Saturn, to whom it is well known that human sacrifices were offered; others think it was the same with Mercury; others, Venus; others, Mars, or Mithra. Calmet has endeavored to prove that Molech signified the sun, or the king of heaven.

[MOLINISTS. Followers of the Jesuit Molina, who opposed absolute predestination, and endeavored, by the scientia media, to reconcile the Augustinians, Thomists, Semi-Pelagians, and others, who were engaged in the controversy on grace and free-will.]

[MONASTERY. The residence of persons who have bound themselves by monastic vows. It was divided into several parts—every ten monks being subject to a decanus, or dean; every hundred to a centenarius; above these were pates, or abbots. In the year 340, Pachomius built a large monastery on an island of the Nile, and this example was soon extensively followed. Various names are given to the monastery descriptive of its character, the principal of which are cenobium, a common dwelling-place; claustrum, a cloister, or place of confinement; conventus, referring to the common life of the inmates; laura, according to Epiphanius, from the name of a narrow street in Alexandria, the cells of the anchorites being very contracted; mandra, a sheep-fold; hence the president is sometimes called archimandrite. A monastery is frequently designated by one of the four leading orders: the order of Basil, including the Greek monks and Carmelites, or White Friars, so called from the color of their habit; that of Augustin, recognizing the Bishop of Hippo as its founder, though its origin is referred to the year 1038, when four canons of Avignon devoted themselves to an ascetic life—hence the name canons regular; the order of Benedict, founded by him in 528 or 529, in Campania, which became exceedingly popular, the monks being sometimes designated from their dress, Black Friars; and the order of St. Francis, or Gray Friars, which has numerous ramifications. The dissolution of the monasteries in England began in 1312, when the order of Templars was suppressed: in the fifteenth century many monasteries were abolished, and their revenues transferred to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge; a great many were dissolved by Cardinal Wolsey, under the grant of a bull issued by Pope Clement VII., and their revenues applied to the erection and endowment of a college at Ipswich and another at Oxford. Henry VIII. completed the work by procuring an act of Parliament by which they were dissolved, and their revenues transferred to the crown. Whatever may have been the motive which brought about their suppression, England was greatly benefited thereby, as they were nests of depravity and nurseries of superstition. See Burnet's History of the Reformation.]

MONEY. Scripture often speaks of gold, silver, brass, of certain sums of money, of purchases made with money, of current money, of money of a certain weight; but we do not observe coined or stamped money till a late period; which makes it probable that the ancient Hebrews took gold and silver only by weight; that they only considered the purity of the metal, and not the stamp. The most ancient commerce was conducted by barter, or exchanging one sort of merchandise for another. One man gave what he could spare to another, who gave him in return part of his superabundance. Afterward, the more precious metals were used in traffic, as a value more generally known and fixed. Lastly, they gave this metal, by public authority, a certain mark, a certain weight, and a certain degree of alloy to fix its value, and to save buyers and sellers the trouble of weighing and examining the coins. At the siege of Troy, in Homer, no reference is made to gold or silver coined; but the value of things is estimated by the number of oxen they were worth. For instance: they bought wine by exchanging oxen, slaves, skins, iron, etc., for it. When the Greeks first used money, it was only little pieces of iron or copper, called oboli or spits, of which a handful was a drachma, says Plutarch. Herodotus thinks that the Lydians were the first that stamped money of gold or silver, and introduced it into commerce. Others say it was Ishon, King of Thessaly, a son of Deucalion. Others ascribe this honor to Erichthonius, who had been educated by the daughters of Cecrops, King of Athens: others, again, to Phidon, King of Argos. Among the Persians it is said Darius, son of Hystaspes, first coined golden money. Lycurgus banished gold and silver from his commonwealth of Lacedæmon, and only allowed a rude sort of money, made of iron. Janus, or rather the kings of Rome, made a kind of gross money of copper, having on one side the double face of Janus, on the other the prow of a ship. We find nothing concerning the money of the Egyptians, Phenicians, Arabians, or Syrians, before Alexander the Great. In China, to this day, they stamp no money of gold or silver, but only of copper. Gold and silver pass as merchandise. If gold or silver be offered, they take it and pay it by weight, as other goods; so that they are obliged to cut it into pieces with shears for that purpose, and they carry a steelyard at their girdles to weigh it.

But to return to the Hebrews. Abraham weighed out four hundred shekels of silver to purchase Sarah's tomb, Genesis xxiii. 15, 16; and Scripture observes that he paid this in "current money with the merchant." Joseph was sold by his brethren to the Midianites for twenty pieces (in Hebrew twenty shekels) of silver. Gen. xxxvii. 28. The brethren of Joseph bring back with them into Egypt the money they found in their sacks, in the same weight as before. Gen. xliii. 21. The bracelets that Eliezer gave Rebekah weighed ten shekels, and the earrings two shekels. Gen. xxiv. 22. Moses ordered that the weight of five hundred shekels of myrrh, and two hundred and fifty shekels of cinnamon, of the weight of the sanctuary, should be taken, to make the perfume which was to be burnt to the Lord on the golden altar. Exod. xxx. 24. He acquaints us that the Israelites offered for the works of the tabernacle seventy-two thousand talents of brass. Exod. xxxviii. 29. We read, in the books of Samuel, that the weight of Absalom's hair was two hundred shekels of the ordinary weight, or of the king's weight. 2 Sam. xiv. 26. Isaiah, xli. 6, describes the wicked as weighing silver in a balance, to make an idol of it; and Jeremiah, xxxii. 10, weighed seventeen pieces of silver in a pair of scales, to pay for a field he had bought. Isaiah says, "Come, buy wine and milk without money and without price. Wherefore do ye weigh money for that which is not bread?" Amos, viii. 5, represents the merchants as encouraging one another to make the ephah small, wherewith to sell, and the shekel great, wherewith to buy, and to falsify the balances by deceit.

In all these passages three things only are mentioned: 1. The metal, that is, gold or silver, and never copper, that not being used in traffic as money. 2. The weight, a talent, a shekel, a gerah or obolus, the weight of the sanctuary, and the king's weight. 3. The alloy (standard) of pure or fine gold and silver, and of good quality, as received by the merchant. The impression of the coinage is not referred to; but it is said they weighed the silver, or other commodities, by the shekel and by the talent. This shekel, therefore, and this talent, were not fixed and determined pieces of money, but weights applied to things used in commerce. Hence those deceitful balances of the merchants, who would increase the shekel, that is, would augment the weight by which they weighed the gold and silver they were to receive, that they might have a greater quantity than was their due; hence the weight of the sanctuary, the standard of which was preserved in the temple to prevent fraud; hence those prohibitions in the law, "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights," (in Hebrew, stones,) "a great and a small," Deut. xxv. 13; hence those scales that the Hebrews wore at their girdles, Hosea xii. 7, and the Canaanites carried in their hands, to weigh the gold and silver which they received in payment. It is true that in the Hebrew we find Jacob bought a field for a hundred kesitahs, Gen. xxxiii. 19; and that the friends of Job, after his recovery, gave to that model of patience each a kesitah, and a golden pendant for the ears. Job xlii. 11. We also find there daries, (in Hebrew, darcmonim or adarcmonim,) and mina, stateræ, oboli; but this last kind of money was foreign, and is put for other terms, which in the Hebrew only signify the weight of the metal. The kesitah is not well known to us; some take it for a sheep or a lamb; others, for a kind of money, having the impression of a lamb or a sheep; but it was more probably a purse of money. The darcmonim or daries are money of the kings of Persia; and it is agreed that Darius, son of Hystaspes, first coined golden money. Ezekiel, xlv. 12, tells us that the mina makes fifty shekels: he reduces this foreign money to the weight of the Hebrews. The mina might probably be a Persian money originally, and adopted by the Greeks and by the Hebrews. But under the dominion of the Persians, the Hebrews were hardly at liberty to coin money of their own, being in subjection to those princes, and very low in their own country. They were still less able under the Chaldeans, during the Babylonish captivity; or afterward under the Grecians, to whom they were subject till the time of Simon Maccabæus, to whom Antiochus Sides, King of Syria, granted the privilege of coining money in Judea. 1 Macc. xv. 6. And this is the first Hebrew money, properly so called, that we know of. There were shekels and demi-shekels, also the third part of a shekel, and a quarter of a shekel of silver.

The shekel of silver, or the silverling, Isa. vii. 23, originally weighed three hundred and twenty

barleycorns; but it was afterward increased to three hundred and eighty-four barleycorns: its value, being considered equal to four Roman denarii, was two shillings and seven-pence; or, according to Bishop Cumberland, two shillings and four-pence farthing. It is said to have had Aaron's rod on the one side, and the pot of manna on the other. The bekah was equal to half a shekel. Exod. xxxviii. 26. The denarius was one-fourth of a shekel, seven-pence three farthings of our money. The gerah, or meah, Exod. xxx. 13, was the sixth part of the denarius, or diner, and the twenty-fourth part of the shekel. The assar, or assarion, Matt. x. 29, was the ninety-sixth part of a shekel: its value was rather more than a farthing. The farthing, Matt. v. 26, was in value the thirteenth part of a penny sterling. The mite was the half of a farthing, or the twenty-sixth part of a penny sterling. The mina, or maneh, Ezek. xlv. 12, was equal to sixty shekels, which, taken at two shillings and seven-pence, was seven pounds fifteen shillings. The talent was fifty minas; and its value, therefore, three hundred and eighty-seven pounds ten shillings. The gold coins were as follows: A shekel of gold was about fourteen and a half times the value of silver; that is, one pound seventeen shillings and five-pence halfpenny. A talent of gold consisted of three thousand shekels. The drachma was equal to a Roman denarius, or seven-pence three farthings of our money. The didrachma, or tribute-money, Matt. xvii. 24, was equal to fifteen-pence halfpenny. It is said to have been stamped with a harp on one side, and a vine on the other. The stater, or piece of money which Peter found in the fish's mouth, Matt. xvii. 27, was two half shekels. A daric, dram, 1 Chron. xxix. 7, Ezra viii. 27, was a gold coin struck by Darius the Mede. According to Parkhurst, its value was one pound five shillings. A gold penny is stated by Lightfoot to have been equal to twenty-five silver pence.

Hug derives a satisfactory argument for the veracity of the Gospels from the different kinds of money mentioned in them:—The admixture of foreign manners and constitutions proceeded through numberless circumstances of life. Take, for example, the circulation of coin: at one time it is Greek coin; at another, Roman; at another time ancient Jewish. But how accurately is even this stated according to history and the arrangement of things! The ancient imposts which were introduced before the Roman dominion, were valued according to the Greek coinage; for example, the taxes of the temple, the διδραχμον, Matt. xvii. 24. The offerings were paid in these, Mark xii. 42: Luke xxi. 2. A payment which proceeded from the temple treasury was made according to the ancient national payment by weight, Matt. xxvi. 15; but in common business, trade, wages, sale, etc., the assis and denarius and Roman coin were usual. Matt. x. 29; xx. 3: Luke xii. 6: Mark xiv. 5: John xii. 5; vi. 7. The more modern state taxes are likewise paid in the coin of the nation which exercises at the time the greatest authority. Matt. xxii. 19: Mark xii. 15: Luke xx. 24. Writers who, in each little circumstance which otherwise would pass by unnoticed, so accurately describe the period of time, must certainly have had a personal knowledge of it.

MONEY-CHANGERS, in the Gospels, were persons who exchanged native for foreign coin, to enable those who came to Jerusalem from distant countries to purchase the necessary sacrifices. In our Lord's time they had established themselves in the court of the temple; a profanation which had probably grown up with the influence of Roman manners, which allowed the argentarii [money-dealers] to establish their usurious mensas, tables, by the statues of the gods, even at the feet of Janus, in the most holy places, in porticibus Basilicarum, or in the temples, pone ædem Castoris. The following extract from Buckingham's Travels among the Arabs is illustrative: "The mosque at the time of our passing through it was full of people, though these were not worshippers, nor was it at either of the usual hours of public prayers. Some of the parties were assembled to smoke, others to play at chess, and some apparently to drive bargains of trade, but certainly none to pray. It was, indeed, a living picture of what we might believe the temple at Jerusalem to have been, when those who sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, and the changers of money sitting there, were driven out by Jesus with a scourge of cords, and their tables overturned. It was, in short, a place of public resort and thoroughfare, a house of merchandise, as the temple of the Jews had become in the days of the Messiah."

MONK anciently denoted a person who retired from the world to give himself up wholly to God, and to live in solitude and abstinence. The word is derived from the Latin monachus, and that from the Greek μοναχός, solitary. The original of monks seems to have been this: The persecutions which attended the first ages of the gospel forced some Christians to retire from the world, and live in deserts and places more private and unfrequented, in hopes of finding that peace and comfort among beasts which were denied them among men; and this being the case of some very extraordinary persons, their example gave such reputation to retirement, that the practice was continued when the reason of its commencement ceased. After the empire became Christian, instances of this kind were numerous; and those whose security had obliged them to live separately and apart, became afterward united into societies. We may also add, that the mystic theology, which gained ground toward the close of the third century, contributed to produce the same effect, and to drive men into solitude for the purposes of devotion. The monks, at least the ancient ones, were distinguished into solitaries, cœnobites, and sarabaites. The first were those who lived in places remote from all towns and habitations of men, as do still some of the hermits. The cœnobites were those who lived in community with several others in the same house, and under the same superiors. The sarabaites were strolling monks, having no fixed rule of residence. Those who are now called monks are cœnobites, who live together in a convent or monastery, who make vows of living according to a certain rule established by the founder, and wear a habit which distinguishes their order.

Those that are endowed, or have a fixed revenue, are most properly called monks, monachi: as the Chartereux, Benedictines, Bernardines, etc. The Mendicants, or those that beg, as the Capuchins and Franciscans, are more properly called religious, and friars, though the names are frequently confounded.

The first monks were those of St. Anthony, who, toward the close of the fourth century, formed them into a regular body, engaged them to live in society with each other, and prescribed to them fixed rules for the direction of their conduct. These regulations, which Anthony had made in Egypt, were soon introduced into Palestine and Syria by his disciple Hilarion. Almost about the same time, Aones, or Eugenius, with their companions, Gaddanus and Azyzas, instituted the monastic order in Mesopotamia and the adjacent countries; and their example was followed with such rapid success, that in a short time the whole east was filled with a lazy set of mortals, who, abandoning all human connections, advantages, pleasures, and concerns, wore out a languishing and miserable existence amidst hardships of want, and various kinds of suffering, in order to arrive at a more close and rapturous communication with God and angels. From the east this gloomy institution passed into the west, and first into Italy and its neighboring islands, though it is uncertain who transplanted it thither. St. Martin, the celebrated Bishop of Tours, erected the first monasteries in Gaul, and recommended this religious solitude with such power and efficacy, both by his instruction and example, that his funeral is said to have been attended by no less than two thousand monks. From hence the monastic discipline extended its progress gradually through the other provinces and countries of Europe. There were besides, the monks of St. Basil, called in the east calogeri, from καλὸς γέρων, a good old man, and those of St. Jerome, the hermits of St. Augustin, and afterward those of St. Benedict and St. Bernard: at length came those of St. Francis and St. Dominic, with a legion of others.

Toward the close of the fifth century, the monks, who had formerly lived only for themselves in solitary retreats, and had never thought of assuming any rank among the sacerdotal order, were gradually distinguished from the populace, and endowed with such opulence and honorable privileges that they found themselves in a condition to claim an eminent station among the pillars and supporters of the Christian community. The fame of their piety and sanctity was so great, that bishops and presbyters were often chosen out of their order; and the passion of erecting edifices and convents in which the monks and holy virgins might serve God in the most commodious manner, was at this time carried beyond all bounds. However, their licentiousness, even in this century, was become a proverb; and they are said to have excited the most dreadful tumults and seditions in various places. The monastic orders were at first under the immediate jurisdiction of the bishops, from which they were exempted by the Roman pontiff about the end of the seventh century; and the monks, in return, devoted themselves wholly to advance the interest and to maintain the dignity of the bishop of Rome. This immunity which they obtained was a fruitful source of licentiousness and disorder, and occasioned the greatest part of the vices with which they were afterward so justly charged.

In the eighth century the monastic discipline was extremely relaxed, both in the eastern and western provinces, and all efforts to restore it were ineffectual. Nevertheless, this kind of institution was in the highest esteem; and nothing could equal the veneration that was paid about the close of the ninth century to such as devoted themselves to the sacred gloom and indolence of a convent. This veneration caused several kings and emperors to call them to their courts, and to employ them in civil affairs of the greatest moment. Their reformation was attempted by Louis the Meek, but the effect was of short duration. In the eleventh century, they were exempted by the popes from the authority of their sovereigns, and new orders of monks were continually established, insomuch that in the Council of Lateran, that was held A. D. 1215, a decree was passed, by the advice of Innocent III., to prevent any new monastic institutions, and several were entirely suppressed. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries it appears, from the testimony of the best writers, that the monks were generally lazy, illiterate, profligate, and licentious epicures, whose views in life were confined to opulence, idleness, and pleasure. However, the Reformation had a manifest influence in restraining their excesses, and rendering them more circumspect and cautious in their external conduct.

Monks are distinguished by the color of their habits into black, white, gray, etc. Among the monks, some are called monks of the choir; others professed monks, and others lay monks; which last are destined for the service of the convent, and have neither clericate nor literature. Cloistered monks are those who actually reside in the house, in opposition to extra monks, who have benefices depending on the monastery. Monks are also distinguished into reformed, whom the civil and ecclesiastical authority have made masters of ancient convents, and empowered to retrieve the ancient discipline, which had been relaxed; and ancient, who remain in the convent, to live in it according to its establishment at the time when they made their vows, without obliging themselves to any new reform. Anciently the monks were all laymen, and were only distinguished from the rest of the people by a peculiar habit and an extraordinary piety or devotion. Not only the monks were prohibited the priesthood, but even the priests were expressly prohibited from becoming monks, as appears from the letters of St. Gregory. Pope Syricus was the first who called them to the clericate, on account of some great scarcity of priests that the Church was supposed to labor under; and since that time the priesthood has been usually united to the monastical profession.

MONOPHYSITES. See HYPOSTATIC UNION. [The Monophysites comprehend the four principal branches of schismatics from the Greek Church.—The SYRIAN JACOBITES, who trace the origin of their name to the Apostle James rather than to Jacob Baradaeus, number 150,000. They are governed by a so-called Patriarch of Antioch, who resides at a convent near Merdin. Since 878 he has been styled Ignatius, after the martyr-bishop of Antioch. Their second dignitary, a kind of metropolitan, primate of Tagrit, resides near Mosul: he is termed a mophrian. There are Romish Jacobites in Syria, who have a patriarch at Aleppo. In 1847, the Bishop of Merdin, the chief confidant of the Jacobite patriarch, became a Romanist.—The Copts, or Egyptian Jacobites, are in communion with those of Syria, though they differ from them in regard to certain ceremonies. The most recent report estimates their number at 150,000 or 200,000. The see of Alexandria, held by them before the Melchite succession was restored, is still, nominally, held by their anti-patriarch, Peter VII., who resides at Cairo. They abstain from swine's flesh, take off their slippers and keep on their turban when they enter a church, and observe the seven seasons for private devotion. The lower classes, who cannot repeat a seventh part of the Psalter at each service, repeat the "Pater" seven times, and the "Kyrie Eleison" forty-one times—using a string of beads for the reckoning. The Popish Copts are few: they have four Franciscan establishments, and a "Sisterhood of the Good Shepherd" has been recently founded at Cairo. The Egyptians generally prefer Mohammedanism to Popery. All the Nubian Jacobites became Mohammedans in the twelfth century.—The ABYSSINIANS are not allowed to have a patriarch of their own: they are under the jurisdiction of the Jacobite patriarch at Cairo. Their abuna, or metropolitan, is not permitted to ordain as many as twelve bishops, as that number of suffragans could institute an independent patriarch. The Abuna of Axum, now their only bishop, is always a foreigner, chosen by the Coptic ecclesiastics, often a layman, and generally totally unfit for the office. Usually ignorant of both the spoken and sacred languages, in consecrating priests, which he does by thousands, on his first arrival, he of course admits to ordination many who have no qualifications for the sacred office. The Abyssinians number about a million: they have numerous churches and monasteries: their creed and usages are like those of the Copts, only they observe the seventh-day Sabbath as well as the Lord's day, circumcision, the distinction between clean and unclean meats—administer the eucharist to none under twenty-five years of age, and give larger portions of the bread to persons of higher rank! They have some notions of purgatory, are fond of pageants, are grossly superstitious, and of course very ignorant. Nevertheless, the repeated attempts of the Papists to bring them over to their interest, notwithstanding partial successes, have proved a failure. When Dr. Gobat, the present bishop of Jerusalem, was in Abyssinia, he found a hearty welcome, and was repeatedly solicited to assume the office of abuna. This, however, may have been a mere compliment.—The ARMENIANS adopted Eutychnianism from their great aversion to Nestorianism. In the eleventh century, an apparent union was formed between them and the Jacobites, founded on their common abhorrence of the Melchite doctrine; but they soon were ranged again under their distinctive colors—the Armenians as Eutychnians, believing that the divinity and humanity were united in one single nature, and not in one compound nature, according to the notion of the Jacobite Monophysites. The Armenians have, at present, three patriarchates. The chief patriarch is the catholikos of Etchmiadzin, who, since 1828, has been appointed by the Emperor of Russia. He has under him a synod and an imperial procurator: his jurisdiction extends through Turcomania. The second is the catholikos of Sis, in Cilicia: he has a limited province in Syria and the south of Anatolia. The third is the catholikos of Aghtamar, an island in Lake Van: he holds a dubious sway over Koordistan; the title having been self-arrogated in 1114, unrecognized for nearly two centuries, and regarded still with some degree of invidious feeling. There are some minor patriarchs—one at Constantinople, who presides over Turkish Armenia; another at Jerusalem, for Palestine; another at Kamenietz, for Russia and Poland. The number of Armenians, as computed by themselves, is nearly four millions. Like the Jews, they are greatly dispersed through the world. They have numerous wealthy merchants; and literature has been considerably promoted among them. They have printing-presses at most of their stations; and splendid editions of the Armenian Bible are issued from their press at Etchmiadzin. Their earliest version, translated by Isaac the Great and Miesrob, the inventor of their written character, dates from the fifth century, and is considered of great value. Their ancient manuscripts and other literary treasures are chiefly found in the island of St. Lazero, near Venice, among the half-Romanized Melchitarites. The resemblance of this sect to the Papists in vestments and ceremonies, accounts for the partial success of the latter in their attempts to proselyte them. In the Turkish empire there are 45,000 Armenian Uniates, besides others in Italy, Hungary, and Russia. The American missionaries have had encouraging success in their efforts to evangelize the Armenians. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH, ARMENIAN CHURCH, COPTS, and JACOBITES.]

[MONOTESSARON. One of four, applied to a Harmony of the Gospels, in which the four are digested into one, all the repetitions being excluded. That of Tatian is the most ancient. See HARMONY OF THE SCRIPTURES.]

MONOTHELITES, a denomination in the seventh century. See HYPOSTATIC UNION, [and MARONITES.]

[MONTANISTS. Followers of Montanus, who lived in the second century. He was a native of Ardaban, in Mysia, on the borders of Phrygia—hence they are called Phrygians, and Cataphrygians—also Pepuzians, from a village in Phrygia, called by Montanus the New Jerusalem. He professed to be the promised Paraclete. Two ladies, Priscilla and Maximilla, abandoned their husbands and associated with him as prophetesses. The pneumatici, or spiritually-minded, as they called themselves, in opposition to their opponents, who were called psychici, the carnally-minded, condemned second marriages, considered wedlock a spiritual union, to be renewed beyond the grave: they imposed rigid fasts, advocated celibacy, and encouraged martyrdom. Being opposed by Praxeas and Eleutherus, they formed themselves into an independent communion, which spread widely, and split into various parties, as the Quintillani, Priscilliani, etc. Some of them agreed with Sabellius and Noetus. Eusebius branded them as heretics. Some of the fathers represent Montanus as a monster in crime; and an anonymous writer, who wrote about thirteen years after the death of Montanus, reports that he and Maximilla destroyed themselves by hanging, but he gives no vouchers for the report. Tertullian adopted Montanism, and defended it in many treatises; but its adherents were excommunicated by several bishops.]

MONTHS, יָרֵדִים, sometimes also called חֲדָשִׁים, new moons, from the circumstance of their commencing with the new moon, anciently had no separate names, with the exception of the first, which was called Abib, that is, "the month of the young ears of corn." Exod. xiii. 4; xliii. 15; xxxiv. 18; Deut. xvi. 1. During the captivity, the Hebrews adopted the Babylonian names for their months, which were as follows, and they were reckoned thus:

|---|---------------------------|
| 1. ניסן , Nisan , | |
| From the new moon of March, Esther iii. 7. | |
| 2. כִּיּוֹן , Kif or Ziv , also | |
| called אֲבִיר , Avir , | of April, Neh. ii. 1. |
| 3. סִיוֹן , Sivan , | of May, 1 Kings vi. 1. |
| 4. תַּמְמוּז , Tammuz , | of June, Esther viii. 9. |
| 5. אָב , Ab , | of July. |
| 6. אֵלּוּל , Elul , | of August. |
| 7. תִּשְׁרִי , Tishri , also, | |
| יָרֵד הָאֲדָמִים , | of Sept., Neh. vi. 15. |
| 8. בּוּל , Bul , also מֶרְחֶשֶׁן , | of Oct., 1 Kings viii. 2. |
| | of November, 1 Kings |
| | vi. 38. |
| 9. כִּסְלֵו , Kislev , | of December, Neh. i. 1. |
| 10. טֵבֶת , Tebeth , | of January, Esth. ii. 16. |
| 11. שֶׁבַט , Shebat , | of February, Zech. i. 7. |
| 12. אָדָר , Adar , | |

The first month here mentioned, Nisan, was originally called Abib. The intercalary month is denominated in Hebrew יָאָדָר.

MOON. Particular sacrifices were enjoined by Moses at every new moon, which day was also celebrated as a feast. [See NEW MOON.] It is promised in Psalm cxxi. 6, "The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night." The effect of a coup de soleil, or stroke of the sun, is well known, and in some climates the beams of the moon are reputed hurtful. Anderson, in his "Description of the East," says, "One must here (in Batavia) take great care not to sleep in the beams of the moon uncovered. I have seen many people whose neck has become crooked, so that they looked more to the side than forward. I will not decide whether it is to be ascribed to the moon, as people imagine here." In some of the southern parts of Europe the same opinions are entertained of the pernicious influence of the moonbeams. An English gentleman walking in the evening in the garden of a Portuguese nobleman at Lisbon, was most seriously admonished by the owner to put on his hat to protect him from the moonbeams. The fishermen in Sicily are said to cover, during the night, the fish which they expose to dry on the sea-shore, alleging that the beams of the moon cause them to putrefy.

[MORALITIES. Theatrical representations acted by the monks in the dark ages, designed to make virtue desirable and vice detestable.]

MORAL OBLIGATION. Different opinions have been held as to the ground of moral obligation. Grotius, Belguy, and Dr. Samuel Clarke, place it in the eternal and necessary fitness of things. To this there are two objections. The first is, that it leaves the distinction between virtue and vice, in a great measure, arbitrary and indefinite, dependent upon our perception of fitness and unfitness, which, in different individuals, will greatly differ. The second is, that when a fitness or unfitness is proved, it is no more than the discovery of a natural essential difference or congruity, which alone cannot constitute a moral obligation to choose what is fit, and to reject what is unfit. When we have proved a fitness in a certain course of action, we have not proved that it is obligatory. A second step is necessary before we can reach this conclusion. Cudworth, Butler, Price, and others, maintain that virtue carries its own obligation in itself; that the understanding at once perceives a certain action to be right, and therefore it ought to be performed. Several objections lie to this notion: 1. It supposes the understandings of men to determine precisely in the same manner concerning all virtuous and vicious actions; which is contrary to fact. 2. It supposes a previous rule, by which the action is determined to be right; but if the revealed will of God is not to be taken into consideration, what common rule exists among men? There is evidently no such rule, and therefore no means of certainly determining what is right. 3. If a common standard were known among men, and if the understandings of men determined in the same manner as to the conformity, or otherwise, of an action to that standard, what renders it a matter of obligation that any one should perform it? The rule must be proved to be binding, or no ground of obligation is established.

An action is obligatory, say others, because it is agreeable to the moral sense. This is the theory of Lord Shaftesbury and Dr. Hutcheson. By moral sense appears to be meant an instinctive approbation of right and abhorrence of wrong, prior to all reflection on their nature or their consequences. If any thing else were understood by it, then the moral sense must be the same with conscience, which we know to vary with the judgment, and cannot, therefore, be the basis of moral obligation. If conscience be not meant, then the moral sense must be considered as instinctive; a notion, certainly, which is disproved by the whole moral history of man. It may, indeed, be conceded, that such is the constitution of the human soul, that when those distinctions between actions, which have been taught by religious tradition or direct revelation, are known in their nature, relations, and consequences, the calm and sober judgments of men will approve of them; and that especially when they are considered abstractedly, that is, as not affecting and controlling their own interests and passions immediately, virtue may command complacency, and vice provoke abhorrence; but that, independent of reflection on their nature or their consequences, there is an instinctive principle in man which abhors evil and loves good, is contradicted by that variety of opinion and feeling on the vices and virtues which obtains among all un instructed nations. We applaud the forgiveness of an injury as magnanimous: a savage despises it as mean. We think it a duty to support and cherish aged parents; many nations, on the contrary, abandon them as useless, and throw them to the beasts of the field. Innumerable instances of this contrariety might be adduced, which are all contrary to the notion of instinctive sentiment. Instincts operate uniformly, but this assumed moral sense does not. Besides, if it be mere matter of feeling, independent of judgment, to love virtue and abhor vice, the morality of the exercise of this principle is questionable; for it would be difficult to show that there is any more morality, properly speaking, in the affections and disgusts of instinct than in those of the palate. If judgment, the knowledge and comparison of things, be included, then this principle supposes a uniform and universal individual revelation as to the nature of things to every man, or an intuitive faculty of determining their moral quality; both of which are too absurd to be maintained.

The only satisfactory conclusion on this subject is that which refers moral obligation to the will of God. "Obligation," says Warburton, "necessarily implies an obliger, and the obliger must be different from, and not one and the same with the obliged. Moral obligation, that is, the obligation of a free agent, further implies a law which enjoins and forbids; but a law is the imposition of an intelligent superior, who hath power to exact conformity thereto." This law-giver is God; and whatever may be the reasons which have led him to enjoin this, and to prohibit that, it is plain that the obligation to obey lies not merely in the fitness and propriety of a creature obeying an infinitely wise and good Creator, (though such a fitness exists,) but in that obedience being enjoined. For, since the question respects the duty of a created being with reference to his Creator, nothing can be more conclusive than that the Creator has an absolute right to the obedience of his creatures; and that the creature is in duty obliged to obey him from whom it not only has received being, but by whom that being is constantly sustained. It has, indeed, been said, that even if it be admitted that I am obliged to obey the will of God, the question is still open, "Why am I obliged to obey his will?" and that this brings us round to the former answer: because he can only will what is, upon the whole, best for his creatures. But this is confounding that which may be, and doubtless is, a rule to God in the commands which he issues, with that which really obliges the creature. Now that which in truth obliges the creature is not the nature of the commands issued by God, but the relation in which the creature itself stands to God. If a creature can have no existence, nor any power or faculty, independently of God, it can have no right to employ its faculties independently of him; and if it have no right to employ its faculties in an independent manner, the right to rule its conduct must rest with the Creator alone; and from this results the obligation of absolute and universal obedience.

MORAVIANS, or UNITED BRETHREN. The name of Moravians, or Moravian Brethren, was in England given to the members of a foreign Protestant Church, calling itself the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren. This Church formerly consisted of three branches, the Bohemian, Moravian, and Polish. After its renovation in the year 1722, some of its members came to England in 1728, who, being of the Moravian branch, became known by that appellation; and all those who joined them, and adopted their doctrines and discipline, have ever since been called Moravians. Strictly speaking, however, that name is not applicable to them nor generally admitted, either by themselves or in any public documents, in which they are called by their proper name, the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren.

The few remaining members of the ancient Church of the United Brethren in Bohemia, Moravia, and Poland being much persecuted by the popish clergy, many of them left all their possessions, and fled with their families into Silesia and Saxony. In Saxony they found protection from a Saxon nobleman, Nicholas Lewis, Count of Zinzendorf, who gave them some waste land on one of his estates, on which, in 1722, they built a village at the foot of a hill, called the Hut-Berg, or Watch-Hill. This occasioned them to call their settlement Herrnhut, "the watch of the Lord." Hence their enemies designated them, in derision, by the name of Herrnhuters, which is altogether improper; but by it they are known in some countries abroad. By their own account, the community derive their origin from the ancient Bohemian and Moravian Brethren, who existed as a distinct people ever since the year 1457, when, separating from those who took up arms in defence of their protestations against popish errors, they formed a plan for Church-fellowship and discipline, agreeable to their insight into the Scriptures, and called themselves at first, Fratres Legis Christi, or Brethren after the Law of Christ; and afterward, on being joined by others of the same persuasion in other places, Unitas Fratrum, or Fratres Unitatis. By degrees they established congregations in various places, and spread themselves into Moravia and other neighboring states. Being anxious to preserve among themselves regular episcopal ordination, and, at a synod held at Lhota in 1467, taking into consideration the scarcity of ministers regularly ordained among them, they chose three of their priests ordained by Calixtine bishops, and sent them to Stephen, Bishop of the Waldenses, then residing in Austria, by whom they were consecrated bishops; co-bishops and conseniores being appointed from the rest of their presbyters. In 1468 a great persecution arose against them, and many were put to death. In 1481 they were banished from Moravia, when many of them fled as far as Mount Caucasus, and established themselves there, till driven away by subsequent troubles.

In the mean time, disputes respecting points of doctrine, the enmity of the Papists, and other causes, raised continual disturbances and great persecutions at various periods, till the Reformation by Luther, when they opened a correspondence with that eminent reformer and his associates, and entered into several negotiations, both with him and Calvin, concerning the extension of the Protestant cause. But their strict adherence to the discipline of their own Church, founded, in their view, on that of the primitive Churches, and the acknowledged impossibility of its application among the mixed multitude, of which the Lutheran and Calvinist Churches consisted, occasioned a cessation of coöperation, and, in the sequel, the Brethren were again left to the mercy of their persecutors, by whom their churches were destroyed, and their ministers banished, till the year 1575, when they obtained an edict from the Emperor of Germany for the public exercise of their religion. This toleration was renewed in 1609, and liberty granted them to erect new churches. But a civil war, which broke out in Bohemia in 1612, and a violent persecution which followed it in 1621, again occasioned the dispersion of their ministers, and brought great distress upon the Brethren in general. Some fled into England, others to Saxony and Brandenburg; while many, overcome by the severity of the persecution, conformed to the rites of the Church of Rome.

About the year 1640, by incessant persecution, and the most oppressive measures, this ancient Church was brought to so low an ebb, that it appeared nearly extinct. The persecutions which took place at the beginning of the eighteenth century were the occasion that many of the scattered descendants of the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren at length resolved to quit their native land, and seek liberty of conscience in foreign countries. Some emigrated into Silesia, and others into Upper Lusatia, a province of Saxony, adjoining to Bohemia. The latter, as before observed, found a protector in Nicholas Count Zinzendorf, a pious, zealous man, and a Lutheran by education. He hoped that the religious state of the Lutherans in his neighborhood would be greatly improved by the conversation and example of these devout emigrants; and he therefore sought to prevail upon the latter to join the Lutheran Church altogether. To this the Brethren objected, being unwilling to give up their ancient discipline, and would rather proceed to seek an asylum in another place; when the Count, struck with their steadfast adherence to the tenets of their forefathers, began more maturely to examine their pretensions; and being convinced of the justness of them, he procured for the Brethren the renovation of their ancient constitution, and ever after proved a most zealous promoter of their cause. He is, therefore, very justly esteemed by them, as the chief instrument, in the hand of God, in restoring the sinking Church, and, in general, gratefully remembered for his disinterested and indefatigable labors in promoting the interests of religion, both at home and abroad. In 1735, having been examined and received into the clerical order, by the theological faculty of Tubingen, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, he was consecrated a bishop of the Brethren's Church.

After the establishment of a regular congregation of the United Brethren at Herrnhut, multitudes of pious persons from various parts flocked to it, many of whom had private opinions in religious matters, to which they were strongly attached. This occasioned great disputes, which even threatened the destruction of the society; but by the indefatigable exertions of Count Zinzendorf, these disputes were allayed, and the statutes being drawn up, and agreed to in 1727, for better regulation, brotherly love and union were reëstablished, and no schism whatever, in point of doctrine, has since that period disturbed the peace of the Church.

Though the Brethren acknowledge no other standard of truth than the Sacred Scriptures, they in general profess to adhere to the Augsburg Confession of Faith. Their Church is episcopal; but though they consider episcopal ordination as necessary to qualify the servants of the Church for their respective functions, they allow to their bishops no elevation of rank or preëminent authority. The Moravian Church, from its first establishment, has been governed by synods, consisting of deputies from all the congregations, and by other subordinate bodies, which they call conferences. According to their regulations, episcopal ordination, of itself, does not confer any power to preside over one or more congregations; and a bishop can discharge no office except by the appointment of a synod, or of its delegate, The Elders' Conference of the Unity. Presbyters among them can perform every function of the bishop, except ordination. Deacons are assistants to presbyters, much in the same way as in the Church of England. Deaconesses are retained for the purpose of privately admonishing their own sex, and visiting them in their sickness; but they are not permitted to teach in public, and, far less, to administer the sacraments. They have also seniores civiles, or lay elders, in contradistinction to spiritual elders, or bishops, who are appointed to watch over the constitution and discipline of the Unity of the Brethren, etc. The synods are generally held once in seven years; and besides all the bishops, and the deputies sent by each congregation, those women who have appointments as above described, if on the spot, are also admitted as hearers, and may be called upon to give their advice in what relates to the ministerial labor among their own sex; but they have no decisive vote in the synod. The votes of all the other members are equal. In questions of importance, or of which the consequence cannot be foreseen, neither the majority of votes, nor the unanimous consent of all present, can decide; but recourse is had to the lot, which, however, is never made use of except after mature deliberation and prayer; nor is any thing submitted to its decision which does not, after being thoroughly weighed, appear to the assembly eligible in itself.

[They have colonies in Germany, Holland, England, and America, superintended by prominent boards, responsible to the Elders' Conference, at Bertholdsdorf, near Herrnhut. On the continent of Europe they have seventeen settlements, in which no one not in full communion is allowed to be a permanent resident. The unmarried men and youth, not belonging to families in the settlements, reside together, under the care of an elder of their own class, in the "Single Brethren's House." A similar house is provided for females. They have several institutions of learning and a theological seminary. In Great Britain and Ireland they have a membership of five thousand, and several educational institutions. In the United States they have twenty-eight settlements and congregations, several home missions, institutions of learning at Bethlehem, Nazareth, Litiz, Pa., and Salem, N. C., and some six thousand members. They have seventy mission settlements, among the Hottentots, Greenlanders, Esquimaux Indians, West India Negroes, etc., and about seventy thousand members. Their entire membership amounts to about one hundred thousand. Though a small sect, and not wealthy, they have been very zealous and successful in the missionary cause. Highly appreciating their valuable services, other Christians, in England, contribute liberally to the support of their missions.]

MORDECAI was the son of Jair, of the race of Saul, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin. He was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, King of Judah, A. M. 3405. Esther ii. 5, 6. He settled at Shushan, and there lived to the first year of Cyrus, when it is thought he returned to Jerusalem, with several other captives; but he afterward returned to Shushan. There is great probability that Mordecai was very young when taken into captivity. The book of Esther gives the whole history of Mordecai's elevation, the punishment of Haman, and the wonderful deliverance of the Jews, in clear and regular narrative. But it may be asked, For what reason did Mordecai refuse to pay that respect to Haman, the neglect of which incensed him against the Jews? Esther iii. 1-16. Some think the reason was because Haman was an Amalekite; a people whom the Israelites had been commissioned from God to destroy, because of the injuries they had formerly done them. Deut. xxv. 17-19. But this scarcely seems to be a sufficient account of Mordecai's refusing civil respect to Haman, who was first minister of state; especially when by so doing he exposed his whole nation to imminent danger. Besides, if nothing but civil respect had been intended to Haman, the king need not have enjoined it on his servants after he had made him his first minister and chief favorite, Esther iii. 1, 2: they would have been ready enough to show it on all occasions. Probably, therefore, the reverence ordered to be done to this great man was a kind of divine honor, such as was sometimes addressed to the Persian monarchs themselves; which, being a species of idolatry, Mordecai refused for the sake of a good conscience. And perhaps it was because Haman knew that his refusal was the result of his Jewish principles, that he determined to attempt the destruction of the Jews in general, knowing they were all of the same mind. As to another question, why Haman cast lots, in order to fix the day for the massacre of the Jews, Esther iii. 7—from whence the feast of Purim, which is a Persic word, and signifies lots, took its name, Esther ix. 26—it was no doubt owing to the superstitious conceit which anciently prevailed, of some days being more fortunate than others for any undertaking: in short, he endeavored to find out, by this way of divining, what month, or what day of the month, was most unfortunate to the Jews, and most fortunate for the success of his bloody design against them. It was very remarkable, that while Haman sought for direction in this affair from the Persian idols, the God of Israel so overruled the lot as to fix the intended massacre to almost a year's distance, from Nisan, the first month, to Adar, the last of the year, in order to give time and opportunity to Mordecai and Esther to defeat the conspiracy.

MORIAH, MOUNT. A hill on the north-east side of Jerusalem, once separated from that of Acra by a broad valley, which, according to Josephus, was filled up by the Asmoneans, and the two hills converted into one. In the time of David it stood apart from the city, and was under cultivation; for here was the threshing-floor of Araunah, the Jebusite, which David bought, on which to erect an altar to God. 2 Sam. xxiv. 15-25. On the same spot Solomon afterward built the temple, 2 Chron. iii. 1; when it was included within the walls of the city. Here also Abraham is supposed to have been directed to offer his son Isaac. Gen. xxii. 1, 2. Moriah implies "vision;" and the "land of Moriah," mentioned in the above passage in the history of Abraham, was probably so called from being seen "afar off." It included the whole group of hills on which Jerusalem was afterward built. [See JERUSALEM.]

[MORMONS. This society originated with Joseph Smith, who was born in Sharon, Vt., in 1805. In 1815, he removed with his parents to Palmyra, N. Y. He says that in 1820, while praying in a grove, he saw "two personages," who informed him that his sins were pardoned, and that all the religious sects were almost equally erroneous. In 1823, an angel told him that the Indians are a remnant of the Israelites, and that certain records, written by the Jewish prophets, were buried in the earth at a spot which the angel indicated, and that he was to bring them to light. On Sept. 23, he found, in the side of a hill, near Palmyra, a stone box containing the "Record"—a collection of thin plates of gold, held together by three rings. Part of this golden book was sealed, but a portion open to inspection was engraven with "reformed Egyptian characters." With the book were two crystal lenses, "set in the two rims of the bow," like a huge pair of spectacles, which he said were the Urim and Thummim. The angel, who frequently visited him, did not permit him to remove them until September 22, 1827. Being exposed to personal violence, he fled to Pennsylvania, with his golden plates concealed in a barrel of beans. With the aid of the Urim and Thummim he translated the unsealed portion, which composed a bulky volume, which he called the "Book of Mormon"—from mor, a contraction for more, and mon, Egyptian for good! Mormon too was the name of a prophet, who engraved on plates a summary of the history and prophecies of the American Israelites. These plates his son, Moroni, hid in a hill called Cumora, A. D. 420. The angel would not allow Smith to show the golden plates to any. Three witnesses, however, say that the angel showed the plates to them. Eight others, three being the father and brothers of Smith, and four belonging to a family named Whitmer, made a similar statement. A copy on paper of a portion of the plates was given by Smith to one of his followers, who showed it to Professor Anthon, who could not recognize the characters as belonging to any language. A book of "Doctrines and Covenants," containing the revelations to Smith, made from time to time, was afterward published. One of those revelations restored the "Aaronic priesthood:" another enjoined baptism by immersion: another instituted "apostles:" others contained injunctions concerning the temporal affairs of the Church. In three years he gained some thirty converts. Afterward they multiplied very fast. Smith removed to Kirtland, Ohio, and set up a mill, a store, and a bank. In 1832 he was tarred and feathered by a mob; and in 1833, a thousand of his followers, who had congregated at Independence, Mo.—Smith's "Zion"—were expelled by the people, because of their immoral principles, especially the doctrine of a community of wives. Smith's bank having failed, he joined his followers in Clay county, Mo.; and in 1833, he, with his brother Hiram, was imprisoned, and the Mormons were banished from Missouri. They fled to Illinois, where, in 1839, they were joined by Smith, who had escaped from prison. Their number at that time amounted to fifteen thousand persons. They chose the village of Commerce for their residence, changing its name to Nauvoo, a Mormon word for Beautiful. The Nauvoo legion was organized, and Smith made general of it. In 1841, a revelation ordered the erection of a temple, the saints being required to pay tithes to defray the expense. The town increased fast, and the temple gradually rose, a million of dollars being expended on it. Though his community was an imperium in imperio, Smith still claimed to be a citizen of the United States, and in 1843 offered himself for the presidency! For making free with Smith's name, a Nauvoo paper was suppressed and its office razed by the Mormon Council, whereupon the editors obtained a warrant against Smith, which he disregarded. The county force prepared to execute it, and the Saints put their city in a state of defence. Smith, however, surrendered on the promise of protection from the governor. But on the 27th of June, 1844, the outraged people broke into Carthage prison, and Joseph and Hiram were shot. On the prophet's death, Sidney Rigdon, his earliest associate, who knew "all his secrets," aspired to his office; but as he rather too publicly advocated the "spiritual wife" doctrine, which had brought them into trouble, the Saint-elect Brigham Young for prophet—an office which he still retains. Rigdon was expelled—the temple completed; but in 1845, their sanguinary conflicts with the citizens were renewed; and in 1846 they bade farewell to Nauvoo, and with incredible difficulty found their way across the Rocky Mountains, to the valley of the great Salt Lake, where they have laid out several cities, one of them having a plot of several acres for a temple, whose magnificence is to far exceed that of Nauvoo. From this retreat they have sent forth missionaries into various parts of the world, and tens of thousands of persons from various lands have flocked and are still flocking to their Zion in Utah, which, strangely enough, is now recognized as a territory of the United States. The authority of the Federal government is of course set at naught, and Mormon laws and customs exclusively prevail. In addition to their original impostures—revelations, miracles, and prophecies—they advocate the materiality of the Deity, and practice polygamy with unblushing effrontery. The Report of the Judges of the State of Utah, Captain Stansbury's Description of the Mormon Settlement, The Seer, edited by Orson Pratt, a Mormon, and other Mormon publications, show that their creed, morals, and government are alike abominable. Their own account of their origin and principles is a sufficient refutation of them, in the estimation of all, except the most ignorant and degraded classes of society. Smith was a worthless, ignorant young man, though possessed of considerable shrewdness, and an assurance which would not have ill become Knipperdoling or Mohammed himself. His utter illiteracy shows itself in the Book of Mormon. It seems that the original of this work was a letter written in 1809–12, by one Simon Spaulding, who had been a Presbyterian clergyman. It was constructed on the theory that the Indians are the lost tribes, whose fortunes he depicts in their progress to this country, and their subsequent adventures; Mormon, Moroni, Nephi, Lehi, and the Lamanites, who figure in the Book of Mormon, being prominent characters in the fiction. The manuscript of this tale fell into the hands of Rigdon, and he and Smith modelled it into its present form—a most stupidly-devised fable. No one will wonder at the success of the Mormon apostles, when he bears in mind that the ignorant classes are easily impressed by the confident assertion of infallibility, the affectation of thaumaturgical powers, and the promise of a sensual millennium. In the case of such proselytes, reason as well as revelation is utterly ignored. Such is the character of the fifty thousand Mormon converts in Great Britain, nearly half of whom have gone to Utah.]

[MORTAL SIN. According to the Papists, this is that which brings death to the soul, depriving it of sanctifying grace and charity, in which spiritual life consists; whereas venial sin does not, it being only slightly repugnant to the rule of right. No such distinction is found in Scripture. When the fathers speak of mortal and venial sin, they seem to refer to such sins as require penance and such as do not.]

[MORTMAIN. Blackstone says, "All purchases made by corporate bodies are said to be purchases in mortmain, because these purchases being usually made by ecclesiastical bodies, the members of which (being professed) were reckoned dead persons in law, land, therefore, holden by them, might with great propriety be said to be held in mortua manu"—in a dead hand. As the king's exchequer was impoverished by the accumulation of such property, it being exempt from taxation, the granting of land by mortmain has been repeatedly prohibited by the English Parliament. The first statute against it is in Magna Charta.]

MOSES. This illustrious legislator of the Israelites was of the tribe of Levi, in the line of Kohath and of Amram, whose son he was, and therefore in the fourth generation after the settlement of the Israelites in Egypt. The time of his birth is ascertained by the exode of the Israelites, when Moses was eighty years old. Exod. vii. 7. By a singular providence, the infant Moses, when exposed on the river Nile, through fear of the royal decree, after his mother had hid him three months, because he was a goodly child, was taken up and adopted by Pharaoh's daughter, and nursed by his own mother, whom she hired at the suggestion of his sister Miriam. Thus did he find an asylum in the very palace of his intended destroyer; while his intercourse with his own family and nation was still most naturally, though unexpectedly, maintained; so mysterious are the ways of Heaven. And while he was instructed "in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," and bred up in the midst of a luxurious court, he acquired at home the knowledge of the promised redemption of Israel; and, "by faith" in the Redeemer Christ, "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ," or persecution for Christ's sake, "greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he had respect to the recompense of reward"—Exodus ii. 1-10: Acts vii. 20-22: Heb. xi. 23-26—or looked forward to a future state.

When Moses was grown to manhood, and was full forty years old, he was moved by a Divine intimation, as it seems, to undertake the deliverance of his countrymen; "for he supposed that his brethren would have understood how that God, by his hand, would give them deliverance; but they understood not." For when, in the excess of his zeal to redress their grievances, he had slain an Egyptian, who injured one of them, in which he probably went beyond his commission, and afterward endeavored to reconcile two of them that were at variance, they rejected his mediation; and "the man who had done wrong said, Who made thee a judge and a ruler over us? Intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian yesterday?" So Moses, finding it was known, and that Pharaoh sought to slay him, fled for his life to the land of Midian, in Arabia Petræa, where he married Zipporah, the daughter of Jethro, or Reuel, prince and priest of Midian; and, as a shepherd, kept his flocks in the vicinity of Mount Horeb, or Sinai, for forty years. Exodus ii. 11-21; iii. 1; xviii. 5: Num. x. 29: Acts vii. 23-30. During this long exile Moses was trained in the school of humble circumstances for that arduous mission which he had prematurely anticipated; and, instead of the unthinking zeal which at first actuated him, learned to distrust himself. His backwardness, afterward, to undertake that mission for which he was destined from the womb, was no less remarkable than his forwardness before. Exod. iv. 10-13.

At length, when the oppression of the Israelites was come to the full, and they cried to God for succor, and the king was dead, and all the men in Egypt that sought his life, "the God of glory" appeared to Moses in a flame of fire, from the midst of a bush, and announced himself as "the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob," under the titles of Jahoh and Æljeh, expressive of his unity and sameness; and commissioned him first to make known to the Israelites the Divine will for their deliverance; and next to go with the elders of Israel to Pharaoh, requiring him, in the name of "the Lord, the God of the Hebrews, to suffer the people to go three days' journey into the wilderness, to sacrifice unto the Lord their God," after such sacrifices had been long intermitted during their bondage; for the Egyptians had sunk into bestial polytheism, and would have stoned them, had they attempted to sacrifice to their principal divinities, the apis, or bull, etc., in the land itself: foretelling, also, the opposition they would meet with from the king, the mighty signs and wonders that would finally compel his assent, and their spoiling of the Egyptians, by asking or demanding of them (not borrowing) jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, (by way of wages or compensation for their services,) as originally declared to Abraham, that "they should go out from thence with great substance." Gen. xv. 14: Exodus ii. 23-25; iii. 2-22; viii. 25, 26.

To vouch his Divine commission to the Israelites, God enabled Moses to work three signal miracles: 1. Turning his rod into a serpent, and restoring it again: 2. Making his hand leprous as snow, when he first drew it out of his bosom, and restoring it sound as before when he next drew it out; and, 3. Turning the water of the river into blood. And the people believed the signs, and the promised deliverance, and worshipped. To assist him, also, in his arduous mission, when Moses had represented that he was "not eloquent, but slow of speech," and of a slow or stammering tongue, God inspired Aaron, his elder brother, to go and meet

Moses in the wilderness, to be his spokesman to the people, Exod. iv. 1-81, and his prophet to Pharaoh; while Moses was to be a god to both, as speaking to them in the name, or by the authority, of God himself. Exod. vii. 1, 2. At their first interview with Pharaoh, they declared, "Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness. And Pharaoh said, Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not," or regard not, "the Lord, neither will I let Israel go." In answer to this haughty tyrant, they styled the Lord by a more ancient title, which the Egyptians ought to have known and respected, from Abraham's days, when he plagued them in the matter of Sarah: "The God of the Hebrews hath met with us: Let us go, we pray thee, three days' journey into the desert, and sacrifice unto the Lord our God, lest he fall upon us with pestilence or with the sword;" plainly intimating to Pharaoh, also, not to incur his indignation, by refusing to comply with his desire. But the king not only refused, but increased the burdens of the people, Exod. v. 1-19; and the people murmured, and hearkened not unto Moses, when he repeated from the Lord his assurances of deliverance and protection, for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage. Exod. v. 20-23; vi. 1-9.

At their second interview with Pharaoh, in obedience to the Divine command, again requiring him to let the children of Israel go out of his land, Pharaoh, as foretold, demanded of them to show a miracle for themselves, in proof of their commission, when Aaron cast down his rod, and it became a serpent before Pharaoh and before his servants, or officers of his court. The king then called upon his wise men and magicians, to know if they could do as much by the power of their gods, "and they did so with their enchantments; for they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents; but Aaron's rod swallowed up their serpents." Here the original phrase, יִרְעֹשׁוּ כֶן, "and they did so," or "in like manner," may only indicate the attempt, and not the deed; as afterward, in the plague of lice, "when they did so with their enchantments, but could not." Exod. viii. 18. And, indeed, the original term, לְהַרְעֹשׂ, rendered "their enchantments," as derived from the root רָעַשׁ, or לִיֵּשׁ, to hide or cover, fitly expresses the secret deceptions of legerdemain, or sleight-of-hand, to impose on spectators; and the remark of the magicians, when unable to imitate the production of lice, which was beyond their skill and dexterity, on account of their minuteness—"This is the finger of a God!"—seems to strengthen the supposition; especially as the Egyptians were famous for legerdemain and for charming serpents; and the magicians, having had notice of the miracle they were expected to imitate, might make provision accordingly, and bring live serpents, which they might have substituted for their rods. And though Aaron's serpent swallowed up their serpents, showing the superiority of the true miracle over the false, 2 Thess. ii. 9, it might only lead the king to conclude that Moses and Aaron were more expert jugglers than Jannes and Jambres, who opposed them. 2 Timothy iii. 8. And the heart of Pharaoh was hardened, so that he "hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had said," or foretold. Exod. vi. 10, 11; vii. 8-13. For the conduct of Moses as the deliverer and lawgiver of the Israelites, see PLAGUES OF EGYPT, RED SEA, and LAW.

At Mount Sinai the Lord was pleased to make Moses, the redeemer of Israel, an eminent type of the Redeemer of the world. "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him; and it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him:" which Moses communicated to the people. "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet, from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me: unto him shall ye hearken." Deut. xviii. 15-19. This prophet like unto Moses was our Lord Jesus Christ, who was by birth a Jew, of the middle class of the people, and resembled his predecessor, in personal intercourse with God, miracles, and legislation, which no other prophet did, Deut. xxxiv. 10-12; and to whom God, at his transfiguration, required the world to hearken. Matt. xvii. 5. Whence our Lord's frequent admonition to the Jewish Church, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear," Matt. xiii. 9, etc.; which is addressed, also, by the Spirit to the Christian Churches of Asia Minor. Rev. iii. 22.

In the affair of the Golden Calf, (see CALF,) the conduct of Moses showed the greatest zeal for God's honor, and a holy indignation against the sin of Aaron and the people. And when Moses drew nigh, and saw their proceedings, his anger waxed hot, and he cast away the tables of the covenant, or stone tablets on which were engraven the ten commandments by the finger of God himself, and brake them beneath the mount, in the presence of the people; in token that the covenant between God and them was now rescinded on his part, in consequence of their transgression. He then took the golden calf, and burned it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and mixed it with water, and made the children of Israel drink of it. After thus destroying their idol, he inflicted punishment on the idolaters themselves; for he summoned all that were on the Lord's side to attend him; and all the Levites having obeyed the call, he sent them, in the name of the Lord, to slay all the idolaters, from one end of the camp to the other, without favor or affection either to their neighbor or to their brother; and they slew about three thousand men. The Lord also sent a grievous plague among them for their idolatry, Exod. xxxii. 2-35, on which occasion Moses gave a signal proof of his love for his people, by interceding for them with the Lord; and of his own disinterestedness, in refusing the offer of the Almighty to adopt his family in their room, and make of them "a great nation." He prayed that God would blot him out of his book, that is, take away his life, if he would not forgive "the great sin of his people;" and prevailed with God to alter his determination of withdrawing his presence from them, and sending an inferior angel to conduct them to the land of promise. So wonderful was the condescension of God to the voice of a man, and so mighty the power of prayer.

When the Lord had pardoned the people, and taken them again into favor, he commanded Moses to hew two tablets of stone, like the former which were broken, and to present them to him on the top of the mount; and on these the Lord wrote again the ten commandments, for a renewal of the covenant between him and his people. To reward and strengthen the faith of Moses, God was pleased, at his request, to grant him a fuller view of the Divine glory, or presence, than he had hitherto done. And, to confirm his authority with the people on his return, after the second conference of forty days, he imparted to him a portion of that glory or light by which his immediate presence was manifested; for the face of Moses shone so that Aaron and all the people were afraid to come nigh him, until he had put a veil on his face, to hide its brightness. This was an honor never vouchsafed to mortal before nor afterward till Christ, the Prophet like Moses, in his transfiguration also, appeared arrayed in a larger measure of the same lustre. Then Moses again beheld the glory of the Word made flesh, and ministered thereto in a glorified form himself. Exod. xxxiv. 1-35: Matt. xvii. 1-8.

At Kibroth-hattaavah, when the people loathed the manna, and longed for flesh, Moses betrayed great impatience, and wished for death. He was also reproved for unbelief. At Kadesh-barnea, Moses having encouraged the people to proceed, saying, "Behold, the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto you: fear not," Deut. i. 19-21, they betrayed great diffidence, and proposed to Moses to send spies to search out the land, and point out to them the way they should enter, and the course they should take. And the proposal "pleased him well," and with the consent of the Lord he sent twelve men, one out of each tribe, to spy out the land. Deut. i. 22, 23: Num. xiii. 1-20. All these, except Caleb and Joshua, having brought "an evil report," so discouraged the people, that they murmured against Moses and against Aaron, and said unto them, "Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! or would God that we had died in the wilderness! And wherefore hath the Lord brought us unto this land, to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children shall be a prey? Were it not better for us to return into Egypt? And they said one to another, Let us make a captain, and return into Egypt." They even went so far as to propose to stone Joshua and Caleb, because they exhorted the people not to rebel against the Lord, nor to fear the people of the land. Num. xiv. 1-10: Deut. i. 26-28. Here again the noble patriotism of Moses was signally displayed. He again refused the Divine offer to disinherit the Israelites, and make of him and his family a "greater and mightier nation than they." He urged the most persuasive motives with their offended God, not to destroy them with the threatened pestilence, lest the heathen might say "that the Lord was not able to bring them into the land which he swore unto them." He powerfully appealed to the long-tried mercies and forgivenesses they had experienced ever since their departure from Egypt; and his energetic supplication prevailed; for the Lord graciously said, "I have pardoned, according to thy word; but verily, as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord;" or shall adore him for his righteous judgments; "for all these men which have seen my glory and my miracles which I did in Egypt, and in the wilderness, and have tempted me these ten times, and have not hearkened to my voice, surely shall not see the land which I swore unto their fathers; neither shall any of them that provoked me see it. As ye have spoken in my ears, so will I do unto you," by a righteous retaliation: "your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness. But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in; and they shall wander in the wilderness forty years, and bear your whoredoms, after the number of the days in which ye searched the land, each day for a year, until your carcasses be wasted in the wilderness." And immediately after this sentence, as the earnest of its full accomplishment, all the spies, except Caleb and Joshua, were out off, and died by the plague before the Lord. Num. xiv. 11-37: Deut. i. 34-39.

The people now, to repair their fault, contrary to the advice of Moses, presumptuously went to invade the Amalekites and Canaanites, of Mount Seir, or Hor; who defeated them, and chased them as bees to Hormah. Num. xiv. 39-45: Deut. i. 41-44. On the morrow they were ordered to turn away from the promised land, and to take their journey south-westward, toward the way of the Red Sea; and they abode in the wilderness of Kadesh many days, or years. Num. xiv. 25: Deut. i. 40-46. The ill success of the expedition against the Amalekites, according to Josephus, occasioned the rebellion of Korah, which broke out shortly after, against Moses and Aaron, with greater violence than any of the foregoing, under Korah, the ringleader, who drew into it Dathan and Abiram, the heads of the senior tribe of Reuben, and two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly, among whom were even several of the Levites. (See KORAH.) But although "all Israel round about had fled at the cry of the devoted families of Dathan and Abiram, for fear that the earth should swallow them up also;" yet, on the morrow, they returned to their rebellious spirit, and murmured against Moses and Aaron, saying, "Ye have killed the people of the Lord." On this occasion, also, the Lord threatened to consume them as in a moment; but, on the intercession of Moses, only smote them with a plague, which was stayed by an atonement made by Aaron, after the destruction of fourteen thousand seven hundred souls. Num. xvi. 41-50.

On the return of the Israelites, after many years' wandering, to the same disastrous station of Kadesh-barnea, even Moses himself was guilty of an offence, in which his brother Aaron was involved, and for which both were excluded, as a punishment, from entering the promised land. At Meribah-Kadesh the congregation murmured against Moses, for bringing them into a barren wilderness without water; when the Lord commanded Moses to take his rod which had been laid up before the Lord, and with Aaron to assemble the congregation together, and to speak to the rock before their eyes; which should supply water for the congregation and their cattle. "But Moses said unto the congregation, when they were assembled, Hear now, ye rebels, must we fetch you water out of this rock? And he smote the rock twice with his rod, and the water came out abundantly; and the congregation drank, and their cattle also. And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them," Num. xx. 1-13; and afterward in stronger terms: "Because ye rebelled against my commandment," etc. Num. xxvii. 14.

The offence of Moses, as far as may be collected from so concise an account, seems to have been, 1. He distrusted or disbelieved that water could be produced from the rock only by speaking to it; which was a higher miracle than he had performed before at Rephidim. Exod. xvii. 6. 2. He unnecessarily smote the rock twice; thereby betraying an unwarrantable impatience. 3. He did not, at least in the phrase he used, ascribe the glory of the miracle wholly to God, but rather to himself and his brother: "Must we fetch you water out of this rock?" And he denominated them "rebels" against his and his brother's authority, which, although an implied act of rebellion against God, ought to have been stated, as on a former occasion: "Ye have been rebels against the Lord, from the day that I knew you," Deut. ix. 24, which he spake without blame. For want of more caution on this occasion, "he spake unadvisedly with his lips, because they provoked his spirit." Psalm cvi. 33. Thus "was God sanctified at the waters of Meribah," by his impartial justice, in punishing his greatest favorites when they did amiss. Num. xx. 13. How severely Moses felt his deprivation, appears from his humble, and it should seem repeated, supplications to the Lord to reverse the sentence: "O Lord God, thou hast begun to show thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand; for what god is there in heaven or in earth that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might? I pray thee let me go over and see the good land beyond Jordan, even that goodly mountain Lebanon," or the whole breadth of the land. "But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me; and he said unto me, Let it suffice thee: speak no more unto me of this matter. Get thee up unto the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes; for thou shalt not go over this Jordan." Deut. iii. 23-27.

The faculties of this illustrious legislator, both of mind and body, were not impaired at the age of a hundred and twenty years, when he died. "His eye was not dim, nor his natural strength abated," Deut. xxxiv. 7; and the noblest of all his compositions was his Song, or the Divine Ode, which Bishop Lowth elegantly styles, Cycnea Oratio, "the Dying Swan's Oration." His death took place after the Lord had shown him, from the top of Pisgah, a distant view of the promised land, throughout its whole extent. "He then buried his body in a valley opposite Beth-peor, in the land of Moab; but no man knoweth his sepulchre unto this day," observes the sacred historian, who annexed the circumstances of his death to the book of Deuteronomy, xxxiv. 6. From an obscure passage in the New Testament, in which Michael the archangel is said to have contended with the devil about the body of Moses, Jude 9, some have thought that he was buried by the ministry of angels, near the scene of the idolatry of the Israelites; but that the spot was purposely concealed, lest his tomb might also be converted into an object of idolatrous worship among the Israelites, like the brazen serpent. Beth-peor lay in the lot of the Reubenites. Joshua xiii. 20. But on so obscure a passage nothing can be built. The "body of Moses" may figuratively mean the Jewish Church; or the whole may be an allusion to a received tradition which, without affirming or denying its truth, might be made the basis of a moral lesson.

Josephus, who frequently attempts to embellish the simple narrative of holy writ, represents Moses as attended to the top of Pisgah by Joshua, his successor, Eleazar, the high-priest, and the whole senate; and that, after he had dismissed the senate, while he was conversing with Joshua and Eleazar, and embracing them, a cloud suddenly came over and enveloped him; and he vanished from their sight, and he was taken away to a certain valley. "In the sacred books," says he, "it is written that he died; fearing to say that, on account of his transcendent virtue, he had departed to the Deity." The Jewish historian has here, perhaps, imitated the account of our Lord's ascension, furnished by the evangelist, Luke xxiv. 50: Acts i. 9; wishing to raise Moses to a level with Christ. The preëminence of Moses's character is briefly described by the sacred historian, Samuel or Ezra: "And there arose not a prophet since, in Israel, like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face; in all the signs and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and all his servants, and all his land; and in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses showed in the sight of all Israel." Deut. xxxiv. 10-12.

So marked and hallowed is the character of this, the most eminent of mere men, that it has often been successfully made the basis of an irresistible argument for the truth of his Divine mission. Thus Cellérier observes: Every imposture has an object in view, and an aim more or less selfish. Men practice deceit for money, for pleasure, or for glory. If, by a strange combination, the love of mankind ever entered into the mind of an impostor, doubtless, even then, he has contrived to reconcile, at least, his own selfish interests with those of the human race. If men deceive others, for the sake of causing their own opinions or their own party to triumph, they may sometimes, perhaps, forget their own interests during the struggle, but they again remember them when the victory is achieved. It is a general rule, that no impostor forgets himself long. But Moses forgot himself, and forgot himself to the last. Yet there is no middle supposition. If Moses was not a Divinely inspired messenger, he was an impostor in the strongest sense of the term. It is not, as in the case of Numa, a slight and single fraud, designed to secure some good end, that we have to charge him with, but a series of deceptions, many of which were gross; a profound, dishonest, perfidious, sanguinary dissimulation, continued for the space of forty years. If Moses was not a Divinely commissioned prophet, he was not the saviour of the people, but their tyrant and their murderer. Still, we repeat, this barbarous impostor always forgot himself; and his disinterestedness, as regarded himself personally, his family, and his tribe, is one of the most extraordinary features in his administration. As to himself personally: He is destined to die in the wilderness; he is never to taste the tranquillity, the plenty, and the delight, the possession of which he promises to his countrymen; he shares with them only their fatigues and privations; he has more anxieties than they, on their account, in their acts of disobedience, and in their perpetual murmurings. As to his family: He does not nominate his sons as his successors; he places them, without any privileges or distinctions, among the obscure sons of Levi; they are not even admitted into the sacerdotal authority: unlike all other fathers, Moses withdraws them from public view, and deprives them of the means of obtaining glory and favor. Samuel and Eli assign a part of their paternal authority to their sons, and permit them even to abuse it; but the sons of Moses, in the wilderness, are only the simple servants of the tabernacle; like all the other sons of Kohath, if they even dare to raise the veil which covers the sacred furniture, the burden of which they carry, death is denounced against them. Where can we find more complete disinterestedness than in Moses? Is not his the character of an upright man, who has the general good, not his own interests, at heart; of a man who submissively acquiesces in the commands of God, without resistance and without demur? When we consider these several things—when we reflect on all the ministry of Moses, on his life, on his death, on his character, on his abilities, and his success—we are powerfully convinced that he was the messenger of God. If we consider him only as an able legislator, as a Lycurgus, as a Numa, his actions are inexplicable: we find not in him the affections, the interests, the views which usually belong to the human heart. The simplicity, the harmony, the verity of his natural character are gone: they give place to an incoherent union of ardor and imposture; of daring and of timidity, of incapacity and genius, of cruelty and sensibility. No! Moses was inspired by God: he received from God the law which he left his countrymen.

To Moses we owe that important portion of Holy Scripture, the Pentateuch, which brings us acquainted with the creation of the world, the entrance of sin and death, the first promises of redemption, the flood, the peopling of the post-diluvian earth, and the origin of nations, the call of Abraham, and the giving of the law. We have, indeed, in it the early history of religion, and a key to all the subsequent dispensations of God to man. The genuineness and authenticity of these most venerable and important books have been established by various writers; but the following remarks upon the veracity of the writings of Moses, have the merit of compressing much argument into a few words:—1. There is a minuteness in the details of the Mosaic writings which bespeaks their truth; for it often bespeaks the eye-witness, as in the adventures of the wilderness; and often seems intended to supply directions to the artificer, as in the construction of the tabernacle. 2. There are touches of nature in the narrative which bespeak its truth, for it is not easy to regard them otherwise than as strokes from the life; as where “the mixed multitude,” whether half-castes or Egyptians, are the first to sigh for the cucumbers and melons of Egypt, and to spread discontent through the camp, Num. xi. 4; as the miserable exculpation of himself which Aaron attempts, with all the cowardice of conscious guilt, “I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf;” the fire, to be sure, being in the fault. Exod. xxxii. 24. 3. There are certain little inconveniences represented as turning up unexpectedly, that bespeak truth in the story; for they are just such accidents as are characteristic of the working of a new system and untried machinery. What is to be done with the man who is found gathering sticks on the Sabbath day? Num. xv. 32. (Could an impostor have devised such a trifle?) How is the inheritance of the daughters of Zelophehad to be disposed of, there being no heir male? Num. xxxvi. 2; either of them an inconsiderable matter in itself, but both giving occasion to very important laws—the one touching life, and the other property. 4. There is a simplicity in the manner of Moses, when telling his tale, which bespeaks its truth: no parade of language, no pomp of circumstance, even in his miracles; a modesty and dignity throughout all. Let us but compare him in any trying scene with Josephus—his description, for instance, of the passage through the Red Sea, Exod. xiv.; of the murmuring of the Israelites and the supply of quails and manna, with the same as given by the Jewish historian, or rhetorician, we might rather say, and the force of the observation will be felt. 5. There is a candor in the treatment of his subject by Moses, which bespeaks his truth; as when he tells of his own want of eloquence, which unfitted him for a leader, Exod. iv. 10; his own want of faith, which prevented him from entering the promised land, Num. xx. 12; the idolatry of Aaron his brother, Exod. xxxii. 21; the profaneness of Nadab and Abihu, his nephews, Lev. x.; the disaffection and punishment of Miriam, his sister, Num. xii. 1. 6. There is a disinterestedness in his conduct which bespeaks him to be a man of truth; for though he had sons, he apparently takes no measures during his life to give them offices of trust or profit; and at his death he appoints as his successor one who had no claims upon him, either of alliance, of clanship, or of blood. 7. There are certain prophetical passages in the writings of Moses which bespeak their truth; as, several respecting the future Messiah, and the very sublime and literal one respecting the final fall of Jerusalem. Deut. xxviii. 8. There is a simple key supplied by these writings to the meaning of many ancient traditions current among the heathens, though greatly disguised, which is another circumstance that bespeaks their truth: as, the golden age; the garden of the Hesperides; the fruit tree in the midst of the garden which the dragon guarded; the destruction of mankind by a flood, all except two persons, and those righteous persons,

*Innocens ambos, cultores numinis ambos;

the rainbow "which Jupiter set in the cloud, a sign to men;" the seventh day a sacred day; with many others, all conspiring to establish the reality of the facts which Moses relates, because tending to show that vestiges of the like present themselves in the traditional history of the world at large. 9. The concurrence which is found between the writings of Moses and those of the New Testament bespeaks their truth: the latter constantly appealing to them, being indeed but the completion of the system which the others are the first to put forth. Nor is this an illogical argument; for, though the credibility of the New Testament itself may certainly be reasoned out from the truth of the Pentateuch once established, it is still very far from depending on that circumstance exclusively, or even principally. The New Testament demands acceptance on its own merits, on merits distinct from those on which the books of Moses rest; therefore, (so far as it does so,) it may fairly give its suffrage for their veracity, valeat quantum valet: [it may avail as far as it goes;] and surely it is a very improbable thing that two dispensations, separated by an interval of some fifteen hundred years, each exhibiting prophecies of its own, since fulfilled; each asserting miracles of its own, on strong evidence of its own; that two dispensations, with such individual claims to be believed, should also be found to stand in the closest relation to one another, and yet both turn out impostures after all. 10. Above all, there is a comparative purity in the theology and morality of the Pentateuch, which argues not only its truth, but its high original; for how else are we to account for a system like that of Moses, in such an age and among such a people; that the doctrine of the unity, the self-existence, the providence, the perfections of the great God of heaven and earth, should thus have blazed forth (how far more brightly than even in the vaunted schools of Athens at its most refined era!) from the midst of a nation, of themselves ever plunging into gross and grovelling idolatry; and that principles of social duty, of benevolence, and of self-restraint, extending even to the thoughts of the heart, should have been the produce of an age which the very provisions of the Levitical law itself show to have been full of savage and licentious abominations? Exod. iii. 14; xx. 3-17: Lev. xix. 2, 18: Deut. vi. 4; xxx. 6. Such are some of the internal evidences for the veracity of the books of Moses. 11. Then the situation in which the Jews actually found themselves placed, as a matter of fact, is no slight argument for the truth of the Mosaic accounts; reminded, as they were, by certain memorials observed from year to year, of the great events of their early history, just as they are recorded in the writings of Moses—memorials universally recognized both in their object and in their authority—the pass-over, for instance, celebrated by all, no man doubting its meaning, no man in all Israel assigning to it any other origin than one, viz., that of being a contemporary monument of a miracle displayed in favor of the people of Israel; by right of which credentials and no other, it summoned from all quarters of the world, at great cost, and inconvenience, and danger, the dispersed Jews, none disputing the obligation to obey the summons. 12. Then the heroic devotion with which the Israelites continued to regard the law, even long after they had ceased to cultivate the better part of it, even when that very law only served to condemn its worshippers, so that they would offer themselves up by thousands, with their children and wives, as martyrs to the honor of their temple, in which no image, even of an emperor, who could scourge them with scorpions for their disobedience, should be suffered to stand, and they live; so that, rather than violate the sanctity of the Sabbath day, the bravest men in arms would lay down their lives as tamely as sheep, and allow themselves to be burned in the holes where they had taken refuge from their cruel and cowardly pursuers. All this points to their law, as having been at first promulgated under circumstances too awful to be forgotten even after the lapse of ages. 13. Then, again, the extraordinary degree of national pride with which the Jews boasted themselves to be God's peculiar people, as if no nation ever was or ever could be so high to him—a feeling which the early teachers of Christianity found an insuperable obstacle to the progress of the gospel among them, and which actually did effect its ultimate rejection—this may well seem to be founded upon a strong traditional sense of uncommon tokens of the Almighty's regard for them above all other nations of the earth, which they had heard with their ears, or their fathers had declared unto them, even the noble works that he had done in the old time before them. 14. Then, again, the constant craving after "a sign," which beset them in the latter days of their history, as a lively certificate of the prophet; and not after a sign only, but after such a one as they would themselves prescribe: "What sign shewest thou, that we may see, and believe?" Our fathers did eat manna in the desert." John vi. 31. This desire, so frequently expressed, and with which they are so frequently reproached, looks like the relic of an appetite engendered in other times, when they had enjoyed the privilege of more intimate communion with God; it seems the wake, as it were, of miracles departed. 15: Lastly, the very onerous nature of the law, so studiously meddling with all the occupations of life, great and small—this yoke would scarcely have been endured without the strongest assurance, on the part of those who were galled by it, of the authority by which it was imposed; for it met them with some restraint or other at every turn. Would they plough? then it must not be with an ox and an ass. Would they sow? then must not the seed be mixed. Would they reap? then must they not reap clean. Would they make bread? then must they set apart dough enough for the consecrated loaf. Did they find a bird's-nest? then must they let the old bird fly away. Did they hunt? then they must shed the blood of their game, and cover it with dust. Did they plant a fruit tree? for three years was the fruit to be uncircumcised. Did they shave their beards? they were not to cut the corners. Did they weave a garment? then must it be only with threads prescribed. Did they build a house? they must put rails and battlements on the roof. Did they buy an estate? at the year of jubilee, back it must go to its owner. All these (and how many more of the same kind might be named!) are enactments which it must have required extraordinary influence in the lawgiver to enjoin, and extraordinary reverence for his powers to perpetuate.

Still, after all, says Mr. Blunt, unbelievers may start difficulties—this I dispute not; difficulties, too, which we may not always be able to answer, though I think we may be always able to neutralize them. It may be a part of our trial, that such difficulties should exist and be encountered; for there can be no reason why temptations should not be provided for the natural pride of our understanding, as well as for the natural lusts of our flesh. To many, indeed, they would be the more formidable of the two; perhaps to the angels who kept not their first estate they proved so. With such facts, however, before me, as these which I have submitted to my readers, I can come to no conclusion but one—that when we read the writings of Moses, we read no cunningly-devised fables, but solemn and safe records of great and marvellous events, which court examination, and sustain it; records of such apparent veracity and faithfulness, that I can understand our Lord to have spoken almost without a figure when he said, that he who believed not Moses, neither would he be persuaded though one rose from the dead.

[MOTÉ. Κάρφος. Any small, dry thing, as chaff, or a splinter—opposed to a beam. Matt. vii. 3.]

MOTH, מוֹת, Job iv. 19; xiii. 28; xxvii. 18: Psalm vi. 7; xxxi. 9, 10; xxxix. 11: Hosea v. 12. מוֹת, Isaiah 1. 9. The clothes moth is the tinea argentea; of a white, shining silver, or pearl color. It is clothed with shells, fourteen in number, and these are scaly. Albin asserts this to be the insect that eats woollen stuffs; and says that it is produced from a gray speckled moth, that flies by night, creeps among woollens, and there lays her eggs, which, after a little time, are hatched as worms, and in this state they feed on their habitation, till they change into a chrysalis, and thence emerge into moths. "The young moth, or moth worm," says the Abbé Pluche, "upon leaving the egg which a papilio had lodged upon a piece of stuff commodious for her purpose, finds a proper place of residence, grows and feeds upon the nap, and likewise builds with it an apartment, which is fixed to the groundwork of the stuff with several cords and a little glue. From an aperture in this habitation, the moth worm devours and demolishes all about him; and when he has cleared the place, he draws out all the fastenings of his tent; after which he carries it to some little distance, and then fixes it with the slender cords in a new situation. In this manner he continues to live at our expense, till he is satisfied with his food, at which period he is first transformed into the nympha, and then changed into the papilio."

The allusions to this insect in the sacred writings are very striking: "Fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings. For the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool." They shall perish with as little noise as a garment under the tooth of a moth. Isaiah li. 7, 8. In the prophecies of Hosea, God himself says, "I will be as a moth unto Ephraim, and as a lion;" that is, I will send silent and secret judgments upon him, which shall imperceptibly waste his beauty, corrode his power, and diminish his strength, and will finish his destruction with open and irresistible calamities. Or the meaning may be, As the moth crumbles into dust under the slightest pressure or the gentlest touch, so man dissolves with equal ease, and vanishes into darkness, under the finger of the Almighty. Deeply sensible of this affecting truth, the royal Psalmist earnestly deprecates the judgments of God, humbly confessing his own weakness, and the inability of every man to endure his frown: "Remove thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of thy hand. When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity. Selah." Psalm xxxix. 10, 11. Such, in the estimation of Job, is the fading prosperity of a wicked man: "He buildeth his house as a moth, and as a booth that the keeper maketh." Job xxvii. 18. His unrighteous acquisitions shall be of short continuance: they shall moulder insensibly away, returning to the lawful owner, or pass into the possession of others. It is in this sense that the Lord threatens: "I will be unto Ephraim as a moth." Hosea v. 12. By the secret curse of God he shall fade away, and whatever is most precious in his estimation shall be gradually dissolved and consumed, as a garment eaten by the moth. The same allusion is involved in the direction of our Lord to his disciples: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon the earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal. But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal." Matt. vi. 19, 20. The word treasure commonly suggests to our minds the idea of some durable substance, as precious stones, gold, and silver, upon which the persevering industry of the moth can make no impression; but in the language of inspiration, it denotes every thing collected together which men reckon valuable. The Jews had treasures of raiment as well as of corn, of wine, of oil, of honey, Jer. xli. 8; and of gold, silver, and brass. Ezek. xxxiii. 4; Dan. xi. 48. The robes of princes were a part of their treasure, upon which they often set a particular value. Rich vestments made a conspicuous figure in the treasury of Ulysses. These were, from their nature, exposed to the depredations of the moth: fabricated of perishing materials, they were liable to be prematurely consumed, or taken away by fraud or violence; but the favor of God, and the graces of his Spirit, and the enjoyment of eternal happiness, are neither liable to internal decay nor external violence, and, by consequence, are the proper objects of our highest regard, chief solicitude, and constant pursuit. It is also likely that by "moth" our Lord meant all the kinds of small insects which devour or spoil the different kinds of property, such as corn, honey, fruits, etc., which were treasured up for the future. These, in warm countries, are very numerous and destructive.

[MOTHER. מִתָּה. Isa. viii. 4. The Hebrew name of mother is a simple sound, produced by closing the lips. It is found in the Sanscrit, Coptic, German, French, and English—am by transposition becoming ma. It stands for grandmother, 1 Kings xv. 10; for a remote ancestress, Gen. iii. 20; xvii. 16; for a benefactress, Judg. v. 7; for a chief city, 2 Sam. xx. 19; Gal. iv. 26. The love of a mother illustrates the tender regard God has to his people. Isa. xlix. 15. Maternal influence has always been of immense importance to the Church, as in the cases of Hannah, Lois, Monica, and Susanna Wesley. When Napoleon asked Madame Campan what the French nation most needed, she replied in one word, "MOTHERS."]

[MOUNTAIN. Symbolically an empire, state, or city, Isa. ii. 12, 14; Jer. li. 25; Zech. iv. 7; viii. 8; and particularly the Church, Isa. ii. 2; xi. 9; Dan. ii. 35, 44, 45. It is also used figuratively for any great obstacle or difficulty, Isa. xl. 4; 1 Cor. xiii. 2; or to express the idea of greatness, Ps. xxxvi. 6.]

MOURNING. See BURIAL and DEAD.

MOUSE, עֶכְבֵּר, in Chaldee acalbar, probably the same with the aliarbui of the Arabians, or the jerboa, Lev. xi. 29; 1 Sam. vi. 4, 5, 11, 18; Isa. lxvi. 17. All interpreters acknowledge that the Hebrew word acalbar signifies a "mouse," and more especially a "field-mouse." Moses declares it to be unclean, which insinuates that it was sometimes eaten; and, indeed, it is affirmed that the Jews were so oppressed with famine during the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, that, notwithstanding this prohibition, they were compelled to eat dogs, mice, and rats. Isaiah, lxvi. 17, justly reproaches the Jews with eating the flesh of mice and other things that were impure and abominable. It is known what spoil was made by mice in the fields of the Philistines, 1 Sam. vi. 5, 6, etc., after this people had brought into the country the ark of the Lord; so that they were obliged to take the resolution to send it back, accompanied with mice and emerods of gold, as an atonement for the irreverence they had committed, and to avert from their land the vengeance that pursued them. Judea has suffered by these animals in other times. William, Archbishop of Tyre, records, that in the beginning of the twelfth century a penitential council was held at Naplouse, where five and twenty canons were framed for the correction of the manners of the inhabitants of the Christian-kingdom of Jerusalem, who, they apprehended, had provoked God to bring upon them the calamities of earthquakes, war, and famine. This last the archbishop ascribes to locusts and devouring mice, which had for four years together so destroyed the fruits of the earth, as seemed to cause almost a total failure in their crops. Bochart has collected many curious accounts relative to the terrible devastations made by these animals.

MULBERRY TREE, מִלְבֶּרִי, 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chron. xiv. 14, 15; Ps. lxxxiv. 7, [6, Eng.] The LXX., in Chronicles, render the word by πίτων, "pear trees;" so Aquila and the Vulgate, both in Samuel and Chronicles, "pyrorum." Others translate it the "mulberry tree." More probably it is the large shrub which the Arabs still call "baca," and which gave name to the valley where it abounded. Of this valley Celsius remarks, that it was "rugged and embarrassed with bushes and stones, which could not be passed through without labor and tears;" referring to Psalm lxxxiv. 7, and the "rough valley," Deut. xxi. 4; and he quotes from a manuscript of Abu'l Fideli a description of the tree which grew there, and mentions it as bearing a fruit of an acrid taste.

MULE, מִרְרִי, 2 Sam. xiii. 29; 1 Kings i. 33; x. 25, etc. A mongrel kind of quadruped, between the horse and the ass. Its form bears a considerable resemblance to the last-mentioned animal; but in its disposition it is rather vicious and intractable; so that its obstinacy has become a proverb. With this creature the early ages were probably unacquainted. It is very certain the Jews did not breed mules, because it was forbidden them to couple together two creatures of different species. Lev. xix. 19. But they were not prohibited the making use of them; thus we find in David's time that they had become very common, and made up a considerable part of the equipage of princes. 2 Sam. xiii. 29; xviii. 9; 1 Kings i. 33, 38, 44; x. 25; 2 Chron. ix. 24. [The word rendered mules in Gen. xxxvi. 24, is not pered, but yemim, and is supposed to mean hot springs. Some understand the Emim. See A. Clarke, in loc.]

MURDER. Among the Hebrews murder was always punished with death; but involuntary homicide only by banishment. Cities of refuge were appointed for involuntary manslaughter, whither the slayer might retire, and continue in safety till the death of the high-priest. Num. xxxv. 28. Then the offender was at liberty to return to his own house, if he pleased. A murderer was put to death without remission, and the kinsman of the murdered person might kill him with impunity. Money could not redeem his life: he was dragged away from the altar, if he had there taken refuge. When a dead body was found in the field of a person slain by a murderer unknown, Moses commanded that the elders and judges of the neighboring places should resort to the spot. Deut. xxi. 1-8. The elders of the city nearest to it were to take a heifer which had never yet borne the yoke, and were to lead it into some rude and uncultivated place, which had not been ploughed or sowed, where they were to cut its throat. The priests of the Lord, with the elders and magistrates of the city, were to come near the dead body, and, washing their hands over the heifer that had been slain, were to say, "Our hands have not shed this blood, nor have our eyes seen it shed. Lord, be favorable to thy people Israel, and impute not to us this blood, which has been shed in the midst of our country." This ceremony may inform us how much horror they conceived at the crime of murder; and it shows their fear that God might avenge it on the whole country, which was supposed to contract pollution by the blood spilt in it, unless it were expiated, and avenged on him who had occasioned it, if he could be discovered.

[MURRAIN. מורר. Exod. ix. 3. A pestilence. The Hebrew expresses the idea of driving or carrying off men or beasts by a plague. Comp. Exod. v. 3. Murran is derived by some from the Latin mori; by others from the Greek υαπαίνω, to die; and by others from the Anglo-Saxon myrran, to mar or destroy.]

MUSIC is probably nearly coeval with our race, or, at least, with the first attempts to preserve the memory of transactions. Before the invention of writing, the history of remarkable events was committed to memory, and handed down by oral tradition. The knowledge of laws and of useful arts was preserved in the same way. Rhythm and song were probably soon found important helps to the memory; and thus the muses became the early instructors of mankind. Nor was it long, we may conjecture, before dancing and song united contributed to festivity, or to the solemnities of religion. The first instruments of music were probably of the pulsatile kind; and rhythm, it is likely, preceded the observation of those intervals of sound which are so pleasing to the ear. The first mention of stringed instruments, however, precedes the deluge. Tubal, the sixth descendant from Cain, was "the father of all such as handle the harp and the organ." About five hundred and fifty years after the deluge, or B. C. 1800, according to the common chronology, both vocal and instrumental music are spoken of as things in general use: "And Laban said, What hast thou done, that thou hast stolen away unawares to me, and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the sword? Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me; and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth and with songs, with tabret and with harp?" Gen. xxxi. 26, 27.

Egypt has been called the cradle of the arts and sciences, and there can be no doubt of the very early civilization of that country. To the Egyptian Mercury, or Thoth, who is called Trismegistos, or "thrice illustrious," is ascribed the invention of the lyre, which had at first only three strings. It would be idle to mention the various conjectures how these strings were tuned, or to try to settle the chronology of this invention. The single flute, which they called photinx, is also ascribed to the Egyptians. Its shape was that of a horn, of which, no doubt, it was originally made. Before the invention of these instruments, as Dr. Burney justly observes, "music could have been little more than metrical, as no other instruments except those of percussion were known. When the art was first discovered of refining and sustaining tones, the power of music over mankind was probably irresistible, from the agreeable surprise which soft and lengthened sounds must have occasioned." The same learned writer has given a drawing, made under his own eye, of an Egyptian musical instrument, represented on a very ancient obelisk at Rome, brought from Egypt by Augustus. This obelisk is supposed to have been erected at Heliopolis, by Sesostris, nearly four hundred years before the Trojan war. The most remarkable thing in this instrument is, that it is supplied with a neck, so that its two strings were capable of furnishing a great number of sounds. This is a contrivance which the Greeks, with all their ingenuity, never hit upon. "I have never been able," says the Doctor, "to discover, in any remains of Greek sculpture, an instrument furnished with a neck; and Father Montfaucon says that in examining the representations of nearly five hundred ancient lyres, harps, and citharas, he never met with one in which there was any contrivance for shortening the strings during the time of performance, as by a neck and finger-board." From the long residence of the Hebrews in Egypt, it is no improbable conjecture that their music was derived from that source. However that may be, music, vocal and instrumental, made one important part of their religious service. If the excellence of the music was conformable to the sublimity of the poetry which it accompanied, there would be no injustice in supposing it unspeakably superior to that of every other people; and the pains that were taken to render the tabernacle and temple music worthy of the subjects of their lofty odes, leaves little doubt that it was so. That the instruments were loud and sonorous, will appear from what follows; but as the public singing was performed in alternate responses, or the chorus of all succeeded to those parts of the psalm which were sung only by the appointed leaders, instruments of this kind were necessary to command and control the voices of so great a number as was usually assembled on high occasions.

The Hebrews insisted on having music at marriages, on anniversary birth-days, on the days which reminded them of victories over their enemies, at the inauguration of their kings, in their public worship, and when they were coming from afar to attend the great festivals of their nation. Isaiah xxx. 29. In the tabernacle and the temple, the Levites were the lawful musicians; but on other occasions any one might use musical instruments who chose. There was this exception, however: the holy silver trumpets were to be blown only by the priests, who, by the sounding of them, proclaimed the festival days, assembled the leaders of the people, and gave the signal for the battle and for the retreat. Num. x. 1-10. David, in order to give the best effect to the music of the tabernacle, divided the four thousand Levites into twenty-four classes, who sang psalms, and accompanied them with music. Each of these classes was superintended by a leader, placed over it; and they performed the duties which devolved upon them, each class a week at a time in succession. 1 Chron. xvi. 5; xxiii. 4, 5; xxv. 1-31; 2 Chron. v. 12, 13. The classes collectively, as a united body, were superintended by three directors. This arrangement was subsequently continued by Solomon after the erection of the temple, and was transmitted till the time of the overthrow of Jerusalem. It was indeed sometimes interrupted, during the reign of the idolatrous kings, but was restored by their successors. 2 Chron. v. 12-14; xxix. 27; xxxv. 15. It was even continued after the captivity. Ezra iii. 10; Neh. xii. 45-47; 1 Macc. iv. 54; xiii. 51. It should be remarked, however, that neither music nor poetry attained to the same excellence after the captivity as before that period.

There were women-singers as well as men in the temple choir; for in the book of Ezra, among those who returned from the Babylonish captivity, there are said to have been two hundred, Ezra ii. 65; and in Nehemiah vii. 67, we read of two hundred and forty-five singing men and women. The Jewish doctors will, indeed, by no means admit there were any female voices in the temple choir; and as for those משוררות, meshore-roth, as they are called in the Hebrew, they suppose them to be the wives of those who sang. Nevertheless, the following passage makes it evident that women, likewise, were thus employed: "God gave to Heman fourteen sons and three daughters; and all these were under the hands of their father for song in the house of the Lord, with cymbals, psalteries, and harps, for the service of the house of God." 1 Chron. xxv. 5, 6. Instrumental music was first introduced into the Jewish service by Moses; and afterward, by the express command of God, was very much improved with the addition of several instruments in the reign of David. When Hezekiah restored the temple service, which had been neglected in his predecessor's reign, "he set the Levites in the house of the Lord, with cymbals, with psalteries, and with harps, according to the commandment of David, and of Gad the king's seer, and Nathan the prophet; for so was the commandment of the Lord by his prophets." 2 Chron. xxix. 25.

The harp, כנור, kinnor, was the most ancient of the class of stringed instruments. Gen. iv. 21. It was sometimes called שמיני, or "eight-stringed," 1 Chron. xv. 21; Psalm vi. 1; xii. 1; although, as we may gather from the coins or medals of the Maccabean age, there were some harps which were furnished with only three strings. The nabium, or psaltery, ναβλιον, ναβλα, נבב, is first mentioned in the Psalms of David. In Psalms xxxiii. 2, and cxliv. 9, it is called עשר, "a ten-stringed instrument;" but in Psalm xcii. 3, it is distinguished from it. Josephus assigns to it twelve strings, which, taken in connection with the fact above stated, leaves us to conclude that it sometimes had ten and sometimes twelve strings. It was not played with a bow or fret, but with the fingers: the act of playing it is expressed in Hebrew by the word בננן. It resembled in form a right-angled triangle, or the Greek delta, Δ, inverted. The body of it was of wood, and hollow, and was enclosed with a piece of leather tensely drawn. The chords were extended on the outside of the leather, and were fixed at one end into the transverse part of the triangular body of the instrument. Such is its form at the present day in the east; but it has only five strings in its modern shape. 2 Sam. vi. 5; 1 Kings x. 12. There was another instrument of this kind used in Babylonia: it was triangular in form. In Greek it is called σαμβύκη; in Hebrew, סבבא and סבבא. It had originally only four, but subsequently twenty strings. Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15. Among their wind instruments was the organ, so called in the English version, in Hebrew, צורב. Gen. iv. 21. It may be styled the ancient shepherd's pipe, corresponding most nearly to the σύριγξ, or the pipe of Pan among the Greeks. It consisted at first of only one or two, but afterward of about seven pipes made of reeds, and differing from each other in length. The instrument called משורקיתא, used in Babylon, Dan. iii. 5, was of a similar construction. חליל, חלילית, and נכב, chalil, nechiloth, and nekeb, are wind instruments made of various materials, such as wood, reeds, horns, and bones. As far as we may be permitted to judge from the three kinds of pipes now used in the east, the Hebrew instrument called nechiloth is the one that is double in its structure; chalil is perhaps the one of simpler form, having a single stem with an orifice through it; while nekeb answers to the one without an orifice. Isaiah v. 12; xxx. 29; Jer. xlviii. 36; Psalm v. 1; Ezek. xxviii. 13. סומפניה, or, according to the marginal reading, סומפניא, Dan. iii. 5, 10, was a wind instrument made of reeds, by the Syrians called sambonja, by the Greeks samponja, and by the Italians zampogna. According to Servius, it was of a crooked shape. קרן, the horn or crooked trumpet, was a very ancient instrument. It was made of the horns of oxen, which were cut off at the smaller extremity, and thus presented an orifice which extended through. In progress of time, rams' horns were hollowed and employed for the same purpose. It is probable that in some instances it was made of brass, fashioned so as to resemble a horn. It was greatly used in war, and its sound resembled thunder. חצוצרת, chatsozzeroth, the silver trumpet, was straight, a cubit in length, hollow throughout, and at the larger extremity shaped so as to resemble the mouth of a small bell. In times of peace, when the people or the rulers were to be assembled together, this trumpet was blown softly: when the camps were to move forward, or the people to march to war, it was sounded with a deeper note. [Num. x.]

There were several sorts of drums. The תופ, toph, rendered in the English version tabret and timbrel, Gen. xxxi. 27, consisted of a circular hoop, either of wood or brass, three inches and six-tenths wide, was covered with a skin tensely drawn, and hung round with small bells. It was held in the left hand, and beaten to notes of music with the right. The ladies through all the east, even to this day, dance to the sound of this instrument. Exod. xv. 20: Job xvii. 6; xxi. 12: 2 Sam. vi. 5. The cymbals, צִלְצִלִּים, tseltselim, מִצְלִילִים, were of two kinds formerly, as there are to this day, in the east. The first consisted of two flat pieces of metal or plates: the musician held one of them in his right hand, the other in his left, and smote them together, as an accompaniment to other instruments. This cymbal and the mode of using it may be often seen in modern armies. The second kind of cymbals consisted of four small plates attached, two to each hand, which the ladies, as they danced, smote together. But מִצְלִילִים, Zech. xiv. 20, rendered in the English version bells, are not musical instruments, as some suppose, nor indeed bells, but concave pieces or plates of brass, which were sometimes attached to horses for the sake of ornament.

MUSTARD, σίναπι, Matt. xiii. 32; xvii. 20: Mark iv. 31: Luke xiii. 19; xvii. 6; a well-known garden herb. Christ compares the kingdom of heaven to "a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took and sowed in the earth, which indeed," said he, "is the least of all seeds; but when it is grown is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof." Matt. xiii. 31, 32. "This expression will not appear strange," says Sir Thomas Browne, "if we recollect that the mustard-seed, though it be not simply and in itself the smallest of seeds, yet may be very well believed to be the smallest of such as are apt to grow unto a ligneous substance, and become a kind of tree." The expression, also, that it might grow into such dimensions that birds might lodge on its branches, may be literally conceived, if we allow the luxuriancy of plants in India above our northern regions. And he quotes upon this occasion what is recorded in the Jewish story, of a mustard tree that was to be climbed like a fig tree. The Talmud also mentions one whose branches were so extensive as to cover a tent. Without insisting on the accuracy of this, we may gather from it that we should not judge of eastern vegetables by those which are familiar to ourselves. Scheuchzer describes a species of mustard which grows several feet high, with a tapering stalk, and spreads into many branches. Of this arborescent or tree-like vegetable, he gives a print; and Linnaeus mentions a species whose branches were real wood, which he names sinapi erucoides. [Irby and Mangles found on the road to Kerek, from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, a tree which bore fruit in bunches, the seeds having a taste like mustard. It is called the Salvadora Persica. Some think the Khardal, or Turkish mustard-tree, is meant.] But whatever kind of tree our Lord meant, it is clear, from the fact that he never takes his illustrations from any objects but such as were familiar, and often present in the scene around him, that he spoke of one which the Jews well knew to have minute seeds, and yet to be of so large growth as to afford shelter for the birds of the air.

MYRRH, מוֹר, Exod. xxx. 23: Esther ii. 12: Psalm xlv. 8: Prov. vii. 17: Cant. i. 13; iii. 6: iv. 6, 14; v. 1, 5, 13; αμύρρα, Ecclus. xxiv. 15: Matt. ii. 11: Mark xv. 23: John xix. 39; a precious kind of gum issuing by incision, and sometimes spontaneously, from the trunk and larger branches of a tree growing in Egypt, Arabia, and Abyssinia. Its taste is extremely bitter, but its smell, though strong, is not disagreeable; and among the ancients it entered into the composition of the most costly ointments. As a perfume, it appears to have been used to give a pleasant fragrance to vestments, and to be carried by females in little caskets in the bosom. The magi, who came from the east to worship our Saviour at Bethlehem, made him a present of myrrh among other things. Matt. ii. 11. [See EMBALMING.]

MYRTLE, דודים, Neh. viii. 15: Isaiah xli. 19; lv. 13: Zech. i. 8-10; a shrub, sometimes growing to a small tree, very common in Judea. It has a hard woody root that sends forth a great number of small flexible branches, furnished with leaves like those of box, but much less, and more pointed: they are soft to the touch, shining, smooth, of a beautiful green, and have a sweet smell. The flowers grow among the leaves, and consist of five white petals disposed in the form of a rose: they have an agreeable perfume, and ornamental appearance. Savary, describing a scene at the end of the forest of Platanea, says, "Myrtles, intermixed with laurel roses, grow in the valleys to the height of ten feet. Their snow-white flowers, bordered with a purple edging, appear to peculiar advantage under the verdant foliage. Each myrtle is loaded with them, and they emit perfumes more exquisite than those of the rose itself. They enchant every one, and the soul is filled with the softest sensations." The myrtle is mentioned in Scripture among lofty trees, not as comparing with them in size, but as contributing with them to the beauty and richness of the scenery. Thus Isaiah, xli. 19, intending to describe a scene of varied excellence: "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, and the shittah tree, and the oil tree;" that is, I will adorn the dreary and barren waste with trees famed for their stature and the grandeur of their appearance, the beauty of their form, and also the fragrance of their odor. The apocryphal Baruch, v. 8, speaking of the return from Babylon, expresses the protection afforded by God to the people by the same image: "Even the woods and every sweet-smelling tree shall overshadow Israel by the commandment of God."

MYSIA, a country of Asia Minor, having the Propontis on the north, Bithynia on the north-east and east, Phrygia on the south-east, Lydia (from which it was separated by the river Hermus) on the south, the Ægean Sea on the west, and the narrow strait, called the Hellespont, on the north-west. Mysia was visited by St. Paul in his circuit through Asia Minor; but he was not suffered by the Spirit to remain there, being directed to pass over into Macedonia. Acts xvi. 7-10. In this country stood the ancient city of Troy; as also that of Pergamus, one of the seven churches of Asia. Under the Romans it was made a province of the empire, and called Hellepontus; and its inhabitants are represented by Cicero as base and contemptible to a proverb. [Conybeare and Howson say, Mysia and Phrygia are excluded from Asia in Acts xvi. 6-8, "not because these two districts were not parts of it in its political character of a province, but because they had a history and a traditional character of their own, sufficiently independent to give them a name in popular usage. As regards Asia, it is simply viewed as the western portion of Asia Minor."]

[MYSTERIES. Dramatic representations of Scripture subjects, acted in the churches in the dark ages. Those which represented the prodigies performed by saints and martyrs were called miracles. They originated with the clergy, who were the first actors.]

MYSTERY. The Greek word μυστήριον denotes, 1. Something hidden, or not fully manifested. Thus, 2 Thess. ii. 7, we read of the "mystery of iniquity," which began to work in secret, but was not then completely disclosed or manifested. 2. Some sacred thing hidden or secret, which is naturally unknown to human reason, and is only known by the revelation of God. Thus, "Great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified by the Spirit," etc. 1 Tim. iii. 16. The mystery of godliness, or of true religion, consisted in the several particulars here mentioned by the apostle; particulars, indeed, which it would never have "entered into the heart of man to conceive," 1 Cor. ii. 9, had not God accomplished them in fact, and published them by the preaching of his gospel; but which, being thus manifested, are intelligible, as facts, to the meanest understanding. In like manner, the term mystery, Rom. xi. 25, 1 Cor. xv. 51, denotes what was hidden or unknown, till revealed; and thus the apostle speaks of a man's "understanding all mysteries," 1 Cor. xiii. 2; that is, all the revealed truths of the Christian religion, which is elsewhere called the "mystery of faith." 1 Tim. iii. 9. And when he who spake in an unknown tongue is said to "speak mysteries," 1 Cor. xiv. 2, it is plain that these mysteries, however unintelligible to others on account of the language in which they were spoken, were yet understood by the person himself, because he hereby "edified himself." 1 Cor. xiv. 4: Acts ii. 11; x. 46. And though in 1 Cor. ii. 7, 8, we read of the "wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which none of the princes of this world knew;" yet, says the apostle, we speak or declare this wisdom; and he observes, verse 10, that God had revealed the particulars of which it consisted to them by his Spirit. So when the apostles are called "stewards of the mysteries of God," 1 Cor. iv. 1, these mysteries could not mean what were, as facts, unknown to them; (because to them it was "given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God," Matt. xiii. 11;) yea, the character here ascribed to them implies not only that they knew these mysteries themselves, but that as faithful stewards they were to dispense or make them known to others. Luke xii. 42: 1 Peter iv. 10. In Col. ii. 2, St. Paul mentions his praying for his converts, that their hearts might be comforted "to the knowledge of the mystery of God, even of the Father, and of Christ;" for thus the passage should be translated. But if, with our translators, we render ἐπίγνωσιν, acknowledgment, still the word μυστήριον can by no means exclude knowledge; "for this is life eternal," saith our Lord, (John xvii. 3,) "that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." And, lastly, whatever be the particular meaning of the "mystery of God," mentioned Rev. x. 7, yet it was something he had declared "to (or rather by) his servants the prophets." 3. The word mystery is sometimes in the writings of St. Paul applied in a peculiar sense to the calling of the Gentiles, which he styles "the mystery," Eph. iii. 3-6; and "the mystery of Christ, which in other generations was not made known to the sons of men, as it is now revealed to his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of Christ by the gospel." Rom. xvi. 25: Eph. i. 9; iii. 9; vi. 19: Col. i. 26, 27; iv. 3. 4. It denotes a spiritual truth couched under an external representation or similitude, and concealed or hidden thereby, unless some explanation of it be otherwise given. Thus, Rev. i. 20, "The mystery," that is, the spiritual meaning, "of the seven stars: the seven stars are the angels of the seven churches." So Rev. xvii. 5, "And upon her forehead a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great," that is, Babylon in a spiritual sense, "the mother of idolatry and abominations;" and, verse 7, "I will tell thee the mystery" or spiritual signification "of the woman." Compare Matt. xiii. 11: Mark iv. 11: Luke viii. 10: Eph. v. 32; and their respective contexts. [In the early Greek Church, the Lord's Supper was called a mystery, as it was called a sacrament by the Latins—this ordinance being the highest point of the secret discipline of the Church.]

MYSTICS, who have also been sometimes called Quietists, are those who profess a pure and sublime devotion, accompanied with a disinterested love of God, free from all selfish considerations; and who believe that the Scriptures have a mystic and hidden sense, which must be sought after, in order to understand their true import. Under this name some comprehend all those who profess to know that they are inwardly taught of God. The system of the Mystics proceeded upon the known doctrine of the Platonic school, which was also adopted by Origen and his disciples, that the Divine nature was diffused through all human souls; or that the faculty of reason, from which proceed the health and vigor of the mind, was an emanation from God into the human soul, and comprehended in it the principles and elements of all truth, human and Divine. They denied that men could, by labor or study, excite this celestial flame in their breasts; and, therefore, they disapproved highly of the attempts of those who, by definitions, abstract theorems, and profound speculations, endeavored to form distinct notions of truth, and discover its hidden nature. On the contrary, they maintained that silence, tranquillity, repose, and solitude, accompanied with such acts as might tend to attenuate and exhaust the body, were the means by which the hidden and internal word was excited to produce its latent virtues, and to instruct men in the knowledge of Divine things. They reasoned as follows: "Those who behold, with a noble contempt, all human affairs, who turn away their eyes from terrestrial vanities, and shut all the avenues of the outward senses against the contagious influence of a material world, must necessarily return to God, when the spirit is thus disengaged from the impediments which prevented that happy union. And, in this blessed frame, they not only enjoy inexpressible raptures from that communion with the Supreme Being, but also are invested with the inestimable privilege of contemplating truth undisguised and uncorrupted in its native purity, while others behold it in a vitiated and delusive form." The number of the Mystics increased in the fourth century, under the influence of the Grecian fanatic, who gave himself out for Dionysius the Areopagite, a disciple of St. Paul, and who probably lived about this period; and by pretending to higher degrees of perfection than other Christians, and practicing great austerities, their cause gained ground, especially in the eastern provinces, in the fifth century. A copy of the pretended works of Dionysius was sent by Balbus to Lewis the Meek, A. D. 824, which kindled the holy flame of Mysticism in the western provinces, and filled the Latins with the most enthusiastic admiration of this new system. In the twelfth century, these Mystics took the lead in their method of expounding the Scriptures. In the thirteenth, they were the most formidable antagonists of the schoolmen; and, toward the close of the fourteenth, many of them resided and propagated their tenets in almost every part of Europe. They had, in the fifteenth century, many persons of distinguished merit in their number. In the sixteenth, previously to the Reformation, if any sparks of real piety subsisted under the despotic empire of superstition, they were chiefly to be found among the Mystics; and in the seventeenth, the radical principle of Mysticism was adopted by the Behmists, Bourignonists, and Quietists.

The Mystics propose a disinterestedness of love, without other motives, and profess to feel, in the enjoyment of the temper itself, an abundant reward; and passive contemplation in the state of perfection to which they aspire. They lay little or no stress upon the outward ceremonies and ordinances of religion, but dwell chiefly upon the inward operations of the mind. It is not uncommon for them to allegorize certain passages of Scripture; at the same time they do not deny the literal sense, as having an allusion to the inward experience of believers. Thus, according to them, the word Jerusalem, which is the name of the capital of Judea, signifies, allegorically, the Church militant; morally, a believer; and mysteriously, heaven. That sublime passage, also, in Genesis, "Let there be light, and there was light," which is, according to the letter, corporeal light, signifies, allegorically, the Messiah; morally, grace; and mysteriously, beatitude, or the light of glory. All this appears to be harmless; yet we must be careful not to give way to the sallies of a lively imagination in interpreting Scripture. Woolston is said to have been led to reject the Old Testament by spiritualizing and allegorizing the New.

The Mystics are not confined to any particular denomination of Christians, but may be found in most countries, and among many descriptions of religionists. Among the number of Mystics may be reckoned many singular characters, especially Behmen, a shoemaker at Grolitz, in Germany; Molinos, a Spanish priest, in the seventeenth century; Madame Guion, a French lady, who made a great noise in the religious world; and the celebrated Madame Bourignon, who wrote a work entitled "The Light of the World," which is full of Mystic extravagances. Fénelon also, the learned and amiable Archbishop of Cambray, favored the same sentiments, for which he was reprimanded by the pope. His work entitled, "An Explication of the Maxims of the Saints," which abounds with Mystical sentiments, was condemned; and to the pope's sentence against him the good archbishop quietly submitted, and even read it publicly himself, in the cathedral of Cambray. In this whole affair, his chief opponent is said to have been the famous Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux. Mr. William Law, author of the "Serious Call," etc., degenerated, in the latter part of his life, into all the singularities of Mysticism. In the best sense, Mysticism is to be regarded as an error arising out of partial views of the truth, or truth made erroneous, as being put out of its proper relation to, and connection with, other truths. As it respects the inward life of religion, its tendency is to a species of fanaticism, and to induce a contempt for Divinely appointed ordinances. In many, however, it has been happily tempered by good principles; and too frequently has all scriptural Christianity, in its inward influence, been branded with the name of Mysticism.

[NAAMAH. Daughter of Lamech and Zillah. Gen. iv. 22.—Also, the mother of Rehoboam. 1 Kings xiv. 21.]

NAAMAN, general of the army of Benhadad, King of Syria, mentioned 2 Kings v. He appears to have been a Gentile idolater; but being miraculously cured of his leprosy by the power of the God of Israel, and the direction of his prophet Elisha, he renounced his idolatry, and acknowledged this God to be the only true God: "Behold, now I know that there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel;" 2 Kings v. 15; and promised, for the time to come, that he would worship none other but Jehovah; verse 17. He also requested the prophet that he might have two mules' load of earth to carry home with him from the land of Israel, most probably intending to build an altar with it in his own country; which seems, indeed, to be implied in the reason with which he enforces his request: "Shall there not, I pray thee, be given to thy servant two mules' burden of earth? for thy servant will henceforth offer neither burnt-offering nor sacrifice to other gods, but unto Jehovah." He further says, "In this the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goes into the house of Rimmon, to worship there, and he leaneth upon my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing;" verse 18; which some understand to be a reserve, denoting that he would renounce idolatry no further than was consistent with his worldly interest—with his prince's favor and his place at court. But if so, the prophet would hardly have dismissed him with a blessing, saying, "Go in peace," verse 19. Others, therefore, suppose, that in these words he begs pardon for what he had done in times past, not for what he should continue to do. They observe, that נִשְׁחָרְרִי, though rendered in the future tense by the Targum, and by all the ancient versions, is really the preterperfect: and they therefore understand it,—“when I have bowed myself,” or, “because I have bowed myself” in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant. With this sense Dr. Lightfoot agrees, and it is defended by the learned Bochart in a large dissertation on the case of Naaman. Yet it does not seem very probable that, if he meant this for a penitential acknowledgment of his former idolatry, he should only mention what he had done as the king's servant, and omit his own voluntary worship of the idol. The more probable opinion, therefore, is, that he consulted the prophet, whether it was lawful for him, having renounced idolatry, and publicly professed the worship of the true God, still, in virtue of his office, to attend his master in the temple of Rimmon, in order that he might lean upon him, either out of state, or perhaps out of bodily weakness; because, if he attended him as he had formerly done, he could not avoid bowing down when he did. To this the prophet returns no direct answer; making no other reply than, “Go in peace;” putting it, probably, upon his conscience to act as that should dictate, and not being willing to relieve him from this trial of his recent faith.

After this we have no further mention of Naaman. But in the following account of the wars between Syria and Israel, Benhadad seems to have commanded his army in person; from whence Mr. Bedford infers that Naaman was dismissed from the command for refusing to worship Rimmon. But the premises are not sufficient to support the conclusion; for it appears that Benhadad had commanded his army in person twice before—once in the siege of Samaria, 1 Kings xx. 1, and once at Aphek, verse 26. Yet, from the total silence concerning Naaman, it is probably enough conjectured, that he either died, or resigned, or was dismissed, soon after his return. [NABAL. The charlish husband of Abigail. 1 Sam. xxv.]

NABOTH, an Israelite of the city of Jezreel, who lived under Ahab, king of the ten tribes, and had a fine vineyard near the king's palace. Ahab coveted his property; but Naboth, according to the law, Lev. xxv. 23, 24, refused to sell it; and besides, it was a disgrace for a Hebrew to alienate the inheritance of his ancestors. Ahab, returning into his house, threw himself on his bed, and refused to eat; when Jezebel, his wife, took upon herself to procure the vineyard. She wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with the king's seal, and sent them to the elders of Jezreel, directing them to publish a fast, to place Naboth among the chief of the people, to suborn against him two sons of Belial, or two false witnesses, who might depose that Naboth had blasphemed God and the king. Accordingly, Naboth was condemned and stoned for the supposed crime, which brought upon Ahab and Jezebel the severest maledictions. 1 Kings xxi. See AHAH.

NADAB, son of Aaron, and brother to Abihu. He offered incense to the Lord with strange fire, that is, with common fire, and not with that which had been miraculously lighted upon the altar of burnt-offerings. Therefore he was slain by the Lord, together with his brother Abihu. Lev. x. 1, etc.—[Also, the son and successor of Jeroboam, King of Israel. 1 Kings xiv. 20; xv. 25–31.]

[NAHASH. 2 Sam. xvii. 25. Some suppose Jesse is meant, and others Jesse's wife. Compare 1 Chron. ii. 13–17.—Also, a king of the Ammonites. 1 Sam. xi. : 1 Chron. xix. 2.]

NAHOR, son of Terah, and brother of Abraham. Gen. xi. 26 Neither the year of his birth nor of his death are exactly known. Nahor married Milcah, the daughter of Haran, by whom he had several sons, namely, Huz, Buz, Kemuel, Chesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel. Nahor fixed his habitation at Haran, which is therefore called the city of Nahor. Gen. xi. 29; xxii. 20–22; xxiv. 10.—[Terah's father was also named Nahor. Gen. xi. 22–25.]

[NAHSHON, NAASON. Son of Amminadab. Num. i. 7: Matt. i. 4: Luke iii. 32, 33.]

NAHUM is supposed to have been a native of Elcosh or Elcosha, a village in Galilee, and to have been of the tribe of Simeon. There is great uncertainty about the exact period in which he lived; but it is generally allowed that he delivered his predictions between the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, and probably about B. C. 715. They relate solely to the destruction of Nineveh by the Babylonians and Medes, and are introduced by an animated display of the attributes of God. Of all the minor prophets, says Bishop Lowth, none seems to equal Nahum in sublimity, ardor, and boldness. His prophecy forms an entire and regular poem. The exordium is magnificent and truly august. The preparation for the destruction of Nineveh, and the description of that destruction, are expressed in the most glowing colors; and at the same time the prophet writes with a perspicuity and elegance which have a just claim to our highest admiration.

NAIL. The nail of Jael's tent with which she killed Sisera is called נִיב; it was formed for penetrating earth or other hard substances, when driven by sufficient force, as with a hammer, etc. It includes the idea of strength. The orientals, in fitting up their houses, were by no means inattentive to the comfort and satisfaction arising from order and method. Their furniture was scanty and plain; but they were careful to arrange the few household utensils they needed so as not to encumber the apartments to which they belonged. Their devices for this purpose, which, like every part of the structure, bore the character of remarkable simplicity, may not correspond with our ideas of neatness and propriety; but they accorded with their taste, and sufficiently answered their design. One of these consisted in a set of spikes, nails, or large pegs fixed in the walls of the house, upon which they hung up the movables and utensils in common use that belonged to the room. These nails they do not drive into the walls with a hammer or mallet, but fix them there when the house is building; for if the walls are of brick, they are too hard, or if they consist of clay, too soft and mouldering, to admit the action of the hammer. The spikes, which are so contrived as to strengthen the walls by binding the parts together, as well as to serve for convenience, are large, with square heads like dice, and bent at the ends, so as to make them cramp irons. They commonly place them at the windows and doors, in order to hang upon them, when they choose, veils and curtains, although they place them in other parts of the room, to hang up other things of various kinds. The care with which they fixed these nails may be inferred, as well from the important purposes they were meant to serve, as from the promise of the Lord to Eliakim: "And I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place." Isa. xxii. 23. It is evident from the words of the prophet, that it was common in his time to suspend upon them the utensils belonging to the apartment: "Will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon?" Ezek. xv. 3. The word used in Isaiah for a nail of this sort, is the same which denotes the stake, or large pin of iron, which fastened down to the ground the cords of their tents. These nails, therefore, were of necessary and common use, and of no small importance in all their apartments; and if they seem to us mean and insignificant, it is because they are unknown to us, and inconsistent with our notions of propriety, and because we have no name for them but what conveys to our ear a low and contemptible idea. It is evident from the frequent allusions in Scripture to these instruments, that they were not regarded with contempt or indifference by the natives of Palestine. "Grace has been shown from the Lord our God," said Ezra, "to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in his holy place," Ezra ix. 8; or, as explained in the margin, a constant and sure abode. The dignity and propriety of the metaphor appear from the use which the prophet Zechariah makes of it: "Out of him cometh forth the corner, out of him the nail, out of him the battle bow, out of him every oppressor together." Zech. x. 4. The whole frame of government, both in Church and state, which the chosen people of God enjoyed, was the contrivance of his wisdom and the gift of his bounty: the foundations upon which it rested, the bonds which kept the several parts together, its means of defence, its officers and executors, were all the fruits of distinguishing goodness: even the oppressors of his people were a rod of correction in the hand of Jehovah, to convince them of sin, and restore them to his service.

NAIN, a city of Palestine, in which Jesus Christ restored the widow's son to life, as they were carrying him out to be buried. Eusebius says that this was in the neighborhood of Endor and Scythopolis, two miles from Tabor, toward the south. [The text of Eusebius now reads twelve—that of Jerome two; both, says Dr.

Robinson, are corruptions. Nain is a small hamlet, inhabited by Jews and Turks.]

[NAIOTH. Some say Ramah was a hill, and Naioth a town upon it. Others render the word appellatively, the cells, that is of the school of the prophets, there located. 1 Sam. xix. 18; xx. 1.]

NAKEDNESS, NUDITY. These terms, besides their ordinary and literal meaning, sometimes signify void of succor, disarmed. So, after worshipping the golden calf, the Israelites found themselves naked in the midst of their enemies. "Nakedness of the feet" was a token of respect. Moses put off his shoes to approach the burning bush. Most commentators are of opinion that the priests served in the tabernacle with their feet naked; and afterward in the temple. In the enumeration that Moses makes of the habit and ornaments of the priests, he nowhere mentions any dress for the feet. Also the frequent ablutions appointed them in the temple seem to imply that their feet were naked. To uncover the nakedness of any one, is commonly put for a shameful and unlawful conjunction, or an incestuous marriage. Lev. xx. 19: Ezek. xvi. 37. Nakedness is sometimes put for being partly undressed: en deshhabillé. Saul continued naked among the prophets; that is, having only his undergarments on. Isaiah received orders from the Lord to go naked; that is, clothed as a slave, half clad. Thus it is recommended to clothe the naked; that is, such as are ill clothed. St. Paul says, that he was in cold, in nakedness; that is, in poverty, and want of raiment. Naked is put for discovered, known, manifest. So Job xxvi. 6: "Hell is naked before him." The sepulchre, the unseen state, is open to the eyes of God. St. Paul says, in the same sense, "Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do." Heb. iv. 13.

NAME. A name was given to the male child at the time of its circumcision; but it is probable, previous to the introduction of that rite, that the name was given immediately after its birth. Among the orientals the appellations given as names are always significant. In the Old Testament, we find that the child was named in many instances from the circumstances of its birth, or from some peculiarities in the history of the family to which it belonged. Gen. xvi. 11; xix. 37; xxv. 25, 26: Exod. ii. 10; xviii. 3, 4. Frequently the name was a compound one, one part being the name of the Deity, and among idolatrous nations the name of an idol. The following instances may be mentioned among others, and may stand as specimens of the whole, namely, שמואל, Samuel, "hear God;" אדוניאח, Adonijah, "God is lord;" יוסדעך, Josedech, "God is just;" איתבאל, Eithbaal, a Canaanitish name, the latter part of the compound being the name of the idol deity, Baal; בלשאצר, Belshazzar, "Bel," a Babylonish deity, "is ruler and king." Sometimes the name had a prophetic meaning. Gen. xvii. 15: Isa. vii. 14; viii. 3: Hos. i. 4, 6, 9: Matt. i. 21: Luke i. 13, 60, 63. In the later times names were selected from those of the progenitors of a family; hence in the New Testament hardly any other than ancient names occur

Matt. i. 12: Luke i. 61; iii. 23, etc. The inhabitants of the east very frequently change their names, and sometimes do it for very slight reasons. This accounts for the fact of so many persons having two names in Scripture. Ruth i. 20, 21: 1 Sam. xiv. 49; xxxi. 2; 1 Chron. x. 2: Judges vi. 32; vii. 1: 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. Kings and princes very often changed the names of those who held offices under them, particularly when they first attracted their notice, and were taken into their employ, and when subsequently they were elevated to some new station, and crowned with additional honors. Gen. xli. 45; xvii. 5; xxxii. 28; xxxv. 10: 2 Kings xxiii. 34, 35; xxiv. 17: Dan. i. 6: John i. 42: Mark iii. 17. Hence a name, a new name, occurs tropically, as a token or proof of distinction and honor in the following among other passages: Phil. ii. 9: Heb. i. 4: Rev. ii. 17. Sometimes the names of the dead were changed; for instance, that of Abel, אֵבֶל, a word which signifies breath, or something transitory as a breath, given to him after his death, in allusion to the shortness of his life. Gen. iv. 8. Sometimes proper names are translated into other languages, losing their original form, while they preserve their signification. This appears to have been the case with the proper names which occur in the first eleven chapters of Genesis, and which were translated into the Hebrew from a language still more ancient. The orientals in some instances, in order to distinguish themselves from others of the same name, added to their own name the name of their father, grandfather, and even great-grandfather. The name of God often signifies God himself; sometimes his attributes collectively; sometimes his power and authority. Of the Messiah it is said, "And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings, and Lord of lords." Rev. xix. 16. In illustration of this it may be remarked, that it appears to have been an ancient custom among several nations to adorn the images of their deities, princes, victors at their public games, and other eminent persons, with inscriptions expressive of their names, character, titles, or some circumstance which might contribute to their honor. There are several such images yet extant, with an inscription written either on the garment or one of the thighs. Herodotus mentions two figures of Sesostris, King of Egypt, cut upon rocks in Ionia, after his conquest of that country, with the following inscription across the breast, extending from one shoulder to the other: "I conquered this country by the force of my arms." Gruter has published a naked statue made of marble, and supposed to represent the genius either of some Roman emperor, or of Antinous, who was deified by Hadrian, with an inscription on the inside of the right thigh, written perpendicularly in Roman letters, and containing the names of three persons. Near the statue, on the same side of it, stands an oval shield with the names of two other persons written round the rim in letters of the same form. In the appendix to Dempster's "Etruria Regalis," is a female image of brass, clothed in a loose tunic down to the feet, with a shorter garment over it, on the right side of which is a perpendicular inscription in Etrurian characters, extending partly on the lower garment. This figure, from the diadem on the head, and other circumstances which accompany it, Philip Bonarota, the editor of that work, supposes to have been designed for some Etrurian deity. Montfaucon has given us a male image of the same metal, dressed in a tunic, and over that another vestment something like a Roman toga, reaching to the middle of the legs, on the bottom of which is an Etrurian inscription written horizontally. There are likewise in both those writers two male figures crowned with laurel, which Montfaucon calls combatants, as the laurel was an emblem of victory. But Bonarota takes one of them for an image of Apollo, which has a chain round the neck, a garment wrapped over the right arm, and a bracelet on the left, with half-boots on the legs; the rest of the body being naked has an Etrurian inscription written downward in two lines on the inside of the left thigh. The other figure has the lower part of the body clothed in a loose vestment, with an inscription upon it over the right thigh, perpendicularly written in Roman letters, which Bonarota has thus expressed in a more distinct manner than they appear in Montfaucon: POMPONIO VIRIO I. To these may be added, from Montfaucon, a marble statue of a naked combatant, with a fillet about his head in token of victory. It is drawn in two views, one exhibiting the back and the other the fore-part of the body, the latter of which has in Greek letters, ΚΑΦΙΣΟΔΩΡΟΣ for ΚΑΦΙΣΟΔΩΡΟΣ, perpendicularly inscribed on the outside of the left thigh; and the former the name ΑΙΣΧΑΜΙΟΥ in the like characters and situation on the right thigh; these together make one inscription, signifying Caphisodorus filius Æschlamii. [Caphisodorus, the son of Æschlamius.]

NAOMI. See RUTH.

NAPHTALI, the sixth son of Jacob by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. The word Naphtali signifies wrestling, or struggling. When Rachel gave him this name, she said, "With great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed." Gen. xxx. 8. Naphtali had but four sons, and yet at the coming out of Egypt his tribe made up fifty-three thousand four hundred men able to bear arms. Moses, in the blessing he gave to the same tribe, says, "O Naphtali, satisfied with favor, and full with the blessing of the Lord, possess thou the west and the south." Deut. xxxiii. 23. The Vulgate reads it, "the sea and the south," and the Hebrew will admit of either interpretation, that is, the sea of Genesareth, which was to the south by the inheritance of this tribe. His soil was very fruitful in corn and oil. His limits were extended into upper and lower Galilee, having Jordan to the east, the tribes of Asher and Zebulun to the west, Libanus to the north, and the tribe of Issachar to the south. Under Barak, their general, they and the Zebulunites fought with distinguished bravery against the army of Jabin the younger; and at the desire of Gideon they pursued the Midianites. Judges iv. 10; v. 18; vii. 23. A thousand of their captains, with thirty-seven thousand of their troops, assisted at David's coronation, and brought great quantities of provision with them. 1 Chron. xii. 34, 40. We find no person of distinguished note among them, save Barak, and Hiram the artificer. Instigated by Asa, Benhadad the elder, King of Syria, terribly ravaged the land of Naphtali; and what it suffered in after invasions by the Syrians we are partly told, 1 Kings xv. 20. The Naphtalites were, many, if not most of them, carried captive by Tiglath-pileser, King of Assyria. 2 Kings xv. 29. Josiah purged their country from idols. Our Saviour and his disciples, during his public ministry, resided much and preached frequently in the land of Naphtali. Isaiah ix. 1: Matt. iv. 13, 15.

NAPHTUHM, a son, or rather the descendant of a son, of Mizraim, whose proper name is Naphtuch. Naphtuch is supposed to have given his name to Naph, Noph, or Memphis, and to have been the first king of that division of Egypt. He is, however, placed by Bochart in Lybia; and is conjectured to be the Aphtuchus, or Autuchus, who had a temple somewhere here. He is further conjectured, and not without reason, to be the original of the heathen god Neptune; who is represented to have been a Lybian, and whose temples were generally built near the sea-coast. By others, he is supposed to have peopled that part of Ethiopia between Syene and Meroe, the capital of which was called Napata. [Gen. x. 13.]

[NAPKIN. Σουδάριον, from the Latin sudarium, a word which indicates one of its uses—a handkerchief. It is frequently found around the heads of Egyptian mummies. John xi. 44; xx. 7. The Rabbins say money was sometimes wrapped up in it. Luke xix. 20.]

[NARTHEX. The vestibule of an ancient church, where the mourners stood. Also the place just inside the pule, or great door, where the catechumens and hearers stood.]

NATHAN, a prophet of the Lord, who appeared in Israel in the time of King David, and had a great share in the confidence of this prince. His country is unknown, as also the time in which he began to prophesy. The first time we find him mentioned is when David designed to build the temple. 2 Sam. vii. 3, etc. We find him mentioned again in the affair of David and Bathsheba, when he faithfully reproved the king for his wicked conduct. 2 Sam. xii. 1-14. And when Adonijah began to take upon him the state and to assume the dignity of a sovereign, and to form a party in opposition to his brother Solomon, Nathan repaired to Bathsheba, and sent her immediately to the king with instructions what to say; and while she was yet discoursing with the king, Nathan came in, reminded David of his promise, that Solomon should be his successor, and procured Solomon to be immediately anointed king of Israel. [1 Kings i.]

NATHANAEL, a disciple of our Lord. He appears to have been a pious Jew who waited for the Messiah; and upon Jesus saying to him, "Before Philip called thee, I saw thee under the fig tree," Nathanael, convinced, by some circumstance not explained, of his omniscience, exclaimed, "Master, thou art the Son of God, and the King of Israel." Many have thought that Nathanael was the same as Bartholomew. The evangelists, who mention Bartholomew, say nothing of Nathanael; and St. John, who mentions Nathanael, takes no notice of Bartholomew. [The name Tholomaios occurs twice in Josephus. Nathanael was therefore the son of a man of this name—in Hebrew, Tolmai.] We read at the end of St. John's Gospel, that our Saviour, after his resurrection, manifested himself to Peter, Thomas, Nathanael, and the sons of Zebedee, as they were fishing in the Lake of Genesareth. We know no other circumstances of the life of this holy man.

NATURAL, φυσικός, is a term that frequently occurs in the apostolic writings: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." 1 Cor. ii. 14. Here it is plain that by "the natural man" is not meant a person devoid of natural judgment, reason, or conscience, in which sense the expression is often used among men. Nor does it signify one who is entirely governed by his fleshly appetites, or what the world calls a voluptuary, or sensualist. Neither does it signify merely a man in the rude state of nature, whose faculties have not been cultivated by learning and study, and polished by an intercourse with society. The apostle manifestly takes his "natural man" from among such as the world hold in the highest repute for their natural parts, their learning, and their religion. He selects him from among the philosophers of Greece, who sought after wisdom, and from among the Jewish scribes, who were instructed in the revealed law of God. 1 Cor. i. 22, 23. These are the persons whom he terms the wise, the scribes, the disputers of this world—men to whom the gospel was a stumbling-block and foolishness. 1 Cor. i. 20, 23. The natural man is here evidently opposed to ὁ πνευματικός, "him that is spiritual," 1 Cor. ii. 15, even as the natural body which we derive from Adam is opposed to the spiritual body which believers will receive from Christ at the resurrection, according to 1 Cor. xv. 44, 45. Now the spiritual man is one who has the Spirit of Christ dwelling in him, Rom. viii. 9, not merely in the way of miraculous gifts, as some have imagined, (for these were peculiar to the first age of the Christian Church, and even then not common to all the saints, nor inseparably connected with salvation, 1 Corinthians xiii. 1-4,) but in his saving influences of light, holiness, and consolation, whereby the subject is made to discern the truth and excellency of spiritual things, and so to believe, love, and delight in them as his true happiness. If therefore a man is called "spiritual" because the Spirit of Christ dwells in him, giving him new views, dispositions, and enjoyments, then the "natural man," being opposed to such, must be one who is destitute of the Spirit, and of all his saving and supernatural effects, whatever may be his attainments in human learning and science. It is obviously upon this principle that our Lord insists upon the necessity of the new birth in order to our entering into the kingdom of heaven. John iii. 3, 5.

NATURE. In Scripture the word nature expresses the orderly and usual course of things established in the world. St. Paul says, to ingraft a good olive tree into a wild olive is contrary to nature, Rom. xi. 24; the customary order of nature is thereby in some measure inverted. Nature is also put for natural descent: "We who are Jews by nature," by birth, "and not Gentiles." Gal. ii. 15. "We were by nature the children of wrath." Eph. ii. 3. Nature also denotes common sense, natural instinct: "Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame to him?" 1 Cor. xi. 14.

[NAVE.] The middle portion of a church. NAZARENES, or NAZARÆANS, a name originally given to Christians in general, on account of Jesus Christ's being of the city of Nazareth; [Acts xxiv. 5;] but was, in the second century, restrained to certain judaizing Christians, who blended Christianity and Judaism together. They held that Christ was born of a virgin, and was also in a certain manner united to the Divine nature. They refused to abandon the ceremonies prescribed by the law of Moses; but were far from attempting to impose the observance of these ceremonies upon Gentile Christians. They rejected those additions that were made to the Mosaic institutions by the Pharisees and doctors of the law, and admitted the Scriptures both of the Old and New Testament. The fathers frequently mention the Gospel of the Nazarenes, which differs nothing from that of St. Matthew, but was afterward corrupted by the Ebionites. These Nazarenes preserved this first Gospel in its primitive purity. Some of them were still in being in the time of St. Jerome, who does not reproach them with any errors.

NAZARETH, a little city in the tribe of Zebulun, in Lower Galilee, to the west of Tabor, and to the east of Ptolemais. This city is much celebrated in the Scriptures for having been the usual place of the residence of Jesus Christ, during the first thirty years of his life. Luke ii. 51. It was here he lived in obedience to Joseph and Mary, and hence he took the name of Nazarene. After he had begun to execute his mission, he preached here sometimes in the synagogue. Luke iv. 16. But because his countrymen had no faith in him, and were offended at the meanness of his original, he did not many miracles here, Matt. xiii. 54, 58, nor would he dwell in the city. So he fixed his habitation at Capernaum for the latter part of his life. Matt. iv. 13. The city of Nazareth was situated upon an eminence, and on one side was a precipice, from whence the Nazarenes designed, at one time, to cast Christ down headlong, because he upbraided them for their incredulity. Luke iv. 29.

The present state of this celebrated place is thus described by modern travellers:—Nassara, or Naszera, is one of the principal towns in the Pashalic of Acre. Its inhabitants are industrious, because they are treated with less severity than those of the country towns in general. The population is estimated at three thousand, of whom five hundred are Turks; the remainder are Christians. There are about ninety Latin families, according to Burckhardt; but Mr. Connor reports the Greeks to be the most numerous; there are, besides, a congregation of Greek Catholics and another of Maronites. The Latin convent is a very spacious and commodious building, which was thoroughly repaired and considerably enlarged in 1730. The remains of the more ancient edifice, ascribed to the mother of Constantine, may be observed in the form of subverted columns, with fragments of capitals and bases of pillars, lying near the modern building. Pococke noticed, over a door, an old alto-relief of Judith cutting off the head of Holofernes. Within the convent is the Church of the Annunciation, containing the house of Joseph and Mary, the length of which is not quite the breadth of the church; but it forms the principal part of it. The columns and all the interior of the church are hung round with damask silk, which gives it a warm and rich appearance. Behind the great altar is a subterranean cavern, divided into small grottoes, where the virgin is said to have lived. Her kitchen, parlor, and bedroom are shown, and also a narrow hole in the rock, in which the child Jesus once hid himself from his persecutors. The pilgrims who visit these holy spots are in the habit of knocking off small pieces of stone from the walls, which are thus considerably enlarging. In the church a miracle is still exhibited to the faithful. In front of the altar are two granite columns, each two feet one inch in diameter, and about three feet apart. They are supposed to occupy the very places where the angel and the virgin stood at the precise moment of the annunciation. The innermost of these, that of the virgin, has been broken away, some say by the Turks, in expectation of finding treasure under it; "so that," as Maundrell states, "eighteen inches' length of it is clean gone between the pillar and the pedestal." Nevertheless, it remains erect, suspended from the roof, as if attracted by a loadstone. It has evidently no support below; and, though it touches the roof, the hierophant protests that it has none above. "All the Christians of Nazareth," says Burckhardt, "with the friars, of course, at their head, affect to believe in this miracle; though it is perfectly evident that the upper part of the column is connected with the roof." "The fact is," says Dr. E. D. Clarke, "that the capital and a piece of the shaft of a pillar of gray granite have been fastened on to the roof of the cave; and so clumsily is the rest of the hocus-pocus contrived, that what is shown for the lower fragment of the same pillar resting upon the earth, is not of the same substance, but of Cipolino marble. About this pillar, a different story has been related by almost every traveller since the trick was devised. Maundrell, and Egmont, and Heyman, were told that it was broken, in search of hidden treasure, by a pasha, who was struck with blindness for his impiety. We were assured that it was separated in this manner when the angel announced to the virgin the tidings of her conception. The monks had placed a rail, to prevent persons infected with the plague from coming to rub against these pillars; this had been, for many years, their constant practice, whenever afflicted with any sickness. The reputation of the broken pillar, for healing every kind of disease, prevails all over Galilee."

Burckhardt says that this church, next to that of the holy sepulchre, is the finest in Syria, and contains two tolerably good organs. Within the walls of the convent are two gardens, and a small burying-ground: the walls are very thick, and serve occasionally as a fortress to all the Christians in the town. There are, at present, eleven friars in the convent: they are chiefly Spaniards. The yearly expenses of the establishment are stated to amount to upward of nine hundred pounds; a small part of which is defrayed by the rent of a few houses in the town, and by the produce of some acres of corn land: the rest is remitted from Jerusalem. The whole annual expenses of the Terra Santa convents are about fifteen thousand pounds; of which the pasha of Damascus receives about twelve thousand pounds. The Greek convent of Jerusalem, according to Burckhardt's authority, pays much more, as well to maintain its own privileges, as with a view to encroach upon those of the Latins. To the north-west of the convent is a small church, built over Joseph's workshop. Both Maundrell and Pococke describe it as in ruins; but Dr. E. D. Clarke says, "This is now a small chapel, perfectly modern, and neatly whitewashed." To the west of this is a small arched building, which, they say, is the synagogue where Christ exasperated the Jews, by applying the language of Isaiah to himself. It once belonged to the Greeks; but, Hasselquist says, was taken from them by the Arabs, who intended to convert it into a mosque, but afterward sold it to the Latins. This was then so late a transaction that they had not had time to embellish it. The "Mountain of the Precipitation" is at least two miles off; so that, according to this authentic tradition, the Jews must have led our Lord a marvellous way. But the said precipice is shown as that which the Messiah leaped down to escape from the Jews; and as the monks could not pitch upon any other place frightful enough for the miracle, they contend that Nazareth formerly stood eastward of its present situation, upon a more elevated spot. Dr. E. D. Clarke, however, remarks that the situation of the modern town answers exactly to the description of St. Luke: "Induced, by the words of the Gospel, to examine the place more attentively than we should otherwise have done, we went, as it is written, out of the city, 'to the brow of the hill whereon the city is built,' and came to a precipice corresponding to the words of the evangelist. It is above the Maronite church, and probably the precise spot alluded to by the text."

[Dr. Robinson makes the population of Nazareth three thousand; but Lieut. Lynch, who visited it in 1848, says it "contains about five thousand inhabitants, four-fifths Christians, the remainder Muslims." He thought it the prettiest place he had seen in Palestine, and the people were more civil than any others he had encountered. He says it has twenty-two villages in its district, which is subordinate to the Pashalic of Acre. One of these villages is Kana el-Jelil, eight miles north-half-east from Nazareth, which Robinson identifies with Cana of Galilee—the name and early tradition being more in favor of this place than of Kefr Kenna, four miles north-east of Nazareth.]

NAZARITES, those under the ancient law who engaged by a vow to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, to let their hair grow, not to enter any house polluted by having a dead body in it, nor to be present at any funeral. If, by accident, any one should have died in their presence, they recommenced the whole of their consecration and Nazariteship. This vow generally lasted eight days, sometimes a month, and sometimes their whole lives. When the time of their Nazariteship was expired, the priest brought the person to the door of the temple, who there offered to the Lord a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a she-lamb for an expiatory sacrifice, and a ram for a peace-offering. They offered, likewise, loaves and cakes, with wine, for libations. After all was sacrificed and offered, the priest, or some other, shaved the head of the Nazarite at the door of the tabernacle, and burned his hair on the fire of the altar. Then the priest put into the hands of the Nazarite the shoulder of the ram roasted, with a loaf and a cake, which the Nazarite returning into the hands of the priest, he offered them to the Lord, lifting them up in the presence of the Nazarite. And from this time he might again drink wine, his Nazariteship being accomplished.

Perpetual Nazarites, as Samson and John the Baptist, were consecrated to their Nazariteship by their parents, and continued all their lives in this state, without drinking wine or cutting their hair. Those who made a vow of Nazariteship out of Palestine, and could not come to the temple when their vow was expired, contented themselves with observing the abstinence required by the law, and cutting off their hair in the place where they were: the offerings and sacrifices prescribed by Moses to be offered at the temple, by themselves or by others for them, they deferred till a convenient opportunity. Hence it was that St. Paul, being at Corinth, and having made the vow of a Nazarite, had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth, and deferred the rest of his vow till he came to Jerusalem. Acts xviii. 18. When a person found he was not in a condition to make a vow of Nazariteship, or had not leisure fully to perform it, he contented himself by contributing to the expense of sacrifices and offerings of those who had made and were fulfilling this vow; and by this means he became a partaker in such Nazariteship. When St. Paul came to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, St. James, with other brethren, said to him, that to quiet the minds of the converted Jews, he should join himself to four persons who had a vow of Nazariteship, and contribute to their charges and ceremonies: by which the new converts would perceive that he did not totally disregard the law, as they had been led to suppose Acts xxi. 23, 24. The institution of Nazaritism is involved in much mystery; and no satisfactory reason has ever been given of it. This is certain, that it had the approbation of God, and may be considered as affording a good example of self-denial in order to be given up to the study of the law, and the practice of exact righteousness. [The name comes from a word signifying to separate. Num. vi.]

A ridge of elevated land, which connects the range of Pangæus with the higher mountains in the interior of Thrace, is crossed between Neapolis and Philippi. The whole distance is about ten miles."]

Num. xxxii. 8, 38.—There is also a Nebo mentioned, Neh. vii. 33.]

NEBO, the name of an idol of the Babylonians: "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth." Isa. xlv. 1. The word Nebo comes from a root that signifies "to prophesy," and therefore may stand for an oracle. There is some probability in the opinion of Calmet, that Bel and Nebo are but one and the same deity, and that Isaiah made use of these names as synonymous. The god Bel was the oracle of the Babylonians. The name Nebo, or Nabo, is found in the composition of the names of several princes of Babylon; as Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzar-adan, Nebushasban, etc. [Some identify Nebo with Mercury, corresponding to Anubis and Hermes, the interpreter of the gods.]

NEBUCHADNEZZAR THE GREAT, son and successor of Nabopolassar, succeeded to the kingdom of Chaldea, A. M. 3399. Some time previously to this, Nabopolassar had associated him in the kingdom, and sent him to recover Carchemish, which had been conquered from him four years before by Necho, King of Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar, having been successful, marched against the governor of Phenicia, and Jehoiakim, King of Judah, who was tributary to Necho, King of Egypt. He took Jehoiakim, and put him in chains, in order to carry him captive to Babylon; but afterward left him in Judea on condition of paying a large tribute. He took away several persons from Jerusalem; among others, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, all of the royal family, whom the King of Babylon caused to be carefully instructed in the language and in the learning of the Chaldeans, that they might be employed at court. Dan. i. Nabopolassar dying about the end of A. M. 3399, Nebuchadnezzar, who was then either in Egypt or in Judea, hastened to Babylon, leaving to his generals the care of bringing to Chaldea the captives whom he had taken in Syria, Judea, Phenicia, and Egypt; for, according to Berosus, he had subdued all those countries. He distributed these captives into several colonies; and deposited the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, and other rich spoils, in the temple of Belus. Jehoiakim, King of Judah, continued three years in fealty to King Nebuchadnezzar; but being then weary of paying tribute, he threw off the yoke. The King of Chaldea sent troops of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, who harassed Judea during three or four years, and at last Jehoiakim was besieged and taken in Jerusalem, put to death, and his body thrown to the birds of the air, according to the predictions of Jeremiah. See JEHOIAKIM.

In the mean time, Nebuchadnezzar, being at Babylon in the second year of his reign, had a mysterious dream, in which he saw a statue composed of several metals, a head of gold, a breast of silver, belly and thighs of brass, legs of iron, and feet half of iron and half of clay; and a little stone rolling by its own impulse from the mountain struck the statue and broke it. This dream gave him great uneasiness, yet it faded away from his memory, and he could not recover more than the general impression of it. He ordered all his diviners and interpreters of dreams to be sent for, but none could tell him the dream or the interpretation; and, in wrath, he sentenced them all to death, which was about to be put into execution, when Daniel was informed of it. He went immediately to the king, and desired him to respite the sentence a little, and he would endeavor to satisfy his desire. God in the night revealed to him the king's dream, and also the interpretation: "Thou," said Daniel, "art represented by the golden head of the statue

After thee will arise a kingdom inferior to thine, represented by the breast of silver; and after this, another, still inferior, denoted by the belly and thighs of brass. After these three empires," which are the Chaldeans, Persians, and Greeks, "will arise a fourth, denoted by the legs of iron," the Romans. "Under this last empire God will raise a new one, of greater strength, power, and extent, than all the others. This last is that of the Messiah, represented by the little stone coming out from the mountain and overthrowing the statue." Then the king raised Daniel to great honor, set him over all the wise men of Babylon, and gave him the government of that province. At his request, he granted to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, the oversight of the works of the same province of Babylon.

In the same year, as Dr. Hales thinks, in which he had this dream, he erected a golden statue, whose height was sixty cubits, and breadth six cubits, in the plains of Dura, in the province of Babylon. Having appointed a day for the dedication of this statue, he assembled the principal officers of his kingdom, and published by a herald that all should adore this image, at the sound of music, on penalty of being cast into a burning fiery furnace. The result as to the three Jews, companions of Daniel, who would not bend the knee to the image, is stated in Dan. iii. Daniel probably was absent. The effect of the miracle was so great that Nebuchadnezzar gave glory to the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego; and he exalted the three Hebrews to great dignity in the province of Babylon. Dan. iv.

Jehoiachin, King of Judah, having revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, this prince besieged him in Jerusalem, and forced him to surrender. Nebuchadnezzar took him, with his chief officers, captive to Babylon, with his mother, his wives, and the best workmen of Jerusalem, to the number of ten thousand men. Among the captives were Mordecai, the uncle of Esther, and Ezekiel the prophet. He took, also, all the vessels of gold which Solomon made for the temple, and the king's treasury, and he set up Mattaniah, Jehoiachin's uncle by his father's side, whom he named Zedekiah. This prince continued faithful to Nebuchadnezzar nine years: being then weary of subjection, he revolted and confederated with the neighboring princes. The King of Babylon came into Judea, reduced the chief places of the country, and besieged Jerusalem; but Pharaoh-Hophra coming out of Egypt to assist Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar overcame him in battle, and forced him to retire into his own country. After this he returned to the siege of Jerusalem, and was three hundred and ninety days before the place before he could take it. But in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, A. M. 3416, the city was taken. Zedekiah attempted to escape, but was taken and brought to Nebuchadnezzar, who was then at Riblah in Syria. The King of Babylon condemned him to die, caused his children to be put to death in his presence, and then bored out his eyes, loaded him with chains, and sent him to Babylon.

Three years after the Jewish war, Nebuchadnezzar besieged the city of Tyre, which siege held thirteen years. But during this interval, he made war also on the Sidonians, Moabites, Ammonites, and Idumæans; and these he treated in nearly the same manner as the Jews. Josephus says these wars happened five years after the destruction of Jerusalem—consequently, in A. M. 3421. The city of Tyre was taken in A. M. 3432. Ithobaal, who was then king, was put to death, and Baal succeeded him. The Lord, as a reward to the army of Nebuchadnezzar, which had lain so long before Tyre, gave up to them Egypt and its spoils. Nebuchadnezzar made an easy conquest of it, because the Egyptians were divided by civil wars among themselves: he enriched himself with booty, and returned in triumph to Babylon, with a great number of captives. Being now at peace, he applied himself to the adorning, aggrandizing, and enriching of Babylon with magnificent buildings. To him some ascribe those famous gardens, supported by arches, reckoned among the wonders of the world; and also the walls of Babylon, though many give the honor of this work to Semiramis.

About this time Nebuchadnezzar had a dream of a great tree loaded with fruit. Suddenly, an angel, descending from heaven, commanded that the tree should be cut down, but that the root should be preserved in the earth. Dan. iv. The king sent for all the diviners in the country, but none could explain his dream, till Daniel, by Divine revelation, showed that it represented his present greatness, his signal approaching humiliation, and his restoration to reason and dignity. A year after, as Nebuchadnezzar was walking on his palace at Babylon, he began to say, "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?" And scarcely had he pronounced these words, when he fell into a distemper or distraction, which so altered his imagination that he fled into the fields and assumed the manners of an ox. After having been seven years in this state, God opened his eyes, his understanding was restored to him, and he recovered his royal dignity.

Nebuchadnezzar died A. M. 3442, after having reigned forty-three years. Megasthenes, quoted by Eusebius, says, that this prince having ascended to the top of his palace, was there seized with a fit of Divine enthusiasm, and cried out, "O Babylonians, I declare to you a misfortune, that neither our father Belus nor Queen Baltis has been able to prevent. A Persian mule shall one day come into this country, who, supported by the power of your gods, shall bring you into slavery. He shall be assisted by the Mede, the glory of the Assyrians." This Persian mule is Cyrus, whose mother was a Mede, and whose father was a Persian. The Mede who assisted Cyrus was Cyaxares, or Darius the Mede. This story at least shows that the heathens had traditions of an extraordinary kind respecting this monarch, and that the fate of Babylon had been the subject of prophecy.

NECESSITARIANS. The doctrine of necessity regards the origin of human actions, and the specific mode of the Divine government; and it seems to be the immediate result of the materiality of man; for mechanism is the undoubted consequence of materialism. Hence all materialists are of course necessitarians; but it does not follow that all necessitarians are or must be materialists. Whatever is done by a cause or power that is irresistible, is by necessity; in which sense this term is opposed to freedom. Man is therefore a necessary agent, if all his actions be so determined by the causes preceding each action, that not one past action could possibly not have come to pass, or have been otherwise than it hath been; and not one future action can possibly not come to pass, or be otherwise than it shall be. But man is a free agent, if he be able at any time, in the circumstances in which he is placed, to do different things; or, in other words, if he be not unavoidably determined in every point of time by the circumstances he is in, and the causes he is under, to do that one thing he does, and not possibly to do any other thing. This abstruse subject has occasioned much controversy, and has been debated by writers of the first eminence, from Hobbes and Clarke to Priestley and Gregory. The anti-necessitarians allege that the doctrine of necessity charges God as the author of sin; that it takes away the freedom of the will; renders man unaccountable to his Maker; makes sin to be no evil, and morality or virtue to be no good; and that it precludes the use of means, and is of the most gloomy tendency. The necessitarians, on the other hand, deny these to be legitimate consequences of their doctrine, which they declare to be the most consistent mode of explaining the Divine government; and they observe, that the Deity acts no more immorally in decreeing vicious actions, than in permitting all those irregularities which he could so easily have prevented. All necessity, say they, doth not take away freedom. The actions of a man may be at one and the same time both free and necessary. Thus, it was infallibly certain that Judas would betray Christ, yet he did it voluntarily: Jesus Christ necessarily became man, and died, yet he acted freely. A good man doth naturally and necessarily love his children, yet voluntarily. They insist that necessity doth not render actions less morally good; for if necessary virtue be neither moral nor praiseworthy, it will follow that God himself is not a moral being, because he is a necessary one; and the obedience of Christ cannot be good, because it was necessary. Further, say they, necessity does not preclude the use of means; for means are no less appointed than the end. It was ordained that Christ should be delivered up to death; but he could not have been betrayed without a betrayer, nor crucified without crucifiers. That it is not a gloomy doctrine they allege, because nothing can be more consolatory than to believe that all things are under the direction of an all-wise Being, that his kingdom ruleth over all, and that he doeth all things well. They also urge, that to deny necessity is to deny the foreknowledge of God, and to wrest the sceptre from the hand of the Creator, and to place that capricious and undefinable principle, the self-determining power of man, upon the throne of the universe. In these statements there is obviously a confused use of terms in different meanings, so as to mislead the unwary. For instance: necessity is confounded with certainty; but an action may be certain, though free; that is to say, certain to an omniscient Being, who knows how a free agent will finally resolve; but this certainty is, in fact, a quality of the prescient Being, not that of the action, to which, however, men delusively transfer it. Again: God is called a necessary Being, which, if it mean any thing, signifies, as to his moral acts, that he can only act right. But then this is a wrong application of the term necessity, which properly implies such a constraint upon actions, exercised ab extra, as renders choice or will impossible. But such necessity cannot exist as to the Supreme Being. Again: the obedience of Christ unto death was necessary; that is to say, unless he had died, guilty man could not have been forgiven; but this could not make the act of the Jews who put him to death a necessary act, that is to say, a forced and constrained one; nor did this necessity affect the act of Christ himself, who acted voluntarily, and might have left man without salvation. That the Jews acted freely, is evident from their being held liable to punishment, although unconsciously they accomplished the great designs of Heaven, which, however, was no excuse for their crime. Finally: as to the allegation that the doctrine of free agency puts man's self-determining power upon the throne of the universe, that view proceeds upon notions unworthy of God, as though he could not accomplish his plans without compelling and controlling all things by a fixed fate; whereas it is both more glorious to him, and certainly more in accordance with the Scriptures, to say that he has a perfect foresight of the manner in which all creatures will act, and that he, by a profound and infinite wisdom, subordinates every thing without violence to the evolution and accomplishment of his own glorious purposes.

The doctrine of necessity is nearly connected with that of predestination, which, of late years, has assumed a form very different from that which it formerly possessed; for, instead of being considered as a point to be determined almost entirely by the sacred writings, it has, in the hands of a number of able writers, in a great measure resolved itself into a question of natural religion, under the head of the philosophical liberty or necessity of the will; or, whether all human actions are, or are not, necessarily determined by motives arising from the character which God has impressed on our minds, and the train of circumstances amidst which his providence has placed us. The Calvinistic doctrine of predestination is, that "God, for his own glory, hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass." The scheme of philosophical necessity, as stated by the most celebrated necessitarian of the age, is, "that every thing is predetermined by the Divine Being; that whatever has been, must have been; and that whatever will be, must be; that all events are preordained by infinite wisdom and unlimited goodness; that the will, in all its determinations, is governed by the state of mind; that the state of mind is, in every instance, determined by the Deity; and that there is a continued chain of causes and effects, of motives and actions, inseparably connected, and originating from the condition in which we are brought into existence by the author of our being." On the other hand, it is justly remarked, that "those who believe the being and perfections of God, and a state of retribution, in which he will reward and punish mankind according to the diversity of their actions, will find it difficult to reconcile the justice of punishment with the necessity of crimes punished. And they that believe all that the Scripture says, on the one hand, of the eternity of future punishments, and, on the other, of God's compassion to sinners, and his solemn assurance that he desires not their death, will find the difficulty greatly increased." It is doubtless an article of the Christian faith, that God will reward or punish every man hereafter according to his actions in this life. But we cannot maintain his justice in this particular, if men's actions be necessary either in their own nature, or by the Divine decrees. Activity and self-determining powers are the foundation of all morality; and to prove that such powers belong to man, it is urged that we ourselves are conscious of possessing them. We blame and condemn ourselves when we do amiss; but guilt, and inward sense of shame, and remorse of conscience, are feelings which are inconsistent with the scheme of necessity. It is also agreed that some actions deserve praise, and afford an inward satisfaction; but for this, there would be no foundation, if we were invincibly determined in every volition: so that approbation and blame are consequent on free actions only. Nor is the matter at all relieved by bringing in a chain of circumstances as motives necessarily to determine the will. This comes to the same result, in sound argument, as though there were an immediate coaction of omnipotent power compelling one kind of volitions only; which is utterly irreconcilable to all just notions of the nature and operations of will, and to all accountability. Necessity, in the sense of irresistible control, and the doctrine of Scripture, cannot coëxist.

[NECHO, PHARAOH-NECHOH. Son and successor of Psammitichus, King of Egypt. Being checked by Josiah on his march toward the Euphrates, he slew that monarch at Megiddo; and after capturing Carchemish, he took Jerusalem, exiled Jehoahaz, and made Eliakim king. He was, however, afterward conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, and his Asiatic possessions were annexed to the Babylonian empire. 2 Kings xliii. 29-35: 2 Chron. xxxv., xxxvi.: Jer. xli. Herodotus speaks of Neco, the son of Psammitichus, King of Egypt. He says that he commenced making a canal across the isthmus of Suez, but desisted from the undertaking after one hundred and twenty thousand Egyptians had perished in digging it, an oracle having told him "that he was working for a barbarian." "He then," says Herodotus, "turned his attention to military affairs, and having come to an engagement with the Syrians on land at Magdolus, conquered them, and after the battle took Cadytis, which is a large city in Syria." (Euterpe, 158, 159.) This seems to refer to the war with Josiah, Cadytis being supposed to mean Jerusalem.]

NECROMANCY, νεκρομαντεία, is the art of raising up the ghosts of deceased persons, to get information from them concerning future events. This practice, no doubt, the Israelites brought with them from Egypt, which affected to be the mother of such occult sciences; and from thence it spread into the neighboring countries, and soon infected all the east. The injunction of the law is very express against this vice; and the punishment to be inflicted on the practitioners of it was stoning to death. Lev. xx. 27. What forms of enchantment were used in the practice of necromancy we are at a loss to know, because we read of none that the pythoiness of Endor employed; however, that there were several rites, spells, and invocations used upon these occasions, we may learn from almost every ancient author, but from none more particularly than from Lucan, in his Pharsalia. Whether the art of conversing with the dead was mere imposture, or grounded upon diabolical agency, is a question which has been disputed in all ages. [A species of necromancy, called Rochester knockings, from Rochester, N. Y., where it originated, and spirit-rappings, from the raps by which departed spirits are said to give their responses, has recently prevailed extensively in the United States, and produced no small amount of fanaticism and infidelity.]

[NEGINOTH. This word, found in the titles of Psalms iv., vi., liv., lxvii., seems to mean stringed instruments, as the root nagan means to strike the chord. Neginath, in the title of Psalm lxi., is rendered music and song in Lam. v. 14: Psalm xix. 12: lxxvii. 6.]

NEHEMIAH professes himself the author of the book which bears his name, in the very beginning of it, and he uniformly writes in the first person. He was of the tribe of Judah, and was probably born at Babylon during the captivity. He was so distinguished for his family and attainments as to be selected for the office of cup-bearer to the King of Persia, a situation of great honor and emolument. He was made governor of Judea, upon his own application, by Artaxerxes Longimanus; and his book, which in the Hebrew canon was joined to that of Ezra, gives an account of his appointment and administration through a space of about thirty-six years to A. M. 3595, at which time the Scripture history closes; and, consequently, the historical books, from Joshua to Nehemiah inclusive, contain the history of the Jewish people from the death of Moses, A. M. 2553, to the reformation established by Nehemiah, after the return from captivity, being a period of one thousand and forty-two years.

[NEHILOTH. Parkhurst suggests that this word, in the title of Psalm v., comes from chalah, to perforate, and means flutes or pipes. Compare Isaiah v. 12. The LXX., Vulgate, and others, derive it from nachal, to possess: "concerning her who obtains the inheritance"—that is, the Church.]

[NEHUSHTA. Jehoiachin's mother. 2 Kings xxiv. 8.]

[NEHUSHTAN. The name given by Hezekiah to the brazen serpent which Moses had set up in the wilderness. 2 Kings xviii. 4. Some render it a piece of brass: so the Geneva Bible: "Thus he called the brazen serpent by contempt: when it was abused to idolatry this good king destroyed it, not thinking it worthy to be called a serpent, but a piece of brass." Others, including Jarchi and Parkhurst, say the word means brazen serpent: "He called it Nehushtan, a brazen serpent, and treated it accordingly." Nachash means both serpent and brass, i. e., copper, and tan means a serpent, dragon, or monster. Simon and Dathe approve of this etymology—a brazen monster.]

NEOLOGY. This term, which signifies new doctrine, has been used to designate a species of theology and biblical criticism which has of late years much prevailed among the Protestant divines of Germany, and the professors of their universities. It is now, however, more frequently termed rationalism, and is supposed to occupy a sort of middle place between the orthodox system and pure deism. The German divines themselves speak of naturalism, rationalism, and supernaturalism. The term naturalism arose first in the sixteenth century, and was spread in the seventeenth. It was understood to be the system of those who allowed no other knowledge of religion than the natural, which man could shape out by his own strength, and, consequently, excluded all supernatural revelation. As to the different forms of naturalism, theologians say there are three: the first, which they call Pelagianism, and which considers human dispositions and notions as perfectly pure, and the religious knowledge derived from them as sufficiently explicit. A grosser kind denies all particular revelation; and the grossest of all considers the world as God. Rationalism has been thus explained: "Those who are generally termed rationalists," says Dr. Bretschneider, "admit universally in Christianity, a Divine, benevolent, and positive appointment for the good of mankind, and Jesus as a messenger of Divine Providence, believing that the true and everlasting word of God is contained in the Holy Scripture, and that by the same the welfare of mankind will be obtained and extended. But they deny therein a supernatural and miraculous working of God, and consider the object of Christianity to be that of introducing into the world such a religion as reason can comprehend; and they distinguish the essential from the unessential, and what is local and temporary from that which is universal and permanent in Christianity." There is, however, a third class of divines who in fact differ very little from this, though very widely in profession. They affect to allow a revealing operation of God, but establish on internal proofs rather than on miracles

the divine nature of Christianity. They allow that revelation may contain much out of the power of reason to explain, but say that it should assert nothing contrary to reason, but rather what may be proved by it. Supernaturalism consists in general in the conviction that God has revealed himself supernaturally and immediately. The notion of a miracle cannot well be separated from such a revelation, whether it happens out of, on, or in men. What is revealed may belong to the order of nature, but an order higher and unknown to us, which we could never have known without miracles, and cannot bring under the laws of nature.

The difference between the naturalists and the rationalists, as Mr. Rose justly remarks, is not quite so wide either as it would appear to be at first sight, or as one of them assuredly wishes it to appear. For if I receive a system, be it of religion, of morals, or of politics, only so far as it approves itself to my reason, whatever be the authority that presents it to me, it is idle to say that I receive the system out of any respect to that authority. I receive it only because my reason approves it; and I should, of course, do so if an authority of far inferior value were to present the system to me. This is what that division of rationalists which professes to receive Christianity, and at the same time to make reason the supreme arbiter in matters of faith, has done. Their system, in a word, is this: they assume certain general principles, which they maintain to be the necessary deductions of reason from an extended and unprejudiced contemplation of the natural and moral order of things, and to be in themselves immutable and universal. Consequently, any thing which, on however good authority, may be advanced in apparent opposition to them, must either be rejected as unworthy of rational belief, or, at least, explained away till it is made to accord with the assumed principles; and the truth or falsehood of all doctrines proposed is to be decided according to their agreement or disagreement with those principles.

It is easy, then, to anticipate how, with such principles, the biblical critics of Germany, distinguished as many of them have been for learning, would proceed to interpret the Scriptures. Many of the sacred books and parts of others have, of course, been rejected by them as spurious, the strongest external evidence being thought by them insufficient to prove the truth of what was determined to be contradictory to their reason; and the inspiration of the rest was understood in no higher a sense, to use the language of one of their professors, than the expressions of Cicero as to the inspiration of the poets, or those of Quintilian respecting Plato. It would be disgusting, says Rose, to go through all the strange fancies which were set afloat, and which tended only to set Scripture on the same footing as an ingenious but improbable romance. They all proceeded from the determination that whatever was not intelligible was incredible, that only what was of familiar and easy explanation deserved belief, and that all which was miraculous and mysterious in Scripture must be rejected; and they rested perpetually on notions and reasonings which were in themselves miracles of incredibility. But there are many of the German divines of this rationalist period who went much farther, and who imputed a deception to our Lord and his disciples, not for evil but for good purposes. In reading or in hearing of these wretched productions, the mind is divided between disgust at folly, and indignation at wickedness. What can be said for the heart which could suppose that the founders of Christianity could have taught the sublime and holy doctrines of the gospel with a lie in their hearts and on their lips? or for the intellect which could believe that ambitious and designing men would encounter years of poverty, and shame, and danger, with no prospect but that of an ignominious death? But where the supernatural and miraculous accounts were not rejected, they were, by many of the most eminent of these writers, explained away by a monstrous ingenuity, which, on any other subject, and applied to any ancient classic or other writer, would provoke the most contemptuous ridicule. When Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were swallowed up, Moses had previously "secretly undermined the earth." Jacob wrestled with the angel "in a dream;" and a rheumatic pain in his thigh during sleep suggested the incident in his dream of the angel touching the sinew of his thigh. Professor Paulus gravely explains the miracle of the tribute-money thus: that Christ only meant to give a moral lesson, that is, that we are not, if we can avoid it by trifling sacrifices, to give offence to our brethren; that he probably reasoned thus with St. Peter: "Though there is no real occasion for us to pay the tribute, yet, as we may be reckoned as enemies of the temple, and not attended to when we wish to teach what is good, why should not you, who are a fisherman"—a remark which might very properly be made at a place where St. Peter had been engaged in a fishery for two years—"and can easily do it, go and get enough to pay the demand? Go, then, to the sea, cast your hook, and take up πρῶτον ἰχθύν, the first and best fish." St. Peter was not to stay longer at his work this time than to gain the required money: πρῶτος often refers not to number but to time; and ἰχθύν may undoubtedly be taken as a collective. St. Peter must either have caught so many fish as would be reckoned worth a stater at Capernaum, (so near to a sea rich in fish,) or one so large and fine as would have been valued at that sum. As it was uncertain whether one or more would be necessary, the expression is indefinite, τὸν ἀναβάνα πρῶτον ἰχθύν; [the fish first coming up;] but it would not be ambiguous to St. Peter, as the necessity and the event would give it a fixed meaning. Ἀνοίξας τὸ στόμα, [opening the mouth.] This opening of the mouth might have different objects, which must be fixed by the context. If the fisherman opens the mouth of a fish caught with a hook, he does it first to release him from the hook; for if he hangs long he is less salable: he soon decays. The circumstantiality in the account is pittoresque. "Take the hook out of his mouth!" ἐκτίσσει, εὐρίσκει is used in Greek in a more extended sense than the German finden, as in Xenophon, where it is "to get by selling." When such a word is used of salable articles, like fish, and in a connection which requires the getting a piece of money, it is clear that getting by sale and not by finding is referred to. "And this from a professor's chair!" In like manner, the miracle of feeding the five thousand in the desert is resolved into the opportune passing by of a caravan with provisions, of which the hungry multitude were allowed to partake, according to eastern hospitality; and the apostles were merely employed in conveying it out in baskets. Christ's walking upon the sea is explained by his walking upon the sea-shore, and St. Peter's walking on the sea is resolved into swimming. The miracles of healing were the effect of fancy operating favorably upon the disorders; and Ananias and Sapphira died of a fright; with many other absurdities, half dreams and half blasphemies; and of which the above are given but as a specimen.

The first step in this sorrowful gradation down to a depth of falsehood and blasphemy, into which certainly no body of Christian ministers, so large, so learned, and influential, in any age or period of the Church ever before fell, was, contempt for the authority of the divines of the Reformation and of the subsequent age. They were about to set out on a voyage of discovery; and it was necessary to assume that truth still inhabited some terra incognita, [unknown region,] to which neither Luther, Melancthon, nor their early disciples, had ever found access. One of this school is pleased, indeed, to denominate the whole even of the seventeenth and the first half of the eighteenth century, the age of theological barbarism; an age, notwithstanding, which produced in the Lutheran Church alone Calovius, Schmidt, Hackspan, Walther, Glass, and the Carpzoffs, and others, as many and as great writers as any Church can boast in an equal space of time; writers whose works are, or ought to be, in the hands of the theological student. The general statements of the innovators amount to this, that the divines of the age of which we speak had neither the inclination nor the power to do any thing but fortify their own systems, which were dogmatical, and not to search out truth for themselves from Scripture; that theology, as a science, was left from the epoch of the Reformation as it had been received from the schoolmen; that the interpretation of the Bible was made the slave, not the mistress, of dogmatical theology, as it ought to be.

The vain conceit that the doctrines of religion were capable of philosophic demonstration, which obtained among the followers of Wolf, is considered by Mr. Rose as having hastened onward the progress of error. We find some of them not content with applying demonstration to the truth of the system, but endeavoring to establish each separate dogma, the Trinity, the nature of the Redeemer, the incarnation, the eternity of punishment, on philosophical, and, strange as it may appear, some of these truths on mathematical, grounds. We have had instances of this in our own country; and the reason why they have done little injury is, that none of those who thus presumed, whether learned or half learned, had success enough to form a school. So far as such a theory does obtain influence, it must necessarily be mischievous. The first authors may hold the mysteries of Christianity sacred; they may fancy that they can render faith in them more easy by affecting demonstrative evidence, which, indeed, were the subjects capable of it, would render faith unnecessary; but they are equally guilty of a vain presumption in their own powers, and of a want of real reverence to God, and to his revelation. With them, this boast of demonstration generally ends in the rejection of some truth, or the adoption of some positive error; while their followers fail not to bound over the limits at which they have stopped. The fallacy of the whole lies in assuming that Divine things are on the same level with those which the human mind can grasp, and may therefore be compared with them. One of these consequences must therefore follow: either that the mind is exalted above its own sphere, or that Divine things are brought down below theirs. In the former case, a dogmatical pride is the result; in the latter, the scheme of revelation is stripped of its divinity, and sinks gradually into a system of human philosophy, with the empty name of a revelation still appended to it to save appearances. What can bear the test of the philosophical standard is retained, and what cannot be thus proved is, by degrees, rejected; so that the Scripture is no longer the ground of religious truth, but a sort of witness to be compelled to assent to any conclusions at which this philosophy may arrive.

The effect in Germany was speedily developed, though Wolf, the founder of this school, and most of his followers, were pious and faithful Christians. By carrying demonstrative evidence beyond its own province, they had nurtured in their followers a vain confidence in human reason; and the next and still more fatal step was, that it was the province of human reason in an enlightened and intellectual age to perfect Christianity, which, it was contended, had hitherto existed in a low and degraded state, and to perfect that system of which the elements only were contained in the Scripture. All restraint was broken by this principle. Philosophy, good and bad, was left to build up these "elements" according to its own views; and as, after all, many of these elements were found to be too untractable and too rudely shaped to accord with the plans of these manifold constructions, formed according to every "pattern," except that "in the mount;" when the stone could not be squared and framed by any art which these builders possessed, it was "rejected," even to the "head stone of the corner." Semler appears to have been the author of that famous theory of accommodation, which, in the hands of his followers, says Mr. Rose, became "the most formidable weapon ever devised for the destruction of Christianity." As far as Germany is concerned, this language is not too strong; and we may add, that it was the most impudent theory ever advocated by men professing still to be Christians, and one, the avowal of which can scarcely be accounted for, except on the ground that as, because of their interests, it was not convenient for these teachers of theology and ministers of the German churches to disavow Christianity altogether, it was devised and maintained in order to connect the profits of the Christian profession with substantial and almost undisguised deism. This theory was, that we are not to take all the declarations of Scripture as addressed to us, but to consider them as, in many points, purposely adapted to the feelings and dispositions of the age when they originated, but by no means to be received by another and more enlightened period; that, in fact, Jesus himself and his apostles had accommodated themselves in their doctrines to the barbarism, ignorance, and prejudices of the Jews; and that it was, therefore, our duty to reject the whole of this temporary part of Christianity, and retain only what is substantial and eternal. In plain words, they assumed, as the very basis of their scriptural interpretations, the blasphemous principle, that our Lord and his apostles taught or at least connived at doctrines absolutely false, rather than they would consent to shock the prejudices of their hearers! This principle is shown at length by Mr. Rose to run through the whole maze of error into which this body of Protestant divines themselves wandered and led their flocks. Thus the chairs of theology, and the very pulpits, were turned into "the seats of the scornful;" and where doctrines were at all preached, they were too frequently of this daring and infidel character. It became even, at least, a negative good, that the sermons delivered were often discourses on the best modes of cultivating corn and wine, and the preachers employed the Sabbath and the church in instructing their flocks how to choose the best kinds of potatoes, or to enforce upon them the benefits of vaccination. Undisguised infidelity has in no country treated the grand evidences of the truth of Christianity with greater contumely, or been more offensive in its attacks upon the prophets, or more ridiculous in its attempts to account, on natural principles, for the miracles. Extremes of every kind were produced, philosophic mysticism, pantheism, and atheism.

We have hitherto referred chiefly to Mr. Rose's work on this awful declension in the Lutheran and other continental Churches. In a work on the same subject by Mr. Pusey, the stages of the apostasy are more carefully marked, and more copiously and deeply investigated. Our limits will, however, but allow us to advert to two or three points. In Mr. Pusey's account of the state of German theology in the seventeenth century, he opens to us the sources of the evil. Francke, he observes, assigns as a reason for attaching the more value to the opportunities provided at Halle for the study of Scripture, that "in former times, and in those which are scarcely past, one generally found at universities opportunities for every thing rather than a solid study of God's word." "In all my university years," says Knapp, "I was not happy enough to hear a lecture upon the whole of Scripture: we should have regarded it as a great blessing which came down from heaven." It is said to be one only of many instances, that at Leipzig, Carpzoff, having in his lectures for one half year completed the first chapter of Isaiah, did not again lecture on the Bible for twenty years; while Olearius suspended his for ten. Yet Olearius, as well as Allerti, Spener says, "were diligent theologians, but that most pains were employed on doctrinal theology and controversy." It is, moreover, a painful speaking fact, which is mentioned by Francke, (1709,) that in Leipzig, the great mart of literature as well as of trade, "twenty years ago, in no bookseller's shop was either Bible or Testament to be found." Of the passages in Francke which prove the same state of things, I will select one or two only: "Youth are sent to the universities with a moderate knowledge of Latin; but of Greek, and especially of Hebrew, next to none. And it would even then have been well, if what had been neglected before had been made up in the universities. There, however, most are borne, as by a torrent, with the multitude: they flock to logical, metaphysical, ethical, polemical, physical, pneumatical lectures, and what not; treating least of all those things whose benefit is most permanent in their future office, especially deferring, and at last neglecting, the study of the sacred languages." "To this is added, that they comfort themselves that in examinations for orders, these things are not generally much attended to. Hence, most who are anxious about a maintenance, hurry to those things which may hasten their promotion, attend above all things a lecture on the art of preaching, and, if they can remain so long at the university, one on doctrinal theology, (would that all were anxious about a salutary knowledge of the sacred doctrines!) and having committed these things to paper and memory, return home as if excellently armed against Satan, are examined, preach, are promoted, provide for their families." And having spoken further on the superficial knowledge, pedantry, and other faults of those few who acquired knowledge of these subjects, he sums up: "As the vernacular Scriptures are ordinarily neglected or ill employed by the illiterate, so are the original by the lettered: whence there cannot but arise either ignorance in matters of faith, or an unfruitful and vain knowledge; a pleasurable fancy is substituted for the substance of the faith; impiety daily increases. In a word, from the neglect of Scripture all impiety is derived; and so, again, from the impiety or unbelief of men there is derived a contempt of Scripture, or at all events an abuse and an absurd and perverted employment of it; and hence follows either a neglect of the original languages, or a senseless method, or an unfitting employment of them; which evils, since they are continued from the teachers to the disciples, the corrupted state of the schools and universities continually increases; and these we cannot remedy, unless we can prevail upon ourselves to make the word of God our first object, to look for Christ in it, and to embrace him, when found, with genuine faith, and perseveringly to follow him." Pfaff thus describes the previous state of doctrinal theology: "All the compendia of holy doctrines which have hitherto appeared are of such a character, that though their excellence has been hitherto extolled by the common praise of our countrymen, and they still enjoy considerable reputation, (sua utique luce nitent), they can even on this ground not be satisfactory to our age; that since one system was extracted and worked out of the other, with a very few variations, they dwell uniformly on the same string; and that metaphysical clang of causes, which sounds somewhat harshly and unpleasantly to well-cultivated ears, constantly reverberates in them, the same terms uniformly recurring in all. To this is added, that a certain coldness appears to prevail in the common mode of treating these subjects, especially in the practical topics of theology; these being set forth as theoretical propositions, so that scarcely any life or any religious influence finds its way into the minds of readers; and the edification of mind (though it should be the principal object in sacred theology) derived from them is very slight. Nor does it appear less a subject of blame, that various theological ρόται, and those the very chief, are here altogether omitted; that every thing is choked with the thorns of scholasticism; and that Divine truths are often made secondary to the zeal for authority; nor is there sufficient reference to the language of the symbolical books, to the promotion of the peace of the Church, to the exhibition of what is of real importance in controverted points, and of the unreality of the mere logomachies with which all theology abounds; nor, again, to destroy theological pedantry and a sectarian spirit, or to treat the subjects themselves in a style becoming to them; but most of all, sufficient pains are not bestowed upon that which is of chief importance, the building up the kingdom of God in the hearts of men, and the influencing their hearts more thoroughly with vivid conceptions of true Christianity."

Yet these were but effects of a still higher cause—the rapid decay of piety in this century, of which the statements of Mr. Pusey, and the authorities he quotes, present a melancholy picture. Speaking of J. V. Andrea, he says, the want of practical religious instruction in the early schools, the perverted state of all education, the extravagance and dissoluteness of the universities, the total unfitness of the teachers whom they sent forth and authorized, the degraded state of general as well as of theological science, the interested motives for entering into holy orders, the canvassing for benefices, the simony in obtaining them, the especial neglect of the poorer, the bad lives, the carelessness and bitter controversies of the preachers, and the general corruption of manners in all ranks, are again and again the subjects of his deep regrets or of his censure. "After the evangelic Church," he says, in an energetic comparison of the evils which reigned in the beginning of this period with those which had occasioned the yoke of Rome to be broken, "after the evangelic Church had thrown off the yoke of human inventions, they should have bowed their neck under the easy yoke of the Lord. But now one set of human inventions are but exchanged for another, equally, or indeed very little, human; and these are called the word of God, though in reality things are nothing milder than before. Idols were cast out, but the idols of sins are worshipped. The primacy of the pope is denied, but we constitute lesser popes. The bishops are abrogated, but ministers are still introduced or cast out at will. Simony came into ill repute, but who now rejects a hand laden with gold? The monks were reproached for indolence, as if there were too much study at our universities. The monasteries were dissolved—to stand empty, or to be stalls for cattle. The regularly recurring prayers are abolished, yet so that now most pray not at all. The public fasts were laid aside: now the command of Christ is held to be but useless words, not to say any thing of blasphemers, adulterers, extortioners," etc. After many testimonies of a similar and even stronger kind from other pious divines, who lifted up their voice strongly, but almost ineffectually, against the growing corruption of the universities, the clergy and the people, Mr. Pusey adds the following passages from Francke: "The works of the flesh are done openly and unrestrainedly, with so little shame, that one who does not approve of many things not consistent with the truth which is in Jesus, would almost be enrolled among heretics. Ambition, pride, love of pleasure, luxury, impurity, wantonness, and all the crop of foulest wickednesses which spring from these; injustice also, avarice, and a species of rivalry among all vices, everywhere sensibly increases, atheism joining itself with epicurism and libertinism. Thus, while Christ is held to, while orthodoxy is presented as a shield, all imitation of Christ, all anxiety for true and spiritual holiness, 'without which no one shall see the Lord,' nay, all the decorum befitting a Christian, is banished, is exterminated, that it may not disturb the societies of perverse men." Into the state of the clergy he enters more fully in another work. "I remember," he says, "that a theologian of no common learning, piety, and practical knowledge, νῦν ἐν Ἀγίοις, told me that a certain monarch, at his suggestion, applied to a university, where there was a large concourse of students of theology, for two candidates for holy orders, who by the excellence and purity of their doctrine, and by holiness of life, might serve as an example to the congregation committed to their charge: the professors candidly answered that there was no such student of theology among them. Nor is this surprising. I remember that Kortholt used to say with pain, that in the disgraceful strifes, disturbances, and tumults in the universities, which were, alas, but too frequent, it scarcely ever happened that theological students were not found to be accomplices, nay, the chiefs. I remember that another theologian often lamented that there was such a dearth in the Church of such persons as the apostle would alone think worthy of the ministerial functions; that it was to be regarded as a happiness if, of many applicants, some one of outwardly decent life could at length be found."

With several happy exceptions, and the raising up of a few pious people in some places, and a partial revival of evangelical doctrines—which, however, often ran at length into mysticism and antinomianism—the evil, both doctrinally and morally, continued to increase to our own day; for if any ask what has been the moral effect of the appalling apostasy of the teachers of religion, above described, upon the people of Germany, the answer may be given from one of these rationalizing divines themselves, whose statement is not therefore likely to be too highly colored. It is from a pamphlet of Bretschneider, published in 1822, and the substance is, "Indifference to religion among all classes; that formerly the Bible used to be in every house, but now the people either do not possess it, or, as formerly, read it; that few attend the churches, which are now too large, though fifty years ago they were too small; that few honor the Sabbath; that there are now few students of theology, compared with those in law and medicine; that if things go on, there will shortly not be persons to supply the various ecclesiastical offices; that preaching had fallen into contempt; and that distrust and suspicion of the doctrines of Christianity prevailed among all classes." Melancholy as this picture is, nothing in it can surprise any one, except that the very persons who have created the evil, should themselves be astonished at its existence, or even affect to be so. But the mercy of God has begun to answer the prayers of the few faithful who are left as the gleanings of grapes after the vintage; and to revive, in some active, learned, and influential men, the spirit of primitive faith and zeal. The effect of the exertions of these excellent men, both from the professor's chair, the pulpit, and the press, has been considerable; and it is remarked by Mr. Rose, that no small degree of disgust at the past follies of the rationalists prevails; that the cold and comfortless nature of their system has been perceived; that a party of truly Christian views has arisen; and that there is a disposition alike in the people, the better part of the divines, and the philosophers, to return to that revealed religion which alone can give them comfort and peace. It is equally clear that some at least of the governments perceive the dangerous tendency of the rationalist opinions, and that they are sincerely desirous of promoting a better state of religious feeling.

We close this article with the excellent remarks of Dr. Tittman, of Dresden, on the theological interpreters: "What is the interpretation of the Scriptures, if it relies not on words, but things; not on the assistance of languages, but on the decrees of reason, that is, of modern philosophy? What is all religion, what the knowledge of Divine things, what are faith and hope placed in Christ, what is all Christianity, if human reason and philosophy is the only fountain of Divine wisdom, and the supreme judge in the matter of religion? What is the doctrine of Christ and the apostles more than some philosophical system? But what, then, I pray you, is, to deny, to blaspheme Jesus the Lord; to render his Divine mission doubtful, nay, vain and useless; to impugn his doctrine, to disfigure it shamefully, to attack it, to expose it to ridicule, and, if possible, to suppress it; to remove all Christianity out of religion, and to bound religion within the narrow limits of reason alone; to deride miracles, and hold them up to derision, to accuse them as vain, to bring them into disrepute; to torture Sacred Scripture into seeming agreement with the fancies of human wisdom, to alloy it with human conjectures, to bring it into contempt, and to break down its Divine authority; to undermine, to shake, to overthrow utterly the foundations of Christian faith? What else can be the event than this—as all history, a most weighty witness in this matter, informs us—namely, that when Sacred Scripture, its grammatical interpretation, and a sound knowledge of languages, are, as it were, despised and banished, all religion should be contemned, shaken, corrupted, troubled, undermined, utterly overturned, and should be entirely removed and reduced to natural religion; or that it should end in a mystical theology, than which nothing was ever more pernicious to the Christian doctrine, and be converted into an empty μυθολογία, or even into a poetical system, hiding every thing in figures and fictions, to which latter system not a few of the sacred orators and theologians of our time seem chiefly inclined.”

NEOMENIA, νεομηνία, new moon, Col. ii. 16; a Greek word, signifying the first day of the moon or month. The Hebrews had a particular veneration for the first day of every month; and Moses appointed peculiar sacrifices for the day, Num. xxviii. 11, 12; but he gave no orders that it should be kept as a holy day, nor can it be proved that the ancients observed it so: it was a festival of merely voluntary devotion. It appears that even from the time of Saul they made, on this day, a sort of family entertainment, since David ought then to have been at the king's table; and Saul took his absence amiss. 1 Sam. xx. 5, 18. Moses insinuates that, besides the national sacrifices then regularly offered, every private person had his particular sacrifices of devotion. Num. x. 10. The beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, at the offering of the solemn sacrifices. But the most celebrated neomenia was that at the beginning of the civil year, or first day of the month Tizri. Lev. xxiii. 24. This was a sacred day, on which no servile labor was performed; on this they offered public or national burnt-sacrifices, and sounded the trumpets in the temple. In the kingdom of the ten tribes, the serious among the people used to assemble at the houses of the prophets, to hear their instructions. The Shunammite, who entertained Elisha, proposing to visit that prophet, her husband said to her, “Why do you go to-day, since it is neither Sabbath nor new moon?” 2 Kings iv. 23. Isaiah declares that the Lord abhors the new moons, the Sabbaths, and other days of festival and assembly of those Jews who in other things neglected his laws. Isa. i. 13, 14. Ezekiel says that the burnt-offerings offered on the day of the new moon were provided at the king's expense, and that on this day was to be opened the eastern gate of the court of the priests. Ezek. xlv. 17; xlv. 1, 2: 1 Chron. xxiii. 31: 2 Chron. viii. 13. Judith kept no fast on festival days, or on the new moon. Judith viii. 6. The modern Jews keep the neomenia only as a feast of devotion, to be observed or not, at pleasure. They think it rather belongs to the women than to the men. The women forbear work, and indulge a little more on this day than on others. In the prayers of the synagogue, they read from Psalm cxiii. to cxviii. They bring forth the roll of the law, and read therein to four persons. They call to remembrance the sacrifice that on this day used to be offered in the temple. On the evening of the Sabbath which follows the new moon, or some other evening following, when the new moon first appears, they assemble and pray to God, as the Creator of the planets, and the restorer of the new moon: raising themselves toward heaven, they entreat of God to be preserved from misfortune; then, after mentioning David, they salute each other and separate. See MOON, [and NEW MOON.]

NEONOMIANISM, so called from the Greek νόμος, new, and νόμος, law. This is not the appellation of a separate sect, but of those both among Arminians and Calvinists who regard Christianity as a new law, mitigated in its requisitions for the sake of Christ. This opinion has many modifications, and has been held by persons very greatly differing from each other in the consequences to which they carry it, and in the principles from which they deduce it. One opinion is, that the new covenant of grace which, through the medium of Christ's death, the Father made with men, consists, according to this system, not in our being justified by faith, as it apprehends the righteousness of Christ; but in this, that God, abrogating the exaction of perfect legal obedience, reputes or accepts of faith itself, and the imperfect obedience of faith, instead of the perfect obedience of the law, and graciously accounts them worthy of the reward of eternal life. Toward the close of the seventeenth century, a controversy was agitated among the English Dissenters, in which the one side, who were partial to the writings of Dr. Crisp, were charged with antinomianism, and the other, who favored those of Mr. Baxter, were accused of neonomianism. Dr. Daniel Williams was a principal writer on what was called the neonomian side.

The following objection, among others, was made by several ministers in 1692 against Dr. Williams's “Gospel Truth Stated,” etc: “To supply the room of the moral law, vacated by him, he turns the gospel into a new law, in keeping of which we shall be justified for the sake of Christ's righteousness, making qualifications and acts of ours a disposing subordinate righteousness, whereby we become capable of being justified by Christ's righteousness.” To this, among other things, he answers: “The difference is not, 1. Whether the gospel be a new law in the Socinian, Popish, or Arminian sense. This I deny. Nor, 2. Is faith, or any other grace or acts of ours, any atonement for sin, satisfaction to justice, meriting qualification, or any part of that righteousness for which we are justified at God our Creator's bar. This I deny in places innumerable. Nor, 3. Whether the gospel be a law more new than is implied in the first promise to fallen Adam, proposed to Cain, and obeyed by Abel, to the differencing him from his unbelieving brother. This I deny. 4. Nor whether the gospel be a law that allows sin, when it accepts such graces as true, though short of perfection, to be the conditions of our personal interest in the benefits purchased by Christ. This I deny. 5. Nor whether the gospel be a law, the promises whereof entitle the performers of its conditions to the benefits as of debt. This I deny. The difference is, 1. Is the gospel a law in this sense; namely, God in Christ thereby commandeth sinners to repent of sin, and receive Christ by a true operative faith, promising that thereupon they shall be united to him, justified by his righteousness, pardoned, and adopted; and that, persevering in faith and true holiness, they shall be finally saved; also threatening that if any shall die impenitent, unbelieving, ungodly, rejecters of his grace, they shall perish without relief, and endure sorer punishments than if these offers had not been made to them. 2. Hath the gospel a sanction, that is, doth Christ therein enforce his commands of faith, repentance, and perseverance, by the foresaid promises and threatenings, as motives to our obedience? Both these I affirm, and they deny; saying, the gospel in the largest sense is an absolute promise without precepts and conditions, and a gospel threat is a bull. 3. Do the gospel promises of benefits to certain graces, and its threats that those benefits shall be withheld, and the contrary evils inflicted, for the neglect of such graces, render these graces the condition of our personal title to those benefits? This they deny, and I affirm," etc.

It does not appear to have been a question in this controversy, whether God in his word commands sinners to repent, and believe in Christ, nor whether he promises life to believers, and threatens death to unbelievers; but whether it be the gospel under the form of a new law that thus commands or threatens, or the moral law on its behalf, and whether its promises to believing render such believing a condition of the things promised. In another controversy, however, which arose about forty years afterward among the same people, it became a question whether God did by his word, call it law or gospel, command unregenerate sinners to repent and believe in Christ, or do any thing else which is spiritually good. Of those who took the affirmative side of this question, one party maintained it on the ground of the gospel being a new law, consisting of commands, promises, and threatenings, the terms or conditions of which were repentance, faith, and sincere obedience. But those who first engaged in the controversy, though they allowed the encouragement to repent and believe to arise merely from the grace of the gospel, yet considered the formal obligation to do so as arising merely from the moral law, which, requiring supreme love to God, requires acquiescence in any revelation which he shall at any time make known.

[NERGAL. An idol of the men of Cuth. 2 Kings xvii. 30. Some identify it with Mars, the god of war: others think it represented the sun, deriving the word from nir, light, and gal, to revolve. The Rabbins say this idol was represented by a cock, which was sacred to the sun. Morinus thinks that the Cuthites were of Cutha, in Persia, where the sun was worshipped. But it does not appear that the Persians worshipped idols that they "made" themselves. Dr. Hyde thinks Cuth is the same as Cush, who first settled in Babylonia. Nergal is found in the name of Nerigillassar, King of Babylon, and in Nergal-sharezer, the name of two of, the King of Babylon's princes. Jer. xxxix. 3.]

NERO. The Emperor Nero is not named in Scripture; but he is indicated by his title of emperor, and by his surname Caesar. To him St. Paul appealed after his imprisonment by Felix, and his examination by Festus, who was swayed by the Jews. St. Paul was therefore carried to Rome, where he arrived A. D. 61. Here he continued two years, preaching the gospel with freedom, till he became famous even in the emperor's court, in which were many Christians; for he salutes the Philippians in the name of the brethren who were of the household of Caesar, that is, of Nero's court. Phil. i. 12, 13; iv. 22. We have no particular information how he cleared himself from the accusations of the Jews, whether by answering before Nero, or whether his enemies dropped their prosecutions, which seems probable. Acts xxviii. 21. However, it appears that he was liberated in the year 63. Nero is reckoned the first persecutor of the Christian Church: his persecution was A. D. 64. Nero, the most cruel and savage of all men, and also the most wicked and depraved, began his persecution against the Christian Church, A. D. 64, on pretence of the burning of Rome, of which some have thought himself to be the author. He endeavored to throw all the odium on the Christians: those were seized first that were known publicly as such, and by their means many others were discovered. They were condemned to death, and were even insulted in their sufferings. Some were sewed up in skins of beasts, and then exposed to dogs to be torn in pieces; some were nailed to crosses; others perished by fire. The latter were sewed up in pitched coverings, which, being set on fire, served as torches to the people, and were lighted up in the night. Nero gave leave to use his own gardens as the scene of all these cruelties. From this time edicts were published against the Christians, and many martyrs suffered, especially in Italy. St. Peter and St. Paul are thought to have suffered martyrdom, consequent on this persecution, A. D. 65. The revolt of the Jews from the Romans happened about A. D. 65 and 66, in the twelfth and thirteenth of Nero. The city of Jerusalem making an insurrection, A. D. 66, Florus there slew three thousand six hundred persons, and thus began the war. A little while afterward, those of Jerusalem killed the Roman garrison. Cestius on this came to Jerusalem to suppress the sedition; but he was forced to retire, after having besieged it about six weeks, and was routed in his retreat, A. D. 66. About the end of the same year, Nero gave Vespasian the command of his troops against the Jews. This general carried on the war in Galilee and Judea during A. D. 67 and 68, the thirteenth and fourteenth of Nero. But Nero killing himself in the fourteenth year of his reign, Jerusalem was not besieged till after his death, A. D. 70, the first and second of Vespasian.

NESTORIANS, a denomination which arose

in the fifth century, from Nestorius, Bishop of Constantinople; a man of considerable learning and eloquence, and of an independent spirit. The Catholic clergy were fond of calling the Virgin Mary "Mother of God," to which Nestorius objected, as implying that she was mother of the Divine nature, which he very properly denied; and this raised against him, from Cyril and others, the cry of heresy, and perhaps led him into some improper forms of expression and explication. It is generally agreed, however, by the moderns, that Nestorius showed a much better spirit in controversy than his antagonist, St. Cyril. As to the doctrine of the trinity, it does not appear that Nestorius differed from his antagonists, admitting the coequality of the Divine persons; but he was charged with maintaining two distinct persons, as well as natures, in the mysterious character of Christ. This, however, he solemnly and constantly denied; and from this, as a foul reproach, he has been cleared by the moderns, and particularly by Martin Luther, who lays the whole blame of this controversy on the turbulent and angry Cyril. (See HYPOSTATICAL UNION.) The discordancy not only between the Nestorians and other Christians, but also among themselves, arose, no doubt, in a great measure, from the ambiguity of the Greek terms hypostasis and prosopon. The councils assembled at Seleucia on this occasion decreed that in Christ there were two hypostases. But this word, unhappily, was used both for person and subsistence, or existence; hence the difficulty and ambiguity; and of these hypostases it is said the one was Divine, and the other human—the Divine Word and the man Jesus. Now, of these two hypostases it is added, they had only one barsopa, the original term used by Nestorius, and usually translated by the Greeks, "person;" but to avoid the appearance of an express contradiction, Dr. Mosheim translates this barbarous word "aspect," as meaning a union of will and affection, rather than of nature or of person. And thus the Nestorians are charged with rejecting the union of two natures in one person, from their peculiar manner of expressing themselves, though they absolutely denied the charge.

In the earliest ages of Nestorianism, the various branches of that numerous and powerful sect were under the spiritual jurisdiction of the Catholic patriarch of Babylon—a vague appellation which has been successively applied to the sees of Seleucia, Ctesiphon, and Bagdad—but who now resides at Mosul. In the sixteenth century the Nestorians were divided into two sects; for, in 1551, a warm dispute arose among them about the creation of a new patriarch, Simeon Barmamas, or Barmana, being proposed by one party, and Sulaka, otherwise named Siud, earnestly desired by the other; when the latter, to support his pretensions the more effectually, repaired to Rome, and was consecrated patriarch in 1553, by Pope Julius III., whose jurisdiction he had acknowledged, and to whose commands he had promised unlimited submission and obedience. Upon this new Chaldean patriarch's return to his own country, Julius sent with him several persons skilled in the Syriac language, to assist him in establishing and extending the papal empire among the Nestorians; and from that time, that unhappy people have been divided into two factions, and have often been involved in the greatest dangers and difficulties, by the jarring sentiments and perpetual quarrels of their patriarchs. In 1555, Simeon Denha, Archbishop of Gelu, adopted the party of the fugitive patriarch, who had embraced the communion of the Latin Church; and, being afterward chosen patriarch himself, he fixed his residence in the city of Van, or Ormia, in the mountainous parts of Persia, where his successors still continue, and are all distinguished by the name of Simeon; but they seem of late to have withdrawn themselves from their communion with the Church of Rome. The great Nestorian pontiffs, who form the opposite party, and who have, since 1559, been distinguished by the general denomination of Elias, and reside constantly at Mosul, look with a hostile eye on this little patriarch; but since 1617 the bishops of Ormus have been in so low and declining a state, both in opulence and credit, that they are no longer in a condition to excite the envy of their brethren at Mosul, whose spiritual dominion is very extensive, taking in great part of Asia, and comprehending within its circuit the Arabian Nestorians, as also the Christians of St. Thomas, who dwell along the coast of Malabar.

[Nestorius was driven from his see, and, flying from imperial persecution, found a grave in the Egyptian desert. Under Tamerlane the Nestorians were subjected to fearful oppressions and slaughter, the survivors of which retreated to the mountains of Assyria, where they have continued to maintain their independence. The Nestorians of the present day call themselves Chaldeans. Their form of government is episcopal, the chief authority, spiritual and temporal, being vested in a patriarch. He is chosen from one family, and receives the name of Simeon. He must not marry, or eat any thing but vegetables and milk. The bishops are monks: the priests marry. They conform for the most part to the Nicene Creed, but affirm "the divisibility and separation of the two persons as well as the two natures in Christ." They reject auricular confession, image-worship, and purgatory. They have three liturgies, and celebrate worship in the Syriac tongue. See Grant's "Nestorians."]

[NET. The Egyptian monuments abound in representations of fishing, fowling, and hunting with nets, for which purposes they were much used by the Hebrews. Prov. i. 17: Isaiah xix. 4-10; li. 20: Micah. vii. 2: Hab. i. 15-17. Matt. iv. 18.]

NETHINIMS. The Nethinims were servants who had been given up to the service of the tabernacle and temple, to perform the meanest and most laborious services therein, in supplying wood and water. At first the Gibeonites were appointed to this service. Joshua ix. 27. Afterward the Canaanites who surrendered themselves, and whose lives were spared, were consigned to the performance of the same duties. We read, Ezra viii. 20, that the Nethinims were slaves devoted by David and the other princes to the ministry of the temple; and elsewhere, that they were slaves given by Solomon—the children of Solomon's servants, Ezra ii. 58; and we see in 1 Kings ix. 20, 21, that this prince had subdued the remains of the Canaanites, and had constrained them to several servitudes; and, it is very probable, he gave a good number of them to the priests and Levites for the service of the temple. The Nethinims were carried into captivity with the tribe of Judah, and there were great numbers of them near the coast of the Caspian Sea, from whence Ezra brought some of them back. Ezra viii. 17. After the return from the captivity, they dwelt in the cities appointed them. Ezra ii. 17. There were some of them also at Jerusalem, who inhabited that part of the city called Ophel. Neh. iii. 26. Those who returned with Ezra were to the number of two hundred and twenty; Ezra viii. 20; and those who followed Zerubbabel made up three hundred and ninety-two. Ezra ii. 58. This number was but small in regard to the offices that were imposed on them; so that we find them afterward instituting a solemnity called Xylophoria, in which the people carried wood to the temple with great ceremony, to keep up the fire on the altar of burnt-sacrifices.

NETTLES. We find this name given to two different words in the original. The first is דוריס, Job xxx. 7: Prov. xxiv. 31: Zeph. ii. 9. It is not easy to determine what species of plant is here meant. From the passage in Job, the nettle could not be intended; for a plant is referred to large enough for people to take shelter under. The following extract from Denon's Travels may help to illustrate the text, and show to what an uncomfortable retreat those vagabonds must have resorted. "One of the inconveniences of the vegetable thickets of Egypt is, that it is difficult to remain in them, as nine-tenths of the trees and the plants are armed with inexorable thorns, which suffer only an unquiet enjoyment of the shadow which is so constantly desirable, from the precaution necessary to guard against them." The קרימש, Prov. xxiv. 31: Isaiah xxxiv. 13: Hosea ix. 6, is by the Vulgate rendered "urtica," which is well defended by Celsius, and very probably means "the nettle."

[NEW MOON.] The neomenia did not begin among the Jews at the precise point when the moon was in conjunction with the sun, but when it became visible after that conjunction. It is said they posted persons on elevated places, to get the earliest possible sight of the new moon, and to inform the sanhedrim that it was visible: the proclamation was then made, accompanied with the sound of trumpets, "The feast of the new moon! the feast of the new moon!" The Rabbins say the neomenia was continued two days, lest any should fail to observe the command, which directed that certain ceremonies should be observed at the beginning of each month. Num. x. 13; xxviii. 11–15: Isa. i. 13, 14. In later times, it is said, the House of Judgment determined the time of the festivals by a calendar kept in the temple. Although Moses gave no orders that it should be kept as a holy-day, like the Sabbath, yet it appears that it was observed in a religious manner. 2 Kings iv. 23. It was also a season of family entertainment. 1 Sam. xx. 5, 18. The national offerings on this day were prepared by the king. 1 Chron. xxiii. 31: 2 Chron. viii. 13: Ezek. xlv. 17; xlv. 1, 2. The Judaizing Christians are reproved for observing "the new moon." Gal. iv. 10: Col. ii. 16. The modern Jews consider it a semi-festival. A few of them keep it by repairing to the synagogue and repeating various penitential prayers, borrowed partly from the service for the Day of Atonement; hence it is called the Little Day of Atonement. The Hallelujah Psalms and various prayers are added, one of them containing the petition, "Be mindful of Messiah, the Son of David," etc. The passages of the Pentateuch enjoining the observance of this day are also read. The females frequently mark the day with special honor—placing on the table an extra dish, called Hutzelknopf, and abstaining from their customary vocations. See NEOMENIA.]

[NEW PLATONISTS.] The followers of Ammonias Saccas, who taught in the Alexandrian school in the second century. He endeavored to blend all religious and philosophical systems into one. He held that they were all distorted modifications of the ancient doctrines of Egypt and the east, the best interpreter of which was Plato. His views were mystical, pagan, and pantheistic. He recognized the mission of Christ, but denied that he intended to abolish the worship of demons, his only design being to purify the ancient religion. Plotinus was one of the principal champions of this school. His writings have been a text-book for various classes of monks, mystics, and pantheists, and others who think Christianity can be explained by the philosophy of Plato, and defended by the logic of Aristotle. See AMMONIANS and PLATONISTS.]

[NIBHAZ.] An idol of the Avites. 2 Kings xvii. 31. The word is derived by some from nabach, to bark, and chazah, to see; and is supposed to mean the cynocephalus, an ape, or a man, with a dog's head, looking and barking at the moon. The Rabbins say that Nibhaz had the shape of a dog, like the Egyptian Anubis, which was sacred to the moon. Grotius suggests that the Avites, who worshipped this idol, may have been the Avidia of Bactriana, mentioned by Ptolemy.]

NICE or NICENE CREED is so denominated because the greater part of it, namely, as far as the words, "Holy Ghost," was drawn up and agreed to at the council of Nice, or Nicæa, in Bithynia, A. D. 325. This council was assembled against Arius, who, though he brought down the Son to the condition of a creature, inferior, for that reason, in nature to the Father, yet acknowledged his personal subsistence before the world, and his superiority in nature to all the things that were created by him. So that there was need of some higher expression in this case than the other, to import his equal dignity of nature with the Father and Creator of all; and nothing was found to answer the purpose so well as the term ὁμοούσιος. The rest of this creed was added at the council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, except the words, "and the Son," which follow the words, "who proceedeth from the Father," and they were inserted A. D. 447. The addition made at Constantinople was caused by the denial of the divinity of the Holy Ghost by Macedonius and his followers; and the creed, thus enlarged, was immediately received by all orthodox Christians. The insertion of the words, "and the Son," was made by the Spanish bishops; and they were soon after adopted by the Christians in France. The bishops of Rome for some time refused to admit these words into the creed; but at last, A. D. 883, when Nicholas the First was pope, they were allowed, and from that time they have stood in the Nicene Creed in all the western Churches; but the Greek Church has never received them. See ARIUS.

NICODEMUS, a disciple of Jesus Christ, a Jew by nation, and a Pharisee. John iii. 1, etc. At the time when the priests and Pharisees had sent officers to seize Jesus, Nicodemus declared himself openly in his favor, John vii. 45, etc.; and still more so when he went with Joseph of Arimathea to pay the last duties to his body, which they took down from the cross, embalmed, and laid in a sepulchre. [John xix. 39.]

NICOLAITANES. St. John says in his Revelation, to the angel of the Church of Ephesus, "But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate;" Rev. ii. 6; and again, to the angel of the church of Pergamos: "So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, which thing I hate." Rev. ii. 15. These are the only two places where the Nicolaitanes are mentioned in the New Testament; and it might appear, at first, that little could be inferred from these concerning either their doctrine or their practice. It is asserted, however, by all the fathers, that the Nicolaitanes were a branch of the Gnostics; and the epistles which were addressed by St. John to the seven Asiatic Churches, may, perhaps, lead us to the same conclusion. Thus, to the Church at Ephesus he writes: "Thou hast tried them which say they are apostles and are not, and hast found them liars." Rev. ii. 2. This may be understood of the Gnostic teachers, who falsely called themselves Christians, and who would be not unlikely to assume also the title of apostles. It appears from this and other passages, that they had distinguished themselves at Ephesus; and it is when writing to that Church that St. John mentions the Nicolaitanes. Again, when writing to the Church at Smyrna, he says: "I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan." Rev. ii. 9. The Gnostics borrowed many doctrines from the Jews, and thought by this means to attract both the Jews and Christians. We might therefore infer, even without the testimony of the fathers, that the Gnostic doctrines were prevalent in these Churches, where St. John speaks of the Nicolaitanes; and if so, we have a still more specific indication of their doctrine and practice, when we find St. John saying to the Church in Perga-mos, "I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication." Rev. ii. 14. Then follow the words already quoted, "So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, which thing I hate." There seems here to be some comparison between the doctrine of Balaam and that of the Nicolaitanes; and I would also point out, that to the Church in Thyatira the apostle writes, "I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols." Rev. ii. 20. The two passages are very similar, and may enable us to throw some light upon the history of the Nicolaitanes. Tertullian has preserved a tradition that the person here spoken of as Jezebel was a female heretic, who taught what she had learned from the Nicolaitanes; and whether the tradition be true or not, it seems certain that to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication, was part of the practice of the Nicolaitanes.

These two sins are compared to the doctrine of Balaam; and though the Bible tells us little of Balaam's history beyond his prophecies and his death, yet we can collect enough to enable us to explain this allusion of St. John. We read, that "when Israel abode in Shittim, the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab; and they," that is, the women, "called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods; and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods." Num. xxv. 1, 2. But we read further, that when the Midianites were spoiled, and Balaam slain, Moses said of the women who were taken, "Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the Lord in the matter of Peor." Num. xxxi. 16. This, then, was the insidious policy and advice of Balaam. When he found that he was prohibited by God from cursing Israel, he advised Balak to seduce the Israelites by the women of Moab, and thus to entice them to the sacrifices of their gods. This is what St. John calls "the doctrine of Balaam," or the wicked artifice which he taught the King of Moab; and so he says, that in the Church of Pergamos there were some who held the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes. We have, therefore, the testimony of St. John, as well as of the fathers, that the lives of the Nicolaitanes were profligate and vicious; to which we may add, that they ate things sacrificed to idols. This is expressly said of Basilides and Valentinus, two celebrated leaders of Gnostic sects; and we, perhaps, are not going too far, if we infer from St. John that the Nicolaitanes were the first who enticed the Christians to this impious practice, and obtained from thence the distinction of their peculiar celebrity. Their motive for such conduct is very evident: they wished to gain proselytes to their doctrines, and they therefore taught that it was lawful to indulge the passions, and that there was no harm in partaking of an idol sacrifice. This had now become the test to which Christians must submit, f they wished to escape persecution; and the Nicolaitanes sought to gain converts by telling them that they might still believe in Jesus, though "they ate of things sacrificed unto idols." The fear of death would shake the faith of some; others would be gained over by sensual arguments; and thus many unhappy Christians of the Asiatic Churches were found by St. John in the ranks of the Nicolaitanes.

We might wish, perhaps, to know at what time the sect of the Nicolaitanes began; but we cannot define it accurately. If Irenæus is correct in saying that it preceded by a considerable time the heresy of Cerinthus, and that the Cerinthian heresy was a principal cause of St. John writing his Gospel, it follows, that the Nicolaitanes were in existence at least some years before the time of their being mentioned in the Revelation; and the persecution under Domitian, which was the cause of St. John being sent to Patmos, may have been the time which enabled the Nicolaitanes to exhibit their principles. Irenæus, indeed, adds, that St. John directed his Gospel against the Nicolaitanes as well as against Cerinthus; and the comparison which is made between their doctrine and that of Balaam, may, perhaps, authorize us to refer to this sect what is said in the second Epistle of St. Peter. The whole passage contains marked allusions to Gnostic teachers. There is another question concerning the Nicolaitanes which has excited much discussion. It is a question entirely of evidence and detail; and the two points to be considered are, 1. Whether the Nicolaitanes derived their name from Nicolas of Antioch, who was one of the seven deacons: 2. Supposing this to be the fact, whether Nicolas had disgraced himself by sensual indulgence. Those writers who have endeavored to clear the character of Nicolas have generally tried also to prove that he was not the man whom the Nicolaitanes claimed as their head. But the one point may be true without the other; and the evidence is so overwhelming which states that Nicolas the deacon was at least the person intended by the Nicolaitanes, that it is difficult to come to any other conclusion upon the subject. We must not deny that some of the fathers have also charged him with falling into vicious habits, and thus affording too true a support to the heretics who claimed him as their leader. These writers, however, are of a late date; and some, who are much more ancient, have entirely acquitted him, and furnished an explanation of the calumnies which attach to his name. We know that the Gnostics were not ashamed to claim as their founders the apostles, or friends of the apostles. The same may have been the case with Nicolas the deacon; and though we allow that if the Nicolaitanes were distinguished as a sect some time before the end of the century, the probability is lessened that his name was thus abused; yet if his career was a short one, his history, like that of the other deacons, would soon be forgotten; and the same fertile invention which gave rise in the first two centuries to so many apocryphal Gospels, may also have led the Nicolaitanes to give a false character to him whose name they had assumed.

means conqueror of the people, and as Balaam is derived by some from bala, to swallow or destroy, and am, the people, Michaelis suggests that the Greek name is merely a translation of the Hebrew; but, admitting that Nicolas was the founder of the Nicolaitanes, their doctrines are distinguished from those of the Balaamites, Rev. ii. 14, 15, unless the reading of the Alexandrian and some other MSS., ὁμοίως, expressive of similarity, be adopted, instead of ὁ ὡσὼν, which I hate. See NICOLAITANES.]

NICOPOLIS, a city of Epirus, on the gulf of Ambracia, whither, as some think, St. Paul wrote to Titus, then in Crete, to come to him, Titus iii. 12; but others, with greater probability, are of opinion that the city of Nicopolis, where St. Paul was, was not that of Epirus, but that of Thrace, on the borders of Macedonia, near the river Nessus. Emmaus in Palestine was also called Nicopolis by the Romans. [This was the city of Emmaus, twenty miles north-west of Jerusalem, not the village spoken of by St. Luke, xxiv.—Conybeare and Howson "assume that the Nicopolis spoken of Titus iii. 12, was the city of that name in Epirus. There were other places of the same name, but they were comparatively insignificant. Its position would render it a good centre for operating upon the surrounding province; and thence St. Paul might make excursions to those churches of Illyricum which he perhaps founded himself at an earlier period. The city which was thus chosen as the last scene of the apostle's labors before his final imprisonment, is more celebrated for its origin than for its subsequent history. It was founded by Augustus, as a permanent memorial of the victory of Actium, and stood upon the site of the camp occupied by his land forces before that battle." He peopled this city by colonists from all the neighboring region; caused it to be represented in the Amphictyonic assembly; and had games celebrated at it with great pomp every five years. It afterward fell into decay, but was restored by Julian. Its remains, near Prevesa Vecchia, show that it was a magnificent city. Wordsworth says, "A long, lofty wall spans a desolate plain; to the north of it rises, on a distant hill, the shattered scena of a theatre; and to the west, the extended though broken line of an aqueduct connects the distant mountains with the city."]

[NIGER. The surname of Simeon of Antioch, Acts xiii. 1, given him, as some think, on account of the color of his hair or of his skin.]

NIGHT. The ancient Hebrews began their artificial day in the evening, and ended it the next evening; so that the night preceded the day—whence it is said, "evening and morning one day." Gen. i. 5. They allowed twelve hours to the night, and twelve to the day. Night is put for a time of affliction and adversity: "Thou hast proved mine heart, thou hast visited me in the night, thou hast tried me," Psalm xvii. 8; that is, by adversity and tribulation. And "the morning cometh, and also the night," Isaiah xxi. 12. [Compare Micah iii. 6.] Night is also put for the time of death: "The night cometh, wherein no man can work," John ix. 4. Children of the day, and children of the night, in a moral and figurative sense, denote good men and wicked men, Christians and Gentiles. The disciples of the Son of God are children of light: they belong to the light, they walk in the light of truth; while the children of the night walk in the darkness of ignorance and infidelity, and perform only works of darkness. "Ye are all the children of the light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness." 1 Thess. v. 5.

NIGHT-HAWK, חורבן, Lev. xi. 16: Deut. xiv. 15. That this is a voracious bird seems clear from the import of its name; and interpreters are generally agreed to describe it as flying by night. On the whole, it should seem to be the strix orientalis, which Hasselquist thus describes: It is of the size of the common owl, and lodges in the large buildings or ruins of Egypt and Syria, and sometimes even in the dwelling-houses. The Arabs settled in Egypt call it "massasa," and the Syrians "banu." It is extremely voracious in Syria; to such a degree, that if care is not taken to shut the windows at the coming on of night, it enters the houses and kills the children: the women, therefore, are very much afraid of it.

NILE, the river of Egypt, whose fountain is in the Upper Ethiopia. After having watered several kingdoms, the Nile continues its course far into the kingdom of Goiam. Then it winds about again, from the east to the north. Having crossed several kingdoms and provinces, it falls into Egypt at the cataracts, which are waterfalls over steep rocks of the length of two hundred feet. At the bottom of these rocks the Nile returns to its usual pace, and thus flows through the valley of Egypt. Its channel, according to Villamont, is about a league broad. At eight miles below Grand Cairo, it is divided into two arms, which make a triangle, whose base is at the Mediterranean Sea, and which the Greeks call the Delta, because of its figure Δ . These two arms are divided into others, which discharge themselves into the Mediterranean, the distance of which from the top of the Delta is about twenty leagues. These branches of the Nile the ancients commonly reckoned to be seven. Ptolemy makes them nine, some only four, some eleven, some fourteen. Homer, Xenophon, and Diodorus Siculus testify that the ancient name of this river was Egyptus; and the latter of these writers says that it took the name, Nilus only since the time of a king of Egypt called by that name. The Greeks gave it the name of Melas; and Diodorus Siculus observes, that the most ancient name by which the Grecians have known the Nile was Oceanus. The Egyptians paid divine honors to this river, and called it Jupiter Nilus.

Very little rain ever falls in Egypt, never sufficient to fertilize the land; and but for the provision of this bountiful river, the country would be condemned to perpetual sterility. As it is, from the joint operation of the regularity of the flood, the deposit of mud from the water of the river, and the warmth of the climate, it is the most fertile country in the world; the produce exceeding all calculation. It has in consequence been, in all ages, the granary of the east; and has on more than one occasion, an instance of which is recorded in the history of Joseph, saved the neighboring countries from starvation. It is probable, that while in these countries, on the occasion referred to, the seven years' famine was the result of the absence of rain, in Egypt it was brought about by the inundation being withheld; and the consternation of the Egyptians, at witnessing this phenomenon for seven successive years, may easily be conceived. The origin and course of the Nile being unknown to the ancients, its stream was held and is still held by the natives in the greatest veneration; and its periodical overflow was viewed with mysterious wonder. But both of these are now, from the discoveries of the moderns, better understood. It is now known that the sources or permanent springs of the Nile are situated in the mountains of Abyssinia, and the unexplored regions to the west and south-west of that country; and that the occasional supplies, or causes of the inundation, are the periodical rains which fall in those districts. For a correct knowledge of these facts, and of the true position of the source of that branch of the river which has generally been considered to be the continuation of the true Nile, we are indebted to our countryman, the intrepid and indefatigable Bruce. Although the Nile, by way of eminence, has been called "the river of Egypt," it must not be confounded with another stream so denominated in Scripture, an insignificant rivulet in comparison, which falls into the Mediterranean below Gaza. [But see SINOR.]

[Of the two rivers that form the Nile, the Bahr-el-Abiad, or White river, and the Bahr-el-Azrek, or Blue river, the former is considered the true Nile. It is supposed to rise on the east edge of the table-land of East Africa, latitude 2° south, and longitude 34° east. In 1840-2 the Pacha of Egypt sent expeditions to ascertain its source: they traced it to latitude $4^{\circ} 42'$ north, longitude $30^{\circ} 58'$ east, where the navigation was interrupted by a ledge of rocks. It flows generally north, with a width of from one to two miles, and is joined by the Azrek, at Khartum in Nubia, latitude $15^{\circ} 37'$ north. The Azrek rises in Abyssinia, latitude $10^{\circ} 59' 25''$ north, longitude $36^{\circ} 55' 39''$ east. It flows north fifty-five miles, and enters Lake Dembeah on the south-west, and emerges from it on the south-east: it then makes a course around to the south, west, and north-west, traversing several mountain chains, and making numerous falls till it reaches the plains of Nubia, where it passes by Sennaar, and rolls on to the Abiad. After the junction, the Nile flows northward, varying east and west, passing by Halfay, Shendy, and Berber, to latitude $19^{\circ} 20'$, where turning south-west it makes the great bend. In latitude 18° it turns northward and flows by Dongola, Girgeh, Siout, and Cairo to its mouth. From the junction to the Delta, its basin is formed by two parallel chains of mountains, which sometimes close upon it and form rapids; in other places they open up and leave fine fertile plains between them and the river. The first cataract is in latitude $24^{\circ} 10'$ north; the second, latitude $21^{\circ} 52' 20''$ north; and the third, latitude $19^{\circ} 40'$ north. Its banks are high in Nubia, but they gradually decline until they nearly disappear in the Delta. Its mean velocity is about three miles an hour—its average fall between Essouan and the sea is two inches to a mile. Its entire length, following the bends, is estimated at three thousand miles—the direct distance being two thousand three hundred miles. The Delta begins in latitude 30° 7' north, where the Nile spreads out into various streams; the base of the triangle, on the Mediterranean, being one hundred and twenty miles in extent: the principal mouths are the Rosetta on the west, the Damietta on the east, and the Bourlos and Dibe between these two. It has no affluent for one thousand four hundred miles—the first being the Atbara in Nubia, which enters it on the right, twenty-seven miles south of Berber. The rise of the Nile, beginning in June and ending in September, is attributed to the periodical rains which fall in the tropical regions of Africa. In Upper Egypt the swell rises to about thirty feet—at Cairo twenty-four feet, perpendicular. When it first rises, the water is green and unwholesome; but when it becomes red—having received the floods of Ethiopia, which from the redness of the soil are of that color—it is sweet and wholesome. "The water of the Nile," says Dr. Robinson, "is celebrated for its deliciousness; and is deserving of its fame in this respect. Strangers are apt to drink too freely of it at first; and not unfrequently experience a slight attack of dysentery in consequence. The water is slightly turbid; but becomes clear by filtering through the porous jars of the country, or on being left to stand in jars, the sides of which have been rubbed with almond-paste." This was in the month of January, when the waters are not turbid, as they are during the flood. The ancient Egyptians erected pillars in the river, to mark its rise; there is one of these Nilometers near Cairo. If it did not rise above twelve cubits, a famine was the consequence, and it was the same if it rose above sixteen—as the fertility of Egypt depended upon irrigation from the Nile, which of course could not obtain if the water was very low or very high. "It was a glorious sight," says Robinson, "to look upon the mighty river, rolling its waters for nearly one thousand five hundred miles without a single tributary, through a region which but for it would be a desert; and rendering this desert by its waters the garden of the world. The Rosetta branch of the Nile, where we came upon it, reminded me strongly of the Rhine at Cologne, in its general breadth and current, and in the general character of its banks." "The gleaming waters of the mighty river, rushing onward in ceaseless flow; the pyramids stretching in a range along the western shore from Gizah upwards beyond Sakkarah and Dashûr; the frequent villages along the banks, each in the bosom of its own tall grove of graceful palm-trees; the broad valley, teeming with fertility, and shut in on both sides by ranges of naked, barren mountains, within which the desert is continually striving to enlarge its encroachments—all these are objects which cannot be regarded but with lively emotions. Nor is this wholly a scene of still life. The many boats, with broad lateen sails, gliding up and down; the frequent water-wheels, Sâkieh, by which water is raised from the river to irrigate the fields; the more numerous Shadûfs, who laboriously ply their little sweep and bucket for the same end; the laborers in the fields; the herds of neat cattle and buffaloes; occasional files of camels and asses; large flocks of pigeons, ducks, and wild-geese; and, as one advances, the occasional sight of crocodiles sleeping on a sand-bank, or plunging into the water—all these give a life and activity to the scene, which enhances the interest and adds to the exhilaration. Yet if the traveller sets foot on shore, the romance of his river voyage will quickly be dissipated. He will find the soil becoming an almost impalpable powder under his feet, through which he may wade his way to the next village; and this village too he will find to be only the squalid abode of filth and wretchedness—mud hovels, not high enough to stand up in, built on mounds accumulated in the course of centuries from the ruins of former dwellings." Had not Egypt, according to prophecy, become the basest of the kingdoms, the productions of the valley of the Nile would be almost incredible. As it is, under its present dynasty, it has been developing resources which betoken what it will be when it shall "return to the Lord." Isa. xix. 22-25. Its public revenue and expenditure amount to some ten millions of dollars; and its exports in 1851 amounted to 325,804,695 Egyptian piastres—imports, 230,000,000. "The area of this celebrated country," as Dr. Olin remarks, "is barely equal to one-third of the State of New York." Yet small as it is, what a vast granary it would become, were Western civilization introduced into it, along with Christianity, in view of its inalienable inheritance, the inexhaustible resources of the Nile. See EGYPT.]

[NIMRAH. A place east of the Jordan, near Jericho. Dr. Robinson says a "sheikh pointed out Wady Sha'ib coming down in the northern part of the recess of the eastern mountains, from the vicinity of es-Salt, and passing by the ruins of Nimrin, the Nimrah and Beth-Nimrah of Scripture. Num. xxxii. 3, 36; Josh. xiii. 27. Here, as I understand, is a fountain corresponding to the waters of Nimrim—a plural form of Nimrah. Isa. xv. 6; Jer. xlviii. 34. This Wady enters the Jordan nearly east by north from Jericho; and at its mouth is the usual ford of that river; where, as the sheikh said, the water was breast-high.]"

NIMROD. He is generally supposed to have been the immediate son of Cush, and the youngest, or sixth, from the scriptural phrase, "Cush begat Nimrod," after the mention of his five sons. Gen. x. 8. But the phrase is used with considerable latitude, like "father" and "son," in Scripture. "And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar: out of that land he went forth to invade Assyria; and built Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, and Resin, between Nineveh and Calah: the same is a great city." Gen. x. 8-12. Though the main body of the Cushites was miraculously dispersed and sent by Providence to their destinations along the sea-coasts of Asia and Africa, yet Nimrod remained behind, and founded an empire in Babylonia, according to Berosus, by usurping the property of the Arphaxadites in the land of Shinar; where "the beginning of his kingdom was Babel," or Babylon, and other towns; and, not satisfied with this, he next invaded Assur, or Assyria, east of the Tigris, where he built Nineveh, and several other towns. The marginal reading of our English Bible, "He went out into Assyria," or to invade Assyria, is here adopted in preference to that in the text: "And out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh," etc. The meaning of the word Nineveh may lead us to his original name, Nin, signifying "a son," the most celebrated of the sons of Cush. That of Nimrod, or "Rebel," was probably a parody, or nickname, given him by the oppressed Shemites, of which we have several instances in Scripture. Thus nahash, the brazen "serpent" in the wilderness, was called by Hezekiah, in contempt, nehustian, "a piece of brass," when he broke it in pieces, because it was perverted into an object of idolatrous worship by the Jews. 2 Kings xviii. 4. Nimrod, that arch rebel, who first subverted the patriarchal government, introduced also the Zabian idolatry, or worship of the heavenly host; and, after his death, was deified by his subjects, and supposed to be translated into the constellations of Orion, attended by his hounds, Sirius and Canicula, and still pursuing his favorite game, the great bear; supposed also to be translated into ursa major, near the north pole; as admirably described by Homer:

"Ἄρκτον θ', ἣν καὶ ἄμαζαν ἐπὶ κληῖον καλέουσιν,
Ἥρ' αὐτοῦ στρέφεται, καί τ' Ὀρίωνα δοκεῖναι.
Iliad, xviii. 485.

"And the bear, surnamed also the wain, by the Egyptians, who is turning herself about there, and watching Orion." Homer also introduces the shade of Orion, as hunting in the Elysian fields:

Τὸν δὲ μέγ', Ὀρίωνα πελώριον εἰσενόησα
Θῆρας ὁμοῦ εἰλεῦντα, κατ' ἀσφοδελὸν λειμῶνα
Τοῦς αὐτὸς κατέπεφνεν ἐν οἰοπόλοισιν ὄρεσσι
Χερσὶν ἔχων ῥόπαλον παγχάλκεον, αἶψιν ἀγᾶς.
Odys., xi. 571.

"Next, I observed the mighty Orion
Chasing wild beasts through an asphodel mead,
Which himself had slain on the solitary mountains:
Holding in his hands a solid brazen mace, ever unbroken."

The Grecian name of this "mighty hunter" may furnish a satisfactory clue to the name given him by the impious adulation of the Babylonians and Assyrians. Ὀρίων nearly resembles Oûrian, the oblique case of Oûria, which is the Septuagint rendering of Uriah, a proper name in Scripture. 2 Sam. xi. 6-21. But Uriah, signifying "the light of the Lord," was an appropriate appellation of that most brilliant constellation. He was also called Baal, Beel, Bel, or Belus, signifying "lord," or "master," by the Phenicians, Assyrians, and Greeks; and Bala Rama, by the Hindoos. At a village called Bala-deva, or Baldeo in the vulgar dialect, thirteen miles east by south from Muttra, in Hindustan, there is a very ancient statue of Bala Rama, in which he is represented with a ploughshare in his left hand, and a thick cudgel in his right, and his shoulders covered with the skin of a tiger. Captain Wilford supposes that the ploughshare was designed to hook his enemies; but may it not more naturally denote the constellation of the great bear, which strikingly represents the figure of a plough in its seven bright stars; and was probably so denominated by the earliest astronomers, before the introduction of the Zabian idolatry, as a celestial symbol of agriculture? The thick cudgel corresponds to the brazen mace of Homer. And it is highly probable that the Assyrian Nimrod, or Hindoo Bala, was also the prototype of the Grecian Hercules, with his club and lion's skin.

Nimrod is said to have been "a mighty hunter before the Lord;" which the Jerusalem paraphrast interprets of a sinful hunting after the sons of men to turn them off from the true religion. But it may as well be taken in a more literal sense, for hunting of wild beasts; inasmuch as the circumstance of his being a mighty hunter is mentioned with great propriety to introduce the account of his setting up his kingdom; the exercise of hunting being looked upon in ancient times as a means of acquiring the rudiments of war; for which reason the principal heroes of heathen antiquity, as Theseus, Nestor, etc., were, as Xenophon tells us, bred up to hunting. Besides, it may be supposed that by this practice Nimrod drew together a great company of robust young men to attend him in his sport, and by that means increased his power. And by destroying the wild beasts—which, in the comparatively defenceless state of society in those early ages, were no doubt very dangerous enemies—he might, perhaps, render himself further popular; thereby engaging numbers to join with him, and to promote his chief design of subduing men, and making himself master of many nations. [It has been supposed that Nimrod is the prototype of Baccus, famous for his hunting exploits: the name Nembrodes given to the latter is suggestive of Nimrod; and Baccus itself may be a corruption of Bar, son, and Chus, Cush—the son of Cush. Some think Nimrod seized upon the cities in the land of Shinar, expelling Asshur, who thereupon founded Nineveh and adjacent cities.]

NINEVEH. This capital of the Assyrian empire could boast of the remotest antiquity. Tacitus styles it, "Velutissima sedes Assyria;" [the most ancient seat of Assyria;] and Scripture informs us that Nimrod, after he had built Babel, in the land of Shinar, invaded Assyria, where he built Nineveh, and several other cities. Genesis x. 11. Its name denotes "the habitation of Nin," which seems to have been the proper name of "that rebel," as Nimrod signifies. And it is uniformly styled by Herodotus, Xenophon, Diodorus, Lucian, etc., Ἡ Νῑνος, "the city of Ninus." And the village of Nunia, opposite Mosul, in its name, and the tradition of the natives, ascertains the site of the ancient city, which was near the castle of Arbela, according to Tacitus, so celebrated for the decisive victory of Alexander the Great over the Persians there; the site of which is ascertained by the village of Arbil, about ten German miles to the east of Nunia, according to Niebuhr's map. Nineveh at first seems only to have been a small city, and less than Resen, in its neighborhood; which is conjectured by Bochart, and not without reason, to have been the same as Larissa, which Xenophon describes as "the ruins of a great city, formerly inhabited by the Medes," and which the natives might have described as belonging la Resen—"to Resen." Nineveh did not rise to greatness for many ages after, until its second founder, Ninus II., about B. C. 1230, enlarged and made it the greatest city in the world. According to Diodorus, it was of an oblong form, a hundred and fifty stadia long and ninety broad, and, consequently, four hundred and eighty in circuit, or forty-eight miles, reckoning ten stadia to an English mile, with Major Rennel. And its walls were a hundred feet high, and so broad that three chariots could drive on them abreast; and on the walls were fifteen hundred towers, each two hundred feet high. We are not, however, to imagine that all this vast enclosure was built upon: it contained great parks and extensive fields, and detached houses and buildings, like Babylon and other great cities of the east even at the present day, as Bussorah, etc. And this entirely corresponds with the representations of Scripture. In the days of the prophet Jonah, about B. C. 800, it seems to have been a "great city, an exceeding great city, of three days' journey," Jonah i. 2; iii. 3; perhaps in circuit. The population of Nineveh, also, at that time was very great. It contained "more than six-score thousand persons that could not discern between their right hand and their left, beside much cattle." Jonah iv. 11. Reckoning the persons to have been infants of two years old and under, and that these were a fifth part of the whole, according to Bochart, the whole population would amount to six hundred thousand souls. The same number Pliny assigns for the population of Seleucia, on the decline of Babylon. This population shows that a great part of the city must have been left open and unbuild.

The threatened overthrow of Nineveh within three days, was, by the general repentance and humiliation of the inhabitants, from the highest to the lowest, suspended for near two hundred years, until "their iniquity came to the full;" and then the prophecy was literally accomplished, in the third year of the siege of the city, by the combined Medes and Babylonians; the king, Sardanapalus, being encouraged to hold out in consequence of an ancient prophecy, that Nineveh should never be taken by assault, till the river became its enemy; when a mighty inundation of the river, swollen by continual rains, came up against a part of the city, and threw down twenty stadia of the wall in length; upon which the king, conceiving that the oracle was accomplished, burned himself, his concubines, eunuchs, and treasures; and the enemy, entering by the breach, sacked and razed the city, about B. C. 606. Diodorus, also, relates that Belesis, the Governor of Babylon, obtained from Arbaces, the King of Media, the ashes of the palace, to erect a mound with them near the temple of Belus at Babylon: and that he forthwith prepared shipping, and, together with the ashes, carried away most of the gold and silver, of which he had private information given him by one of the eunuchs who escaped the fire. Dr. Gillies thinks it incredible that these could be transported from Nineveh to Babylon, three hundred miles distant; but likely enough, if Nineveh was only fifty miles from Babylon, with a large canal of communication between them, the Nahar Malka, or Royal River. But we learn from Niebuhr, that the conveyance of goods from Mosul to Bagdat by the Tigris is very commodious, in the very large boats called helleks; in which, in spring, when the river is rapid, the voyage may be made in three or four days, which would take fifteen by land. The complete demolition of such immense piles as the walls and towers of Nineveh may seem matter of surprise to those who do not consider the nature of the materials of which they were constructed, that is, of bricks, dried or baked in the sun, and cemented with bitumen, which were apt to be "dissolved" by water, or to moulder away by the injuries of the weather. Besides, in the east, the materials of ancient cities have been often employed in the building of new ones in the neighborhood. Thus Mosul was built with the spoils of Nineveh. Tauckesra, or the Palace of Chosroes, appears to have been built of bricks brought from the ruins of Babylon; and so was Hellah, as the dimensions are nearly the same, and the proportions so singular. And when such materials could conveniently be transported by inland navigation, they are to be found at very great distances from their ancient place, much farther, indeed, than are Bagdat and Seleucia, or Ctesiphon, from Babylon.

The book of Nahum was avowedly prophetic of the destruction of Nineveh; and it is there foretold that "the gates of the river shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved. Nineveh of old, like a pool of water, with an overflowing flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof." Nahum ii. 6; i. 8, 9. The historian describes the facts by which the other predictions of the prophet were as literally fulfilled. He relates that the King of Assyria, elated with his former victories, and ignorant of the revolt of the Bactrians, had abandoned himself to scandalous inaction; had appointed a time of festivity, and supplied his soldiers with abundance of wine; and that the general of the enemy, apprised, by deserters, of their negligence and drunkenness, attacked the Assyrian army while the whole of them were fearlessly giving way to indulgence, destroyed great part of them, and drove the rest into the city. The words of the prophet were hereby verified: "While they be folded together as thorns, and while they are drunken as drunkards, they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry." Nahum i. 10. The prophet promised much spoil to the enemy: "Take the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold; for there is no end of the store and glory out of all the pleasant furniture." Nahum ii. 9. And the historian affirms that many talents of gold and silver, preserved from the fire, were carried to Ecbatana. According to Nabura, iii. 15, the city was not only to be destroyed by an overflowing flood, but the fire also was to devour it; and, as Diodorus relates, partly by water, partly by fire, it was destroyed.

The utter and perpetual destruction and desolation of Nineveh were foretold: "The Lord will make an utter end of the place thereof. Affliction shall not rise up the second time. She is empty, void, and waste." Nahum i. 8, 9; ii. 10; iii. 17-19. "The Lord will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria, and will make Nineveh a desolation, and dry like a wilderness. How is she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in!" Zeph. ii. 13-15. In the second century, Lucian, a native of a city on the banks of the Euphrates, testified that Nineveh was utterly perished, that there was no vestige of it remaining, and that none could tell where once it was situated. This testimony of Lucian, and the lapse of many ages during which the place was not known where it stood, render it at least somewhat doubtful whether the remains of an ancient city, opposite to Mosul, which have been described as such by travellers, be indeed those of ancient Nineveh. It is, perhaps, probable that they are the remains of the city which succeeded Nineveh, or of a Persian city of the same name, which was built on the banks of the Tigris by the Persians subsequently to A. D. 230, and demolished by the Saracens, A. D. 632. In contrasting the then existing great and increasing population, and the accumulating wealth of the proud inhabitants of the mighty Nineveh, with the utter ruin that awaited it, the word of God by the prophet Nahum was, "Make thyself many as the canker-worm, make thyself many as the locusts. Thou hast multiplied thy merchants above the stars of heaven: the canker-worm spoileth and flieth away. Thy crowned are as the locusts, and thy captains as the great grasshoppers which camp in the hedges in the cold day; but when the sun riseth, they flee away; and their place is not known where they are," or were. Whether these words imply that even the site of Nineveh would in future ages be uncertain or unknown; or, as they rather seem to intimate, that every vestige of the palaces of its monarchs, of the greatness of its nobles, and of the wealth of its numerous merchants, would wholly disappear, the truth of the prediction cannot be invalidated under either interpretation. The avowed ignorance respecting Nineveh, and the oblivion which passed over it, for many an age, conjoined with the meagreness of evidence to identify it, still prove that the place where it stood was long unknown, and that, even now, it can scarcely with certainty be determined. And if the only spot that bears its name, or that can be said to be the place where it was, be indeed the site of one of the most extensive of cities on which the sun ever shone, and which continued for many centuries to be the capital of Assyria, the principal mounds, few in number, which show neither bricks, stones, nor other materials of building, but are in many places overgrown with grass, and resemble the mounds left by intrenchments and fortifications of ancient Roman camps, and the appearances of other mounds and ruins less marked than even these, extending for ten miles, and widely spread, and seeming to be the wreck of former buildings, show that Nineveh is left without one monument of royalty, without any token whatever of its splendor or wealth; that their place is not known where they were; and that it is indeed a desolation, "empty, void, and waste," its very ruins perished, and less than the wreck of what it was. Such an utter ruin, in every view, has been made of it; and such is the truth of the Divine predictions!

[The oblivion into which Nineveh passed, and in which it remained for so many centuries, is not a greater illustration of the truth of prophecy than its reëappearance in our own times. The results of the persevering explorations of Messrs. Layard, Rawlinson, Hincks, Rassam, Botta, Bonomi, and others, are really astounding. The mounds of Kouyunjik and Nebbi Yunus, opposite Mosul, Khorsabad, Karamles, and Nimroud, are at the four corners of an area, comprehending not less than sixty miles in circuit. Within this area, and especially in these mounds, have been found the most magnificent temples and palaces, sculptures and paintings—representing gods, heroes, and captives, military, civil, and religious customs and ceremonies—inscriptions in cuniform characters, which, as far as they have been interpreted, give the names of Asshur, Merodach, Nebo, Bel, and other Assyrian and Babylonian deities; Nimrod, Semiramis, Pul, Tiglath-Pileser, Sardanapalus, Adramelech, Sargon, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and other Assyrian monarchs; and also the names of Omri, Jehu, Menahem, Hezekiah, Hazael, Merodach-Baladan, and Pharaoh, Hebrew, Syrian, and Egyptian kings; as well as the names of places mentioned in Scripture, as Judea, Jerusalem, Samaria, Lachish, Lebanon, Damascus, Hamath, Tyre, Sidon, Gaza, Ekron, Ashdod, Askelon, Egypt, Euphrates, Tigris, Lud, Ur, Elam, Ararat, Meshech, Tubal, Carchemish, Calah, Babylon, Assyria, and many others; all in a most striking manner corroborating the records of sacred and profane history, and shedding a world of light upon the Old Testament prophecies. Alluding to Ezekiel xxiii. 14, 15, Mr. Layard says, "The passage describing the interior of the Assyrian palaces, so completely corresponds with and illustrates the monuments of Nimroud and Khorsabad, that it deserves particular notice. The prophet, in typifying the corruptions which had crept into the religious system of the Jews, and the idolatrous practices borrowed from nations with which they had been brought into contact, thus illustrates the influence of the Assyrians: 'She saw men of sculptured or painted workmanship upon the walls, likenesses of the Chaldeans pictured or sculptured in shashar, girded with girdles on their loins, with colored flowing head-dresses upon their heads, with the aspect of princes all of them, the likenesses of the sons of Babel Chaldeæ, the land of their nativity.' Ezekiel prophesied on the banks of the Chebar, a river certainly in the immediate vicinity of Nineveh. In the passage quoted, the prophet is referring to a period previous to the final destruction of the Assyrian capital, an event which he most probably witnessed, as the date usually assigned to his prophecies is B. C. 593, only thirteen years after the Medo-Babylonian conquest. There can scarcely be a doubt that he had seen the objects which he describes, the figures sculptured upon the walls, and painted. The prevalence of a red color, shown by the Khorsabad remains, and the elaborate and highly-ornamented head-dresses of Khorsabad and Kouyunjik kings, are evidently indicated." The excavations at Nineveh are still in progress, and the discoveries richly reward the toil and expense thereby incurred. Large collections of the monuments have been transported to Europe, and deposited in the Louvre, and particularly in the British Museum; and descriptions of them, with engravings and interpretations of the inscriptions, have been published by Layard, Rawlinson, Hincks, Fergusson, and others, to whose valuable works on the discoveries in Nineveh and Babylon the reader is referred.]

[NINTH HOUR. One of the canonical hours of prayer—three in the afternoon. The fathers considered it the most important, not only because it was observed by the apostles—Acts iii. 1; compare x. 3—but because Christ died at that hour. Mark xv. 34–37.]

[NIOBITES. Followers of Niobes, an Alexandrian rhetorician, who taught that there was no distinction of natures in Christ, after the union of the divinity and humanity.]

NISAN, a month of the Hebrews, answering to our March, and which sometimes takes from February or April, according to the course of the moon. It was made the first month of the second year, at the coming out of Egypt, Exod. xii. 2; and it was the seventh month of the civil year. By Moses it is called Abib. The name Nisan was introduced only since the time of Ezra, and the return from the captivity of Babylon. [Neh. ii. 1: Esth. iii. 7. Parkhurst, deriving the name from נס, to flee, suggests that it was so called as being the month of the exodus or flight from Egypt; though Gesenius thinks it means new day.]

NISROCH, a god of the Assyrians. Sennacherib was killed by two of his sons, while he was paying his adorations in the temple of this deity. 2 Kings xix. 37: Isa. xxxvii. 38. It is uncertain who this god was.

NITRE, נתר. Prov. xxv. 20: Jer. ii. 22. This is not the same that we call nitre, or saltpetre, but a native salt of a different kind, distinguished among naturalists by the name of natrum. The natrum of the ancients was an earthy alkaline salt. It was found in abundance separated from the water of the Lake Natron in Egypt. It rises from the bottom of the lake to the top of the water, and is there condensed by the heat of the sun into the hard and dry form in which it is sold. This salt thus scummed off is the same in all respects with the Smyrna soap earth. Pliny, Matthiolus, and Agricola, have described it to us: Hippocrates, Galen, Dioscorides, and others, mention its uses. It is also found in great plenty in Sindy, a province in the inner part of Asia, and in many other parts of the east; and might be had in any quantities. The learned Michaelis plainly demonstrates, from the nature of the thing and the context, that this fossil and natural alkali must be that which the Hebrews called nether. Solomon must mean the same when he compares the effect which unseasonable mirth has upon a man in affliction to the action of vinegar upon nitre, Prov. xxv. 20; for vinegar has no effect upon what we call nitre, but upon the alkali in question it has a great effect, making it rise up in bubbles with much effervescence. It is of a soapy nature, and was used to take spots from clothes, and even from the face. Jeremiah alludes to this use of it, ii. 22. [It is composed of the carbonate, sulphate, and muriate of soda. There are several soda lakes in a valley west of the Delta in Egypt—also in the United States.]

NO, or NO-AMMON, a city of Egypt, supposed to be Thebes.

[The city was also called Hecatompyles, because it had a hundred gates, and Diospolis, as being sacred to Jupiter Ammon. It stretched seven miles on both sides of the Nile, about five hundred miles above Cairo. It was one of the oldest cities in the world. Homer speaks of it as great, populous, and renowned in arms. So the prophets: Jer. xli. 25: Ezek. xxx. 15: Nah. iii. 8–10. Its circumference was over seventeen miles, and it was able to send twenty thousand fighting men and two hundred chariots into the field. It was adorned with temples, palaces, statues, etc., of the most magnificent character. Their ruins, as described by Wilkinson, Olin, and others, fill one with amazement. The temple of Luxor—begun, it is supposed, by Amenoph III., who ascended the throne B. C. 1430, and developed by succeeding monarchs—was some eight hundred feet in length, with a breadth varying from three hundred feet to the width of a passage between two rows of columns. There were two monolith obelisks, eighty feet high, in front of it; but one of them has been conveyed to Paris, where it stands in the Place de la Concorde. Its immense propylon, colonnades, and obelisks are covered with hieroglyphics which appear fresh and beautiful. It is built of sandstone: the grotesque statues lying around it are of sienite granite. The Luxor is on the eastern shore; so also is the temple, or cluster of temples, of Karnak, the work of a number of monarchs, who were ambitious to augment the splendor and dimensions of this amazing pile. It covers ten acres, being one thousand one hundred and eighty-eight feet long, and three hundred and fifty wide. The grand hall at Karnak was one hundred and seventy feet by three hundred and twenty-nine, supported by a central avenue of twelve massive columns, sixty feet high, (without the pedestal and abacus,) and twelve in diameter. There were also one hundred and twenty-two halls of less gigantic dimensions, distributed in seven lines on either side of the former. On the outside of the south-west wall of the great temple at Karnak, is sculptured a representation of the exploits of Sheshonk, the Shishak of the Bible, who made a successful expedition against Jerusalem in the fifth year of King Rehoboam. 1 Kings xiv. 25.

On the western shore is the Memnonium, some six hundred feet long and two hundred broad. Here is the famous statue of Rameses. It is made of a single block of sienite granite, transported from upper Egypt, and placed on a pedestal twenty-nine feet long, seventeen wide, and nine in height. It is now prostrate. Dr. Olin measured it at the shoulders, and found it twenty-three feet broad, seven and a half thick, fifty-five in girth around the breast, and about thirteen feet from the shoulder to the elbow. It is five feet across the foot. Where not marred by antiquaries and others, it has a fine polish. It weighs by estimate eight hundred and eighty-seven tons! At a little distance from the Ramesion are massive piles of masonry, constructed of sun-dried bricks, formed of clay and straw—each sixteen inches long, seven wide, and five thick—and stamped with hieroglyphics. Near by are the two colossal statues of Amenoph, (usually called Memnon,) which once guarded the approach to the temple-palace of that king. They are forty feet apart, facing the east, and, including the pedestals, sixty feet high. They are in a sitting posture, and are greatly mutilated by time and the vandalism of travellers. One of them was the famous “vocal Memnon,” which was said to emit musical sounds every morning at the rising of the sun. It emits none now! To the south is a wide field of massive, splendid ruins, called the Temple of Medinet Habû. The tombs of the kings and of the priests are prodigious excavations. Dr. Olin explored some of them, which varied in length from four hundred and thirty-five feet to one hundred and thirty-two. The depth below the entrance in one of them is twenty-four feet. The tombs discovered by Belzoni and Bruce abound with paintings and sculptures, representing the manners and customs of the ancient Egyptians, and throwing light upon many passages of history, sacred and profane. The tombs, like the temples, are now occupied by swarms of miserable fellahs, whose filth and squalid wretchedness are in striking contrast with the magnificent ruins which are infested by them. From the prophecy of Nahum, it appears that Thebes had been sacked in or before his time—perhaps by the Assyrians, in the expedition spoken of by Isaiah, xx. It was again ravaged by Camby-ses, 525 B. C., and, after a siege of three years, finally destroyed by Ptolemy Lathyrus, 81 B. C. Its ruins attest the truth of prophecy.]

NOAH, the son of Lamech. Amidst the general corruption of the human race, Noah only was found righteous. Gen. vi. 9. He therefore “found grace in the sight of the Lord,” and was directed for his preservation to make an ark, the shape and dimensions of which were prescribed by the Lord. In A. M. 1656, and in the six hundredth year of his age, Noah, by Divine appointment, entered his ark with his family, and all the animals collected for the renewal of the world. (See DELUGE.) After the ark had stranded, and the earth was in a measure dried, Noah offered a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord, of the pure animals that were in the ark; and the Lord was pleased to accept of his offering, and to give him assurance that he would no more destroy the world by water. Gen. ix. He gave Noah power over all the brute creation, and permitted him to kill and eat of them, as of the herbs and fruits of the earth, except the blood, the use of which was prohibited. After the deluge Noah lived three hundred and fifty years; and the whole time of his life having been nine hundred and fifty years, he died, A. M. 2006. According to common opinion, he divided the earth among his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth. To Shem he gave Asia, to Ham Africa, and to Japheth Europe. Some will have it, that beside these three sons, he had several others. St. Peter calls Noah a preacher of righteousness, because before the deluge he was incessantly preaching and declaring to men, not only by his discourses, but by the building of the ark, in which he was employed a hundred and twenty years, that the cloud of Divine vengeance was about to burst upon them. But his faithful ministry produced no effect, since, when the deluge came, it found mankind practicing their usual enormities. Matt. xxiv. 37. Several learned men have observed that the heathens confounded Saturn, Deucalion, Ogyges, the god Cœlus or Ouranus, Janus, Protheus, Prometheus, etc., with Noah. The fable of Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha is manifestly drawn from the history of Noah. The rabbins pretend that God gave Noah and his sons certain general precepts, which contain, according to them, the natural duties which are common to all men indifferently, and the observation of which alone will be sufficient to save them. After the law of Moses was given, the Hebrews would not suffer any stranger to dwell in their country, unless he would conform to the precepts of Noah. In war they put to death without quarter all who were ignorant of them. These precepts are seven in number: the first was against the worship of idols; the second, against blasphemy, and required to bless the name of God; the third, against murder; the fourth, against incest and all uncleanness; the fifth, against theft and rapine; the sixth required the administration of justice; the seventh was against eating flesh with life. But the antiquity of these precepts is doubted, since no mention of them is made in the Scripture, or in the writings of Josephus, or in Philo; and none of the ancient fathers knew any thing of them.

[NOB. A city of the priests, the inhabitants of which were destroyed by Saul for entertaining David. 1 Sam. xxii.]

[NOCTURN. A night service, particularly that performed between 12 and 3 A. M. Also a portion of the Psalter consisting of nine psalms.]

NOD, LAND OF, the country to which Cain withdrew after the murder of Abel. As the precise situation of this country cannot possibly be known, so it has given rise to much ingenious speculation. All that we are told of it is, that it was “on the east of Eden,” or, as it may be rendered, “before Eden;” which very country of Eden is no sure guide for us, as the situation of that also is disputed. But be it on the higher or lower Euphrates, (see EDEN,) the land of Nod which stood before it with respect to the place where Moses wrote may still preserve the curse of barrenness passed on it for Cain's sake, namely, in the deserts of Syria or Arabia. The Chaldee interpreters render the word Nad not as the proper name of a country, but as an appellation applied to Cain himself, signifying a vagabond or fugitive, and read, "He dwelt a fugitive in the land." But the Hebrew reads expressly, "He dwelt in the land of Nad." [Gen. iv. 16. Nad, in verses 12, 14, is rendered vagabond, that is, wanderer: Nad was therefore the land of banishment, or of the vagrant.]

[NOETIANS. Followers of Noëtus, a philosopher of Ephesus. Hippolytus, who refuted his opinions, says he published them about A. D. 220—Basnage says 240. He said that he was Moses, and his brother was Aaron: and taught that Christ was the Father himself. See SABELLIANS.]

[NOMINALISTS. Schoolmen who held that words or names only are universal, in opposition to the Realists, who held that universal ideas have a real existence. Roscelinus, the master of Abeland, introduced nominalism into the schools in the twelfth century. It was opposed by Albertus Magnus, Aquinas, Scotus, and others, and in the fifteenth century condemned by an edict of Louis XI. of France. The controversy in reference to it was carried to an absurd extent, particularly in the controversies on grace and free-will.]

NONCONFORMISTS. Dissenters from the Church of England; but the term applies more particularly to those ministers who were ejected from their livings by the Act of Uniformity in 1562—the number of whom, according to Dr. Calamy, was nearly two thousand—and to the laity who adhered to them. The celebrated Mr. Locke says, "Bartholomew-day (the day fixed by the Act of Uniformity) was fatal to our Church and religion, by throwing out a very great number of worthy, learned, pious, and orthodox divines, who could not come up to this and other things in that act. And it is worth your knowledge, that so great was the zeal in carrying on this Church affair, and so blind was the obedience required, that if you compare the time of passing the act with the time allowed for the clergy to subscribe the book of Common Prayer thereby established, you shall plainly find it could not be printed and distributed so as one man in forty could have seen and read the book before they did so perfectly assent and consent thereto."

By this act the clergy were required to subscribe, ex animo, [sincerely,] their "assent and consent to all and every thing contained in the book of Common Prayer," which had never before been insisted on so rigidly as to deprive them of their livings and livelihood. Several other acts were passed about this time, very oppressive both to the clergy and laity. In the preceding year, 1661, the Corporation Act incapacitated all persons from offices of trust and honor in a corporation who did not receive the sacrament in the Established Church. The Conventicle Act, in 1663 and 1670 forbade the attendance at conventicles; that is, at places of worship other than the Establishment, where more than five adults were present beside the resident family; and that under penalties of fine and imprisonment by the sentence of magistrates without a jury. The Oxford Act of 1665 banished nonconforming ministers five miles from any corporate town sending members to parliament, and prohibited them from keeping or teaching schools. The Test Act of the same year required all persons accepting any office under government to receive the sacrament in the Established Church.

Such were the dreadful consequences of this intolerant spirit, that it is supposed that near eight thousand died in prison in the reign of Charles II. It is said that Mr. Jeremiah White had carefully collected a list of those who had suffered between Charles II. and the revolution, which amounted to sixty thousand. The same persecutions were carried on in Scotland; and there, as well as in England, numbers, to avoid the persecution, left their country. But, notwithstanding all these dreadful and furious attacks upon the Dissenters, they were not extirpated. Their very persecution was in their favor. The infamous character of their informers and persecutors; their piety, zeal, and fortitude, no doubt, had influence on considerate minds; and, indeed, they had additions from the Established Church, which several clergymen in this reign deserted as a persecuting Church, and took their lot among them. King William coming to the throne, the famous Toleration Act passed, by which they were exempted from suffering the penalties above mentioned, and permission was given them to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. In the reign of George III. the Act for the Protection of Religious Worship superseded the Act of Toleration by still more liberal provisions in favor of religious liberty; and in the last reign [1828] the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed.

[NON-JURORS. Those who refused to swear allegiance to William and Mary. Eight bishops and four hundred other clergy were deposed for their refusal. They held that sovereigns must never be resisted—that their hereditary succession is of Divine institution—that the Church in spiritual matters is subject to God alone—that William's bishops were intruders, schismatics, and rebels, the deposed prelates alone being the true bishops of the sees from which they had been ejected. The Jacobite movements, in which they bore a conspicuous part, are largely detailed in Macaulay's History of England. Most of the non-jurors admitted the claims of the substituted bishops after the decease of those who had been deposed. The Scottish Episcopalians were non-jurors: from them Dr. Seabury, the first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, received his episcopal orders. See HIGH-CHURCH.]

NOPH. Memphis, a celebrated city of Egypt, and, till the time of the Ptolomies, who removed to Alexandria, the residence of the ancient kings of Egypt. It stood above the dividing of the river Nile, where the Delta begins. Toward the south of this city stood the famous pyramids, two of which were esteemed the wonder of the world; and in this city was fed the ox Apis, which Cambyzes slew, in contempt of the Egypt-tians, who worshipped it as a deity. The kings of Egypt took much pleasure in adorning this city; and it continued in all its beauty till the Arabians made a conquest of Egypt under Caliph Omar. The general who took it built another city near it, named Fustat, merely because his tent had been a long time set up in that place; and the Fatimite caliphs, when they became masters of Egypt, added another to it, which is known to us at this day by the name of Grand Cairo. This occasioned the utter decay of Memphis, and led to the fulfilment of the prophecy, that it should be "waste and without inhabitant." The prophets often speak of this city, and fortell the miseries it was to suffer from the kings of Chaldea and Persia, Isaiah xix. 13: Jer. xlv. 1; xlv. 14, 19: Hosea ix. 6: Ezek. xxx. 13, 16.

[The Hebrew Noph is preserved in the hieroglyphic Men-Nophir, followed by a pyramid—Noph, Hos. ix. 6, is preserved in Memphis. The city seems to have covered the whole space between the pyramids of Ghizeh and those of Sakkarah. In the twelfth century the ruins were described as extending nine miles in every direction. Mention is made of statues of wonderful beauty and size—one consisting of a single block of red granite, forty-five feet high; another thirteen and a half feet high, twelve feet long, and seven broad, covered with inscriptions. This was the seat of the worship of Apis. An immense number of mummies have been found here, some of them three thousand years old. The pyramids are the centres of this great Necropolis, showing that they were erected for royal sepulchres. This opinion is sustained by Dr. Olin, who gives a satisfactory description of these wonderful monuments, and of the sphinx adjacent. He spent a day "among the extensive but shapeless and unintelligible ruins of Memphis," and says, "This city, the foundation of which is ascribed to Menes, 2200 years B. C., was probably the capital of Egypt in the time of the captivity and exodus of the Israelites. It was for many ages—many thousands of years, according to the Egyptian annals—the seat of empire; and when visited by Strabo, a little before the commencement of our era, was only second to Alexandria, itself the only rival of Rome in extent and population. So complete is now the desolation of this great metropolis, that men hold learned controversies about the spot where it stood; and they appeal to the tombs where the dead were buried in the neighboring desert, and not to the habitations reared for living men, for evidence to settle this still vexed question. 'Thus saith the Lord God, I will also destroy the idols, and I will cause their images to cease out of Noph,' Ezek. xxx. 13—'Noph shall be waste and desolate, without an inhabitant,' Jer. xlv. 19—is the language of prophecy concerning this great city, uttered when she was at the height of her wealth and power."]

[NOSE-JEWELS. See JEWELS.]

[NOTARIES. Reporters of sermons, trials of martyrs, acts of councils, etc., in the primitive Church.]

[NOTES OF THE CHURCH. Marks by which the true Church may be known. Four signs, taken from the Nicene Creed, are usually adduced: unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. Luther assigns uncorrupted preaching of the gospel, with the administration of baptism, the Lord's Supper, and the keys; a legitimate ministry; public service in a known tongue; and tribulations, internal and external. Calvin says, truth of doctrine and right administration of sacraments. Bellarmine: catholicity, antiquity, duration, amplitude, episcopal succession, apostolical agreement, unity, sanctity of doctrine, efficacy of doctrine, holiness of life, miracles, prophecy, admission of adversaries, unhappy end of enemies, and temporal felicity. Jeremy Taylor gives antiquity, duration, succession of bishops, union of members among themselves and with Christ, and sanctity of doctrine.]

NOVATIANS, the followers of Novatian, a priest of Rome, and of Novatus, a priest of Carthage, in the third century. They were distinguished merely by their discipline; for their religious and doctrinal tenets do not appear to be at all different from those of the Church. They condemned second marriages, and for ever excluded from their communion all those who after baptism had fallen into sin. They affected very superior purity; and, though they conceived that the worst might possibly hope for eternal life, they absolutely refused to readmit into their communion any who had lapsed into sin. They separated from the Church of Rome because the members of it admitted into their communion many who had, during a season of persecution, rejected the Christian faith. [As Cornelius, who was elected bishop of Rome, was more lenient to the lapsed, Novatian caused himself to be elected bishop of that see, and consecrated by three bishops of Italy. The claims of the two rivals being submitted to Cyprian, he declared in favor of Cornelius, whereupon Novatian formed a new sect, called Cathari or Puritans. They were excommunicated by a council at Rome, and the first council of Antioch was summoned against them. In after-times they relaxed their discipline so as to grant absolution to all but the greatest offenders.]

[NOVICE. A catechumen.—Also a probationer for a conventual life.]

[NUMBER OF THE BEAST. Rev. xiii. 18. Irenæus says, "The name Lateinos contains the number of six hundred and sixty-six." He thought that the last kingdom was so called because the Latins then reigned. The Church of Rome is Lateinos throughout; and it has been observed that the numerals of the Hebrew Romiith, as well as those of Lateinos, make "the Number of the Beast." Other names, however, have been selected as containing the mystical number; e. g., Mahomet, Martin Luther, and Buonaparte.]

NUMBERS, a canonical book of the Old Testament, being the fourth of the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses; and receives its denomination from the numbering of the families of Israel by Moses and Aaron, who mustered the tribes and marshalled the army of the Hebrews in their passage through the wilderness. A great part of this book is historical, relating several remarkable events which happened in that journey, and also mentioning various of their journeyings in the wilderness. This book comprehends the history of about thirty-eight years, though the greater part of the things recorded fell out in the first and last of those years; and it does not appear when those things were done which are recorded in the middle of the book. See PENTATEUCH.

[NUN. Some derive nonna from the Ægypto-Greek νοῦς, a virgin. The word was first used by Jerome. Some think it equivalent to matron and holy widow. The nonne were called virgins of God, or of Christ, handmaidens of God, and sisters of the Church. They were set apart by solemn ceremonies, and sometimes supported by the Church. After the order of deaconesses became extinct, which was about the fifth century, they performed many of the offices which the deaconesses had previously performed. Their profession of virginity was not so strict as to make it criminal to marry afterward. In the Romish Church, the candidate, after passing through her novitiate, is brought to the bishop, and after putting on her new habit, she says on her knees, Ancilla Christi sum, etc.: the bishop then puts a veil on her, and also a ring, by which she is married to Christ, and finally the crown of virginity. He then pronounces an anathema on any who shall attempt to make her break her vows.]

[NUNCIO. An ambassador sent by the pope to a foreign country. He anciently acted in England as appellate judge in ecclesiastical matters.]

NURSE. The nurse in an eastern family is always an important personage. Modern travellers inform us that in Syria she is considered as a sort of second parent, whether she has been foster-mother or otherwise. She always accompanies the bride to her husband's house, and ever remains there an honored character. Thus it was in ancient Greece. This will serve to explain Genesis xxiv. 59: "And they sent away Rebekah their sister, and her nurse." In Hindostan the nurse is not looked upon as a stranger, but becomes one of the family, and passes the remainder of her life in the midst of the children she has suckled, by whom she is honored and cherished as a second mother. In many parts of Hindostan are mosques and mausoleums, built by the Mohammedan princes, near the sepulchres of their nurses. They are excited by a grateful affection to erect these structures in memory of those who with maternal anxiety watched over their helpless infancy: thus it has been from time immemorial.

[NUTS. The botnim of Gen. xlii. 11, are supposed to have been pistachio nuts, which are numerous and excellent in Palestine. The word egoz, Cant. vi. 11, is rendered nuts in the LXX., Vulgate, and other versions: some think it means walnuts; others, any kind of nuts; others, instead of a "garden of nuts," render hortos putatos, a garden kept in order by pruning.]

[NYMPHÆUM. A fountain in the atrium of an ancient church, where the people washed their hands and faces before they entered. The practice was imitated from the pagans: the Papists claim it as a precedent for their holy water ceremonies.]

OAK. The religious veneration paid to this tree by the original natives of our island in the time of the Druids is well known to every reader of British history. We have reason to think that this veneration was brought from the east; and that the Druids did no more than transfer the sentiments their progenitors had received in oriental countries. It should appear that the patriarch Abraham resided under an oak, or a grove of oaks, which our translators render the plain of Mamre; and that he planted a grove of this tree. Gen. xiii. 18. In fact, since in hot countries nothing is more desirable than shade, nothing more refreshing than the shade of a tree, we may easily suppose the inhabitants would resort for such enjoyment to

A deeper, darker shade."

Oaks, and groves of oaks, were esteemed proper places for religious services: altars were set up under them, Joshua xxiv. 26; and, probably, in the east as well as in the west, appointments to meet at conspicuous oaks were made, and many affairs were transacted or treated of under their shade, as we read in Homer, Theocritus, and other poets. It was common among the Hebrews to sit under oaks, Judges vi. 11: 1 Kings xiii. 14: Jacob buried idolatrous images under an oak, Gen. xxxv. 4; and Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried under one of these trees, Gen. xxxv. 8. See 1 Chron. x. 12. Abimelech was made king under an oak, Judges ix. 6. Idolatry was practiced under oaks, Isaiah i. 29; lviii. 5 Hosea iv. 13. Idols were made of oaks, Isa. xlv. 14.

[There are two Hebrew words rendered oak in our version. Allon—Gen. xxxv. 8: Judg. ix. 6: Isa. ii. 13; vi. 13; xlv. 14: Hos. iv. 13—is supposed to mean oak, and many species of the quercus are found in Palestine: the land of Bashan is still famous for this tree. The word is rendered plain in our version of Gen. xii. 6, xiii. 18; but oak in the LXX. Ailah, rendered teal in Isa. vi. 13, elm in Hos. iv. 13, and oak in Gen. xxxv. 4: Josh. xxiv. 26: Judg. vi. 11, 19: 2 Sam. xviii. 9, 14: Isa. i. 30, is generally considered the terebinth. This tree abounds in the Holy Land—where it is called the butm. Robinson describes it as deciduous, bearing small flowers and small oval berries, "hanging," he says, "in clusters from two to five inches long, resembling much the clusters of the vine when the grapes are just set. From incisions in the trunk there is said to flow a sort of transparent balsam, constituting a very pure and fine species of turpentine, with an agreeable odor like citron or jessamine and a mild taste, and hardening gradually into a transparent gum. This tree is found in Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, the south of France, Spain, and in the north of Africa; and is described as not usually rising to the height of more than twenty feet. It often exceeded that size, as we saw it on the mountains; but in the plains it was very much larger."]

OATH, a solemn invocation of a superior Power, admitted to be acquainted with all the secrets of our hearts, with our inward thoughts as well as our outward actions, to witness the truth of what we assert, and to inflict his vengeance upon us if we assert what is not true, or promise what we do not mean to perform. Almost all nations, whether savage or civilized, whether enjoying the light of revelation or led only by the light of reason, knowing the importance of truth, and willing to obtain a barrier against falsehood, have had recourse to oaths, by which they have endeavored to make men fearful of uttering lies, under the dread of an avenging Deity. Among Christians, an oath is a solemn appeal for the truth of our assertions, the sincerity of our promises, and the fidelity of our engagements, to the one only God, the Judge of the whole earth, who is everywhere present, and sees and hears and knows whatever is said or done or thought in any part of the world. Such is that Being whom Christians, when they take an oath, invoke to bear testimony to the truth of their words and the integrity of their hearts. Surely, then, if oaths be a matter of so much moment, it well behooves us not to treat them with levity, nor ever to take them without due consideration. Hence we ought, with the utmost vigilance, to abstain from mingling oaths in our ordinary discourse, and from associating the name of God with low or disgusting images, or using it on trivial occasions, as not only a profane levity in itself, but tending to destroy that reverence for the Supreme Majesty which ought to prevail in society, and to dwell in our own hearts.

"The forms of oaths," says Dr. Paley, "like other religious ceremonies, have in all ages been various; consisting, however, for the most part of some bodily action, and of a prescribed form of words." Among the Jews, the juror held up his right hand toward heaven. Psalm cxliv. 8: Rev. x. 5. The same form is retained in Scotland still. Among the Jews, also, an oath of fidelity was taken by the servant's putting his hand under the thigh of his lord. Genesis xxiv. 2. Among the Greeks and Romans, the form varied with the subject and occasion of the oath: in private contracts, the parties took hold of each other's hands, while they swore to the performance; or they touched the altar of the god by whose divinity they swore: upon more solemn occasions, it was the custom to slay a victim; and the beast being struck down with certain ceremonies and invocations, gave birth to the expression, ferire pactum, and to our English phrase, translated from this, of "striking a bargain." The form of oaths in Christian countries is also very different; but in no country in the world worse contrived, either to convey the meaning or impress the obligation of an oath, than in our own. The juror with us, after repeating the promise or affirmation which the oath is intended to confirm, adds, "So help me God;" or, more frequently, the substance of the oath is repeated to the juror by the magistrate, who adds in the conclusion, "So help you God." The energy of this sentence resides in the particle so: So, that is, hæc lege, upon condition of my speaking the truth, or performing this promise, and not otherwise, may God help me! The juror, while he hears or repeats the words of the oath, holds his right hand upon a Bible, or other book containing the Gospels, and at the conclusion kisses the book. This obscure and elliptical form, together with the levity and frequency of them, has brought about a general inadvertency to the obligation of oaths, which, both in a religious and political view, is much to be lamented; and it merits public consideration, whether the requiring of oaths upon so many frivolous occasions, especially in the customs, and in the qualification for petty offices, has any other effect than to make such sanctions cheap in the minds of the people. A pound of tea cannot travel regularly from the ship to the consumer, without costing half a dozen oaths at least; and the same security for the due discharge of their office, namely, that of an oath, is required from a churchwarden and an archbishop; from a petty constable and the chief justice of England. Oaths, however, are lawful; and, whatever be the form, the signification is the same. Historians have justly remarked, that when the reverence for an oath began to diminish among the Romans, and the loose epicurean system, which discarded the belief of providence, was introduced, the Roman honor and prosperity from that period began to decline. The Quakers refuse to swear upon any occasion, founding their scruples concerning the lawfulness of oaths upon our Saviour's prohibition, "Swear not at all." Matt. v. 34. But it seems our Lord there referred to the vicious, wanton, and unauthorized swearing in common discourse, and not to judicial oaths; for he himself answered, when interrogated, upon oath. Matt. xxvi. 63, 64: Mark xiv. 61. The Apostle Paul also makes use of expressions which contain the nature of oaths. Romans i. 9: 1 Cor. xv. 31: 2 Cor. i. 18: Gal. i. 20: Heb. vi. 13-17. The administration of oaths supposes that God will punish false swearing with more severity than a simple lie, or breach of promise; for which belief there are the following reasons: 1. Perjury is a sin of greater deliberation. 2. It violates a superior confidence. 3. God directed the Israelites to swear by his name, Deut. vi. 13; x. 20; and was pleased to confirm his covenant with that people by an oath; neither of which, it is probable, he would have done, had he not intended to represent oaths as having some meaning and effect beyond the obligation of a bare promise.

OBADIAH the prophet is thought to have been the same as the governor of Ahab's house, 1 Kings xviii. 3, etc.; and some are of opinion he was that Obadiah whom Josiah made overseer of the works of the temple. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12. Indeed, the age in which this prophet lived is very uncertain. Some think that he was contemporary with Hosea, Amos, and Joel; while others are of opinion that he lived in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and that he delivered his prophecy about B. C. 585, soon after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. His book, which consists of a single chapter, is written with great beauty and elegance, and contains predictions of the utter destruction of the Edomites, and of the future restoration and prosperity of the Jews. [Various persons of this name are mentioned in 1 Kings xviii.: 1 Chron. iii. 21; vii. 8; viii. 38; ix. 16, 44; xii.

[OBED. David's grandfather. Ruth iv. 17: Matt. i. 5: Luke iii. 32.]

OBED-EDOM, son of Jeduthun, a Levite, 1 Chron. xvi. 38, and the father of Shemasah and others. 1 Chron. xvi. 5. We learn that the Lord blessed this man exceedingly, on account of the ark resting under his roof. 2 Sam. vi. 10, 11. David having removed the ark to the place he had previously prepared for its reception, Obed-edom and his sons were appointed to be keepers of the doors of the temple. 1 Chron. xv. 18, 21. Obed-edom is called the Gittite, probably because he was of Gathrimmon, a city of the Levites beyond Jordan. Joshua xxi. 24, 25.

ODED, a prophet of the Lord, who, being at Samaria when the Israelites of the ten tribes returned from the war with their King Pekah, together with two hundred thousand of the people of Judah, whom they had taken captive, went out to meet them; and through his remonstrances the captives were liberated. 2 Chron. xxviii. This circumstance is all that is recorded concerning Oded.

[OFFENCE. Σκάνδαλον. This word literally means, the tricker of a trap—a snare, or stumbling-block. It is applied to whatever hinders men from becoming the disciples of Christ, or tempts them to apostatize from the faith after they have embraced it. The noun and corresponding verb are used in this sense in Matt. v. 29, 30; xiii. 41; xvi. 23; xvii. 27; xviii. 6: Luke xvii. 1: John vi. 61: Rom. ix. 33; xi. 9; xiv. 13: 1 Cor. viii. 13: 1 John ii. 10: Rev. ii. 14. The passive verb, meaning to be offended, in this sense, is found in Matt. xi. 6; xii. 21, 57; xv. 12; xxiv. 10; xxvi. 31, 38: Mark vi. 3; xiv. 27: Rom. xiv. 21: 2 Cor. xi. 29. Men make the cross an offence by their perverseness. 1 Cor. i. 23: Gal. v. 11.]

OFFERINGS. Among the Jews, under the Mosaic law, a variety of offerings of different kinds were appointed, which are accurately and fully described in the beginning of the book of Leviticus.

Burnt-offerings, or holocausts, sacrifices in which the victims were wholly consumed, were expiatory, and more ancient than any others, and were, for that reason, held in special honor. It was in consideration of these circumstances that Moses gave precepts in regard to this kind of sacrifices first. Lev. i. 3. Holocausts might be offered by means of the Hebrew priests, when brought by the heathen, or those who had originated from another nation; such persons being unable to offer sin or trespass-offerings, since this sort of sacrifices had particular reference to some neglect or violation of the Mosaic law, by whose authority they did not acknowledge themselves bound. Holocausts were expiatory, and we accordingly find that they were offered sometimes for the whole people—for instance, the morning and the evening sacrifices—and sometimes by an individual for himself alone, either from the free impulse of his feelings, or in fulfilment of a vow. Psalm li. 19; lxxvi. 13, 14. They were required to be offered under certain combinations of circumstances pointed out in the Mosaic laws; namely, by a Nazarite, who had been unexpectedly rendered unclean, or who had completed the days of his separation, Num. vi. 11–16; by those who had been healed of leprosy; and by women after childbirth. Lev. xii. 6, 8. The victims immolated at a holocaust were bullocks of three years old, goats and lambs of a year old, turtle-doves and young pigeons. Not only the parts which were expressly destined for the altar, but also the other parts of the victims, were burned. A libation of wine was poured out upon the altar. It was the practice among the Gentile nations—an allusion to which occurs in Phil. ii. 17, and 2 Tim. iv. 6—to pour the wine out between the horns of the victims which they immolated to their idols. The priests partially wrung or cut off the heads of the turtle-doves and young pigeons, sprinkled the blood on the side of the altar, plucked out the feathers and the crop, and cast them to the east of the altar into the place for the reception of ashes, and placed the remainder, after having cleft or broken the wings, upon the fire. Lev. i. 3–17.

Drink-offerings. With a bullock, half a hin of wine, with three-tenth deals of flour, and half a hin of oil. With a ram, one-third of a hin of wine, with two-tenth deals of flour, and one-third of a hin of oil. With a lamb or a kid of the goats, one-quarter of a hin of wine, one-tenth deal of flour, and one-quarter of a hin of oil. With a sheaf of the first-fruits, one-quarter of a hin of wine, one-tenth deal of flour, with oil.

Meat-offerings. These, like the drink-offerings, were appendages to the sacrifices. They were of thin cakes or wafers. In some instances they were offered alone.

Heave-offerings. So called from the sacrifice being lifted up toward heaven, in token of its being devoted to Jehovah.

Peace-offerings. Bullocks, heifers, goats, rams, and sheep, were the only animals sacrificed on these occasions. Lev. iii. 1–17; vii. 23–27. These sacrifices, which were offered as an indication of gratitude, were accompanied with unleavened cakes, covered with oil, by pouring it upon them; with thin cakes or wafers, likewise unleavened, and besmeared with oil; also with another kind of cakes, made of fine meal, and kneaded with oil. The priest, who sprinkled the blood, presented one of each of these kinds of cakes as an offering. Lev. vii. 11–14, 28–35. The remainder of the animal substance and of the cakes was converted by the person who made the offering into an entertainment, to which widows, orphans, the poor, slaves, and Levites were invited. What was not eaten on the day of the offering might be reserved till the succeeding; but that which remained till the third was to be burned: a regulation which was made in order to prevent the omission or putting off of the season of this benevolence and joy. Lev. vii. 15–21: Deut. xii. 18. This feast could be celebrated beyond the limits of the tabernacle, or temple, but not beyond the city.

Sin-offerings were for expiation of particular sins, or legal imperfections—called, therefore, sin-offerings: the first sort were for sins of ignorance or surprise, either from the high-priest, or body of the community, from the rulers, or any one of the common people. The other sort of sin-offerings were for voluntary sins; but as to the more capital violations of the moral law, as murder, adultery, or the worship of idols, no expiatory sacrifice was admitted.

Trespass-offerings were not required of the people as a body. They were to be offered by individuals, who, through ignorance, mistake, or want of reflection, had neglected some of the ceremonial precepts of Moses, or some of those natural laws which had been introduced into his code, and sanctioned with the penalty of death, and who were subsequently conscious of their error. The person who, being sworn as a witness, concealed the truth by keeping silent: the man who, having become contaminated without knowing it, had omitted purification, but had afterward become acquainted with the fact: the person who had rashly sworn to do a thing, and had not done it—all these delinquents offered a lamb or kid, or, in case of poverty, two doves or young pigeons, the one for a trespass, the other for a sin-offering. In case the person was unusually poor, he was required to offer merely the tenth part of an ephah of fine meal, without oil or frankincense. Lev. iii. 1-16. Whoever appropriated to himself any thing consecrated, or any thing that was promised, or found, or stolen, or deposited in his possession for keeping; whoever swore falsely, or omitted to restore the goods that belonged to another, or injured him in any other way, presented for his trespass a ram, which had been submitted to the estimation of the priest, and not only made restitution, but allowed an additional amount of a fifth part by way of indemnification. He who had committed fornication with a betrothed handmaid, previously to her being redeemed from servitude, offered a ram for the trespass. Lev. xix. 20-22. Nazarites, who had been unexpectedly rendered unclean, presented a lamb of a year old. Num. vi. 11. Finally, lepers, when restored to health, and purified, sacrificed a ram. Lev. xiv. 10-14. The ceremonies were the same as in the sin-offerings.

Wave-offering. It was so called because it was waved up and down, and toward the east, west, north, and south, to signify that he to whom it was offered was Lord of the universe, the God who fills all space, and to whom all things of right belong. See SACRIFICES.

OG, a king of Bashan; being a giant of the race of the Rephaim. Moses records the conquest of Og, and his destruction. After which his country was given to the tribe of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. Num. xxi. 33. See GIANTS.

OIL, זַיִת. The invention and use of oil is of the highest antiquity. It is said that Jacob poured oil upon the pillar which he erected at Bethel. Gen. xxviii. 18. The earliest kind was that which is extracted from olives. Before the invention of mills, this was obtained by pounding them in a mortar, Exod. xxvii. 20; and sometimes by treading them with the feet in the same manner as were grapes. Deut. xxxiii. 24: Micah vi. 15. The Hebrews used common oil with their food, in their meat-offerings, for burning in their lamps, etc. As vast quantities of oil were made by the ancient Jews, it became an article of exportation. The great demand for it in Egypt led the Jews to send it thither. The prophet Hosea thus upbraids his degenerate nation with the servility and folly of their conduct: "Ephraim feedeth on wind, and followeth after the east wind: he daily increaseth falsehood and vanity; and a league is made with Assyria, and oil carried into Egypt." Hosea xii. 1. The Israelites, in the decline of their national glory, carried the produce of their olive plantations into Egypt as a tribute to their ancient oppressors, or as a present to conciliate their favor, and obtain their assistance in the sanguinary wars which they were often compelled to wage with the neighboring states. There was an unguent, very precious and sacred, used in anointing the priests, the tabernacle, and furniture. This was compounded of spicy drugs, namely, myrrh, sweet cinnamon, sweet calamus, and cassia, mixed with oil-olive.

OLIVES. The Mount of Olives was situated to the east of Jerusalem, and divided from the city only by the brook Kidron, and by the valley of Jehoshaphat, which stretches out from the north to the south. It was upon this mount that Solomon built temples to the gods of the Ammonites, 1 Kings xi. 7, and the Moabites, out of complaisance to his wives of those nations. Hence it is that the Mount of Olives is called the mountain of corruption. 2 Kings xxiii. 13. The Mount of Olives forms part of a ridge of limestone hills, extending to the north and the south-west. Pococke describes it as having four summits. On the lowest and most northerly of these, which, he tells us, is called Sulman Tashy, the stone of Solomon, there is a large, domed sepulchre, and several other Mohammedan tombs. The ascent to this point, which is to the north-east of the city, he describes as very gradual, through pleasant corn-fields, planted with olive trees. The second summit is that which overlooks the city: the path to it rises from the ruined gardens of Gethsemane, which occupy part of the valley. About half-way up the ascent is a ruined monastery, built, as the monks tell us, on the spot where our Saviour wept over Jerusalem. From this point the spectator enjoys, perhaps, the best view of the holy city. On reaching the summit, an extensive view is obtained toward the east, embracing the fertile plain of Jericho, watered by the Jordan and the Dead Sea, enclosed by mountains of considerable grandeur. Here there is a small village, surrounded by some tolerable corn land. This summit is not relatively high, and would more properly be termed a hill than a mountain: it is not above two miles distant from Jerusalem. At a short distance from the summit is shown the supposed print of our Saviour's left foot; Chateaubriand says, the mark of the right was once visible; and Bernard de Breidenbach saw it in 1483! This is the spot fixed upon by the mother of Constantine as that from which our Lord ascended, and over which she accordingly erected a church and monastery, the ruins of which still remain. Pococke describes the building, which was standing in his time, as a small Gothic chapel, round within, and octagonal without, and tells us that it was converted into a mosque. The Turks, for a stipulated sum, permit the Christian pilgrims to take an impression of the footprint, in wax or plaster, to carry home. "Twice," says Dr. Richardson, "I visited this memorable spot, and each time it was crowded with devout pilgrims, taking casts of the holy vestige. They had to purchase permission of the Turks; but had it not been in the possession of the Turks, they would have had to purchase it from the more mercenary and not less merciless Romans or Greeks." On ascension eve the Christians come and encamp in the court, and that night they perform the offices of the ascension. Here, however, as with regard to Calvary and almost all the supposed sacred places, superstition has blindly followed the blind. That this is not the place of the ascension, is certain from the words of St. Luke, who says that our Lord led out his disciples "as far as Bethany, and lifted up his hands, and blessed them. And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven." Luke xxiv. 50-52. Bethany is a small village to the east of the Mount of Olives, on the road to Jericho, not farther from Jerusalem than the pinnacle of the hill. There are two roads to it: one passes over the Mount of Olives; the other, which is the shorter and easier, winds round the eastern end, having the greater part of the hill on the north or left hand, and on the right the elevation called by some writers the Mount of Offence, which is, however, very little above the valley of Jehoshaphat. The village of Bethany is small and poor, and the cultivation of the soil is much neglected; but it is a pleasant and somewhat romantic spot, sheltered by Mount Olivet on the north, and abounding with trees and long grass. The inhabitants are Arabs.

The olive is still found growing in patches at the foot of the mount to which it gives its name; and "as a spontaneous produce, uninterruptedly resulting from the original growth of this part of the mountain, it is impossible," says Dr. E. D. Clarke, "to view even these trees with indifference." Titus cut down all the wood in the neighborhood of Jerusalem; but there would seem to have been constantly springing up a succession of these hardy trees. "It is truly a curious and interesting fact," adds the learned traveller, "that, during a period of little more than two thousand years, Hebrews, Assyrians, Romans, Moslems, and Christians, have been successively in possession of the rocky mountains of Palestine; yet the olive still vindicates its paternal soil, and is found at this day upon the same spot which was called by the Hebrew writers Mount Olivet and the Mount of Olives, eleven centuries before the Christian era." 2 Sam. xv. 30: Zech. xiv. 4.

[Mount Olivet is called by the Arabs Jebel-et-Thûr. Its central peak, according to Schubert, is 175 Paris feet higher than the highest point of Zion, 416 feet above the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and 2556 feet above the level of the sea. The best descriptions of this sacred locality will be found in the works of Robinson, Olin, and Bartlett: the elegant engravings of Mr. Bartlett represent every point of interest connected with the holy city. "The summit of Olivet, and its west side, which looks toward Jerusalem," says Olin, "are scantily covered with ancient olive trees. There are also a few pomegranate and fig trees, and several fields, some in wheat, which had, however, a most unpromising appearance. The top is occupied by the church of the Ascension, built in commemoration of the event from which it derives its name. It is occupied by the Latins." The Armenians, some years since, repaired the church, and built a convent near by; but the jealous Latins obtained a firman from the Porte, it is said, through French interference, for its suppression, and it was accordingly razed to the ground. "The Garden of Gethsemane occupies a level space between the brook Kidron and the foot of the Mount of Olives. It is about fifty paces square, and is enclosed by a wall of no great height, formed of rough loose stones. Eight very ancient olive trees now occupy this enclosure, some of which are of very large size, and all exhibiting symptoms of decay that denote their great age. This garden belongs to one of the monastic establishments, and considerable care is taken to preserve the trees from destruction. Several young trees have been planted to supply the place of those which have disappeared. There can be no reasonable doubt, I think," continues Dr. Olin, "that this is the real Garden of Gethsemane. It was probably once more extensive than at present, but it must have occupied this situation. The nature of the ground sufficiently determines the route which must have always been pursued in passing from the temple to the Mount of Olives. The path now used has every appearance of great antiquity, and this is the only place where the descent to the channel of Kidron could be effected with any tolerable convenience." "Immediately opposite to this group of trees," says Mr. Bartlett, "is a descent by steps to the singularly picturesque front of an extensive cavern, commonly called the Tomb of the Virgin." Lamartine gives a poetical description of an adjoining cavern called the Grotto of Gethsemane. From the bridge over the Kidron there is a circuitous path on the left, where the hill has a gradual slope, leading to the summit—there is a footpath leading in a direct course to the same point—and also a more southern path from which a branch leads across the Jewish cemetery, below which, at the bottom of the valley, are the so-called tombs of Absalom and Zechariah. The apparent contradiction between Luke xxiv. 50-52, and Acts i. 9-12, is thus reconciled by Dr. Lightfoot: "The first space from the city was called Bethphage, which I have cleared elsewhere from Talmudic authors, the evangelists themselves also confirming it. That part of that mount was known by that name to the length of about a Sabbath-day's journey, till it came to that part which is called Bethany. For there was a Bethany, a tract of the mount, and the town of Bethany. The town was distant from the city about fifteen furlongs, i. e., about two miles, or a double Sabbath-day's journey; but the first border of this tract, (which also bore the name of Bethany,) was distant but one mile, or a single Sabbath-day's journey. Our Saviour led out his disciples, when he was about to ascend, to the very first region or tract of Mount Olivet, which was called Bethany, and was distant from the city a Sabbath-day's journey. And so far from the city did that tract extend itself which was called Bethphage; and when he was come to that place where the bounds of Bethphage and Bethany met and touched one another, he then ascended—in that very place where he got upon the ass when he rode into Jerusalem. Mark xi. 1. Whereas, therefore, Josephus saith that Mount Olivet was but five furlongs from the city, he means the first brink and border of it. But our evangelist must be understood of the place where Christ ascended, where the name of Olivet began, as it was distinguished from Bethphage." Dr. Robinson says, "Of the village of Bethphage, no trace exists." He looked for it, however, east of Bethany, and also between the village of Bethany and the summit of Olivet, where the monks say it stood; but the Talmudists say it was at the utmost circuit of the walls of Jerusalem. But as the word means House of figs, it was probably a house on the Jerusalem side of the mountain where figs were sold, quite likely in a garden where they grew. The name would naturally be applied to all that part of the mountain from the valley to the summit. The most interesting fact that has recently come to notice concerning this locality, is the purchase of the Mount of Olives, or a portion of it, by Madame Polack, the widow of a wealthy Jewish banker, of Königsberg, Prussia. She has begun to plant it with olive trees, and intends to beautify the whole area at her own expense.]

OLIVE TREE, ῥῖ, ἐλαία, Matt. xxi. 1: Rom. xi. 17, 24: James iii. 12: ἀμπέλαιος, oleaster, the wild olive, Rom. xi. 17, 24. Tournefort mentions eighteen kinds of olives; but in the Scripture we only read of the cultivated and wild olive. The cultivated olive is of a moderate height, and thrives best in a sunny and warm soil. Its trunk is knotty; its bark is smooth, and of an ash color; its wood is solid, and yellowish; its leaves are oblong, and almost like those of the willow, of a dark green color on the upper side, and a whitish below. In the month of June it puts forth white flowers, growing in bunches, each of one piece, and widening toward the top, and dividing into four parts. After this flower succeeds the fruit, which is oblong and plump. It is first green, then pale, and, when quite ripe, becomes black. Within it is enclosed a hard stone, filled with oblong seeds. The wild olives were of a less kind. Canaan much abounded with olives. It seems almost all proprietors, whether kings or subjects, had their olive yards. The olive branch was, from most ancient times, used as the symbol of reconciliation and peace.

OMNIPOTENCE. See ALMIGHTY.

OMNIPRESENCE, that attribute of God by which he is present in all places. The statement of this doctrine in the inspired records, like that of all the other attributes of God, is made in their own peculiar tone and emphasis of majesty and sublimity. "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up to heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there; if I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? Do not I fill heaven and earth, saith the Lord? Am I a God at hand, saith the Lord, and not a God afar off?" "Thus saith the Lord, Behold, heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool." "Behold, heaven, and the heaven of heavens, cannot contain thee." "Though he dig into hell, thence shall my hand take him; though he climb up into heaven, thence will I bring him down; and though he hide himself in the top of Carmel, I will search and take him out from thence." "In him we live and move and have our being." "He filleth all things."

Some striking passages on the ubiquity of the Divine presence may be found in the writings of some of the Greek philosophers, arising out of this notion, that God was the soul of the world; but their very connection with this speculation, notwithstanding the imposing phrase occasionally adopted, strikingly marks the difference between their most exalted views, and those of the Hebrew prophets on this subject. To a large proportion of those who hold a distinguished rank among the ancient theistical philosophers, the idea of the personality of the Deity was in a great measure unknown. The Deity by them was considered not so much an intelligent Being, as an animating power, diffused throughout the world, and was introduced into their speculative system to account for the motion of that passive mass of matter which was supposed coeval, and, indeed, coexistent with himself. These defective notions are confessed by Gibbon, a writer not disposed to undervalue their attainments: "The philosophers of Greece deduced their morals from the nature of man, rather than from that of God. They meditated, however, on the Divine nature, as a very curious and important speculation; and, in the profound inquiry, they displayed the strength and weakness of the human understanding. Of the four most considerable sects, the Stoics and the Platonicians endeavored to reconcile the jarring interests of reason and piety. They have left us the most sublime proofs of the existence and perfections of the First Cause; but as it was impossible for them to conceive the creation of matter, the workman, in the Stoic philosophy, was not sufficiently distinguished from the work; while, on the contrary, the spiritual god of Plato and his disciples resembled more an idea than a substance."

Similar errors have been revived in the infidel philosophy of modern times, from Spinoza down to the later offspring of the German and French schools. The same remark applies also to the oriental philosophy, which presents at this day a perfect view of the boasted wisdom of ancient Greece, which was "brought to naught" by "the foolishness" of apostolic preaching. But in the Scriptures there is nothing confused in the doctrine of the Divine ubiquity. God is everywhere, but he is not every thing. All things have their being in him, but he is distinct from all things: he fills the universe, but is not mingled with it. He is the intelligence which guides, and the power which sustains; but his personality is preserved, and he is independent of the works of his hands, however vast and noble. So far is his presence from being bounded by the universe itself, that, as we are taught in the passage above quoted from the Psalms, were it possible for us to wing our way into the immeasurable depths and breadths of space, God would there surround us, in as absolute a sense as that in which he is said to be about our bed and our path in that part of the world where his will has placed us.

On this, as on all similar subjects, the Scriptures use terms which are taken in their common-sense acceptation among mankind; and though the vanity of the human mind disposes many to seek a philosophy in the doctrine thus announced deeper than that which its popular terms convey, we are bound to conclude, if we would pay but a common respect to an admitted revelation, that, where no manifest figure of speech occurs, the truth of the doctrine lies in the tenor of the terms by which it is expressed. Otherwise there would be no revelation, we do not say of the modus, [manner,] (for that is confessedly incomprehensible,) but of the fact. In the case before us, the terms presence and place are used according to common notions; and must be so taken, if the Scriptures are intelligible. Metaphysical refinements are not scriptural doctrines, when they give to the terms chosen by the Holy Spirit an acceptation out of their general and proper use, and make them the signs of a perfectly distinct class of ideas; if, indeed, all distinctness of idea is not lost in the attempt. It is therefore in the popular and just, because scriptural, manner, that we are to conceive of the omnipresence of God. If we reflect upon ourselves, we may observe that we fill but a small space, and that our knowledge or power reaches but a little way. We can act at one time in one place only, and the sphere of our influence is narrow at largest. Would we be witnesses to what is done at any distance from us, or exert there our active powers, we must remove ourselves thither. For this reason we are necessarily ignorant of a thousand things which pass around us, incapable of attending and managing any great variety of affairs, or performing at the same time any number of actions for our own good, or for the benefit of others. Although we feel this to be the present condition of our being, and the limited state of our intelligent and active powers, yet we can easily conceive there may exist beings more perfect, and whose presence may extend far and wide; any one of whom present in what are to us various places, at the same time, may know at once what is done in all these, and act in all of them; and thus be able to regard and direct a variety of affairs at the same instant; and who further being qualified, by the purity and activity of their nature, to pass from one place to another, with great ease and swiftness, may thus fill a large sphere of action, direct a great variety of affairs, confer a great number of benefits, and observe a multitude of actions at the same time, or in so swift a suc-

sion as to us would appear but one instant. Thus perfect we may readily believe the angels of God.

We can further conceive this extent of presence, and of ability for knowledge and action, to admit of degrees of ascending perfection approaching to infinite. And when we have thus raised our thoughts to the idea of a being who is not only present throughout a large empire, but throughout our world; and not only in every part of our world, but in every part of all the numberless suns and worlds which roll in the starry heavens—who is not only able to enliven and actuate the plants, animals, and men who live upon this globe, but countless varieties of creatures everywhere in an immense universe—yea, whose presence is not confined to the universe, immeasurable as that is by any finite mind, but who is present everywhere in infinite space; and who is therefore able to create still new worlds, and fill them with proper inhabitants, attend, supply, and govern them all—when we have thus gradually raised and enlarged our conceptions, we have the best idea we can form of the universal presence of the great Jehovah, who filleth heaven and earth. There is no part of the universe, no portion of space uninhabited by God; none wherein this Being of perfect power, wisdom, and benevolence is not essentially present. Could we with the swiftness of a sunbeam dart ourselves beyond the limits of the creation, and for ages continue our progress in infinite space, we should still be surrounded with the Divine presence; nor ever be able to reach that space where God is not. His presence also penetrates every part of our world: the most solid parts of the earth cannot exclude it; for it pierces as easily the centre of the globe as the empty air. All creatures live and move and have their being in him. And the inmost recesses of the human heart can no more exclude his presence, or conceal a thought from his knowledge, than the deepest caverns of the earth.

The illustrations and confirmatory proofs of this doctrine which the material world furnishes, are numerous and striking. It is a most evident and acknowledged truth, that a being cannot act where it is not: if, therefore, actions and effects which manifest the highest wisdom, power, and goodness in the author of them, are continually produced everywhere, the author of these actions, or God, must be continually present with us, and wherever he thus acts. The matter which composes the world is evidently lifeless and thoughtless: it must therefore be incapable of moving itself, or designing or producing any effects which require wisdom or power. The matter of our world, or the small parts which constitute the air, the earth, and the waters, is yet continually moved so as to produce effects of this kind; such are the innumerable herbs, and trees, and fruits which adorn the earth and support the countless millions of creatures that inhabit it. There must, therefore, be constantly present all over the earth a most wise, mighty, and good Being, the author and director of these motions.

We cannot, it is true, see him with our bodily eyes, because he is a pure Spirit; yet this is not any proof that he is not present. A judicious discourse, a series of kind actions, convince us of the presence of a friend, a person of prudence and benevolence. We cannot see the present mind, the seat and principle of these qualities; yet the constant, regular motion of the tongue, the hand, and the whole body, (which are the instruments of our souls, as the material universe and all the various bodies in it are the instruments of the Deity,) will not suffer us to doubt that there is an intelligent and benevolent principle within the body which produces all these skilful motions and kind actions. The sun, the air, the earth, and the waters, are no more able to move themselves, and produce all that beautiful and useful variety of plants, and fruits, and trees with which our earth is covered, than the body of a man, when the soul hath left it, is able to move itself, form an instrument, plough a field, or build a house. If the laying out judiciously and well cultivating a small estate, sowing it with proper grain at the best time of the year, watering it in due season and quantities, and gathering in the fruits when ripe, and laying them up in the best manner—if all these effects prove the estate to have a manager, and the manager possessed of skill and strength, certainly the enlightening and warming the whole earth by the sun, and so directing its motion and the motion of the earth as to produce, in a constant useful succession, day and night, summer and winter, seed-time and harvest; the watering the earth continually by the clouds, and thus bringing forth immense quantities of herbage, grain, and fruits—certainly all these effects, continually produced, must prove that a Being of the greatest power, wisdom, and benevolence is continually present throughout our world, which he thus supports, moves, actuates, and makes fruitful.

The fire which warms us knows nothing of its serviceableness to this purpose, nor of the wise laws according to which its particles are moved to produce this effect. And that it is placed in such a part of the house where it may be greatly beneficial and no way hurtful, is ascribed, without hesitation, to the contrivance and labor of a person who knew its proper place and uses. And if we came daily into a house wherein we saw this was regularly done, though we never saw an inhabitant in it, we could not doubt that the house was occupied by a rational inhabitant. That huge globe of fire in the heavens which we call the sun, and on the light and influences of which the fertility of our world and the life and pleasure of all animals depend, knows nothing of its serviceableness to these purposes, nor of the wise laws according to which its beams are dispensed, nor what place or motions were requisite for these beneficial purposes. Yet its beams are darted constantly in infinite numbers, every one according to those well-chosen laws, and its proper place and motion are maintained. Must not then its place be appointed, its motion regulated, and beams darted, by Almighty wisdom and goodness, which prevent the sun's ever wandering in the boundless space of the heavens, so as to leave us in disconsolate cold and darkness; or coming so near, or emitting his rays in such a manner, as to burn us up? Must not the great Being who enlightens and warms us by the sun, his instrument, who raises and sends down the vapors, brings forth and ripens the grain and fruits, and who is thus ever acting around us for our benefit, be always present in the sun, throughout the air, and all over the earth, which he thus moves and actuates?

This earth is in itself a dead, motionless mass, and void of all counsel; yet proper parts of it are continually raised through the small pipes which compose the bodies of plants and trees, and are made to contribute to their growth, to open and shine in blossoms and leaves, and to swell and harden into fruit. Could blind, thoughtless particles thus continually keep on their way, through numberless windings, without once blundering, if they were not guided by an unerring hand? Can the most perfect human skill from earth and water form one grain, much more a variety of beautiful and relishing fruits? Must not the directing Mind who does all this constantly, be most wise, mighty, and benevolent? Must not the Being who thus continually exerts his skill and energy around us, for our benefit, be confessed to be always present and concerned for our welfare? Can these effects be ascribed to any thing below an all-wise and almighty Cause? And must not this Cause be present wherever he acts? Were God to speak to us every month from heaven, and, with a voice loud as thunder, declare that he observes, provides for, and governs us, this would not be a proof, in the judgment of sound reason, by many degrees so valid; since much less wisdom and power are required to form such sounds in the air, than to produce these effects; and to give, not merely verbal declarations, but substantial evidences of his presence and care over us. In every part and place of the universe with which we are acquainted, we perceive the exertion of a power which we believe, mediately or immediately, to proceed from the Deity. For instance: in what part or point of space, that has ever been explored, do we not discover attraction? In what regions do we not find light? In what accessible portion of our globe do we not meet with gravity, magnetism, electricity; together with the properties also and powers of organized substances, of vegetable or of animated nature? Nay, further, what kingdom is there of nature, what corner of space, in which there is any thing that can be examined by us, where we do not fall upon contrivance and design? The only reflection, perhaps, which arises in our minds from this view of the world around us is, that the laws of nature everywhere prevail; that they are uniform and universal. But what do we mean by the laws of nature, or by any law? Effects are produced by power, not by laws. A law cannot execute itself. A law refers us to an agent.

The usual argument à priori, on this attribute of the Divine nature, has been stated as follows—but, amidst such a mass of demonstration of a much higher kind, it cannot be of any great value:—The First Cause, the supreme all-perfect Mind, as he could not derive his being from any other cause, must be independent of all other, and therefore unlimited. He exists by an absolute necessity of nature; and as all the parts of infinite space are exactly uniform and alike, for the same reason that he exists in any one part he must exist in all. No reason can be assigned for excluding him from one part, which would not exclude him from all. But that he is present in some parts of space, the evident effects of his wisdom, power, and benevolence continually produced, demonstrate beyond all rational doubt. He must therefore be alike present everywhere, and fill infinite space with his infinite being.

Among metaphysicians, it has been matter of dispute whether God is present everywhere by an infinite extension of his essence. This is the opinion of Newton, Dr. S. Clarke, and their followers; others have objected to this notion, that it might then be said, God is neither in heaven nor in earth, but only a part of God in each. The former opinion, however, appears most in harmony with the Scriptures; though the term extension, through the inadequacy of language, conveys too material an idea. The objection just stated is wholly grounded on notions taken from material objects, and is therefore of little weight, because it is not applicable to an immaterial substance. It is best to confess with one who had thought deeply on the subject, "There is an incomprehensibility in the manner of every thing about which no controversy can or ought to be concerned." That we cannot comprehend how God is fully, and completely, and undividedly present everywhere, need not surprise us, when we reflect that the manner in which our own minds are present with our bodies is as incomprehensible as the manner in which the Supreme Mind is present with every thing in the universe.

OMNISCIENCE. This attribute of God is constantly connected in Scripture with his omnipresence, and forms a part of almost every description of that attribute; for, as God is a Spirit, and therefore intelligent, if he is everywhere, if nothing can exclude him, not even the most solid bodies, nor the minds of intelligent beings, then are all things naked and opened to the eyes of him with whom we have to do. Where he acts, he is; and where he is, he perceives. He understands and considers things absolutely, and as they are in their own natures, powers, properties, differences, together with all the circumstances belonging to them. "Known unto him are all his works from the beginning of the world;" rather, ἀπ' αἰῶνος, from all eternity: known before they were made, in their possible, and known, now they are made, in their actual, existence. "Lord, thou hast searched me and known me; thou knowest my down-sitting and mine up-rising, thou understandest my thought afar off. Thou compassed my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways. For there is not a word in my tongue, but lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether. The darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day. The ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he pondereth all his goings: he searcheth their hearts, and understandeth every imagination of their thoughts." Nor is this perfect knowledge to be confined to men or angels; it reaches into the state of the dead, and penetrates the regions of the damned. "Hell," hades, "is naked before him; and destruction," the seats of destruction, "hath no covering." No limits at all are to be set to this perfection: "Great is the Lord, his understanding is infinite."

In Psalm xciv. the knowledge of God is argued from the communication of it to men: "Understand, ye brutish among the people; and ye fools, when will ye be wise? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?" This argument is as easy as it is conclusive, obliging all who acknowledge a First Cause to admit his perfect intelligence, or to take refuge in atheism itself. It fetches not the proof from a distance, but refers us to our bosoms for the constant demonstration that the Lord is a God of knowledge, and that by him actions are weighed. We find in ourselves such qualities as thought and intelligence, power and freedom, etc., for which we have the evidence of consciousness as much as for our own existence. Indeed, it is only by our consciousness of these that our existence is known to ourselves. We know, likewise, that these are perfections, and that to have them is better than to be without them. We find also that they have not been in us from eternity. They must, therefore, have had a beginning, and consequently some cause, for the very same reason that a being beginning to exist in time requires a cause. Now this cause, as it must be superior to its effect, must have those perfections in a superior degree; and if it be the First Cause, it must have them in an infinite or unlimited degree, since bounds or limitations, without a limiter, would be an effect without a cause. If God gives wisdom to the wise, and knowledge to men of understanding; if he communicates this perfection to his creatures, the inference must be that he himself is possessed of it in a much more eminent degree than they; that his knowledge is deep and intimate, reaching to the very essence of things, theirs but slight and superficial; his clear and distinct, theirs confused and dark; his certain and infallible, theirs doubtful and liable to mistake; his easy and permanent, theirs obtained with much pains, and soon lost again by the defects of memory or age; his universal and extending to all objects, theirs short and narrow, reaching only to some few things, while that which is wanting cannot be numbered; and therefore, as the heavens are higher than the earth, so, as the prophet has told us, are his ways above our ways, and his thoughts above our thoughts.

But his understanding is infinite; a doctrine which the sacred writers not only authoritatively announce, but confirm by referring to the wisdom displayed in his works. The only difference between wisdom and knowledge is, that the former always supposes action, and action directed to an end. But wherever there is wisdom there must be knowledge; and as the wisdom of God in the creation consists in the formation of things which, by themselves, or in combination with others, shall produce certain effects, and that in a variety of operation which is to us boundless, the previous knowledge of the possible qualities and effects inevitably supposes a knowledge which can have no limit. For as creation out of nothing argues a power which is omnipotent, so the knowledge of the possibilities of things which are not, (a knowledge which, from the effect, we are sure must exist in God,) argues that such a Being must be omniscient. For all things being not only present to him, but also entirely depending upon him, and having received both their being itself, and all their powers and faculties, from him; it is manifest that, as he knows all things that are, so he must likewise know all possibilities of things, that is, all effects that can be. For, being himself alone self-existent, and having alone given to all things all the powers and faculties they are endued with, it is evident he must of necessity know perfectly what all and each of those powers and faculties, which are derived wholly from himself, can possibly produce; and seeing, at one boundless view, all the possible compositions and divisions, variations and changes, circumstances and dependencies of things; all their possible relations one to another, and their dispositions or fitnesses to certain and respective ends, he must, without possibility of error, know exactly what is best and most proper in every one of the infinite possible cases or methods of disposing things; and understand perfectly how to order and direct the respective means to bring about what he so knows to be, in its kind, or on the whole, the best and fittest in the end. This is what we mean by infinite wisdom.

On the subject of the Divine omniscience, many fine sentiments are to be found in the writings of pagans; for an intelligent First Cause being in any sense admitted, it was most natural and obvious to ascribe to him a perfect knowledge of all things. They acknowledge that nothing is hid from God, who is intimate to our minds, and mingles himself with our very thoughts; nor were they all unaware of the practical tendency of such a doctrine, and of the motive it affords to a cautious and virtuous conduct. But among them it was not held, as by the sacred writers, in connection with other right views of the Divine nature, which are essential to give to this its full moral effect. Not only on this subject does the manner in which the Scriptures state the doctrine far transcend that of the wisest pagan theists, but the moral of the sentiment is infinitely more comprehensive and impressive. With them it is connected with man's state of trial; with a holy law, all the violations of which, in thought, word, and deed, are both infallibly known and strictly marked; with promises of grace, and of a mild and protecting government as to all who have sought and found the mercy of God in forgiving their sins and admitting them into his family. The wicked are thus reminded that their hearts are searched and their sins noted; that the eyes of the Lord are upon their ways; and that their most secret works will be brought to light in the day when God the witness shall become God the judge. But as to the righteous, the eyes of the Lord are said to be over them; that they are kept by him who never slumbers or sleeps; that he is never far from them; that his eyes run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to show himself strong in their behalf; that foes, to them invisible, are seen by his eye and controlled by his arm; and that this great attribute, so appalling to wicked men, affords to them, not only the most influential reason for a perfectly holy temper and conduct, but the strongest motive to trust, and joy, and hope, amidst the changes and afflictions of the present life. Socrates and other philosophers, could express themselves well, so long as they expressed themselves generally, on this subject. The former could say, "Let your own frame instruct you. Does the mind inhabiting your body dispose and govern it with ease? Ought you not then to conclude that the universal Mind with equal ease actuates and governs universal nature; and that, when you can at once consider the interest of the Athenians at home, in Egypt, and in Sicily, it is not too much for the Divine wisdom to take care of the universe? These reflections will soon convince you that the greatness of the Divine mind is such, as at once to see all things, hear all things, be present everywhere, and direct all the affairs of the world." These views are just, but they wanted that connection with others relative both to the Divine nature and government which we see only in the Bible, to render them influential: they neither gave correct moral distinctions nor led to a virtuous practice, no, not in Socrates, who on some subjects, and especially on the personality of the Deity, and his independence on matter, raised himself far above the rest of his philosophic brethren, but in moral feeling and practice was perhaps as censurable as they. See PRESCIENCE.

ON, or AVEN, a city of Egypt, situated in the land of Goshen, on the east of the Nile, and about five miles from the modern Cairo. It was called Heliopolis by the Greeks, and Bethshemesh by the Hebrews, Jer. xliii. 13: both of which names, as well as its Egyptian one of On, imply the city or house of the sun. The inhabitants of this city are represented by Herodotus as the wisest of the Egyptians; and here Moses resided and received that education which made him "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." But notwithstanding its being the seat of the sciences, such were its egregious idolatries, that it was nicknamed Aven, or Beth-Aven, "the house of vanity," or idolatry, by the Jews. A village standing on part of its site at the present day is called Matarea; while the spring of excellent water, or fountain of the sun, which is supposed to have given rise to the city, is still called Ain Shems, or fountain of the sun, by the Arabs. This is one of the most ancient cities of the world of which any distinct vestige can now be traced. It was visited eighteen hundred and fifty years ago by Strabo, whose description proves it to have been nearly as desolate then as now. Most of the ruins of this once famous city, described by that geographer, are buried in the accumulation of the soil; but that which marks its site, and is, perhaps, the most ancient work at this time existing in the world, in a perfect state, is a column of red granite, seventy feet high, and covered with hieroglyphics. Dr. E. D. Clarke has given a very good representation of this column; to whom, also, the curious reader is referred for a learned dissertation on the characters engraved upon it.

The city On, according to Josephus, was given to the Israelites to dwell in, when they first went into Egypt; and it was a daughter of a priest of the temple of the sun at this place who was given in marriage to Joseph by Pharaoh. Here, also, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, leave was obtained of that king by Onias, high-priest of the Jews, to build a temple, when dispossessed of his office by Antiochus; which was long used by the Hellenist Jews. It was predicted by Jeremiah, xliii. 13, and by Ezekiel, xxx. 17, that this place, with its temples and inhabitants, should be destroyed; which was probably fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar. See NOPH.

[Dr. Robinson, who visited it in 1840, says, "The site is marked by low mounds, enclosing a space about three-quarters of a mile in length by half a mile in breadth, which was once occupied partly by houses and partly by the celebrated temple of the sun. This area is now a ploughed field, a garden of herbs; and the solitary obelisk which still rises in the midst is the sole remnant of the former splendors of the place. In the days of Edrisi and Abdallatif, the place bore the name of 'Ain Shems; and in the neighboring village Metariyeh is still shown an ancient well bearing the same name. Near by it is a very old sycamore, its trunk straggling and gnarled, under which legendary tradition relates that the holy family once rested."]

ONESIMUS was a Phrygian by nation, a slave to Philemon, and a disciple of the Apostle Paul. Onesimus having run away from his master, and also having robbed him, (Philemon 18,) went to Rome while St. Paul was there in prison the first time. As Onesimus knew him by repute, (his master Philemon being a Christian,) he sought him out. St. Paul brought him to a sense of the greatness of his crime, instructed him, baptized him, and sent him back to his master Philemon with a letter, inserted among St. Paul's Epistles, which is universally acknowledged as canonical. This letter had all the good success he could desire. Philemon not only received Onesimus as a faithful servant, but rather as a brother and a friend. A little time after, he sent him back to Rome to St. Paul, that he might continue to be serviceable to him in his prison. And we see that after this Onesimus was employed to carry such Epistles as the apostle wrote at that time. He carried, for example, that which was written to the Colossians while St. Paul was yet in his bonds.

ONESIPHORUS is mentioned 2 Tim. i. 16, 17, and highly commended by St. Paul.

ONION, בצל, Num. xi. 5: a well-known garden plant with a bulbous root. Onions and garlics were highly esteemed in Egypt; and not without reason, this country being admirably adapted to their culture. The allium cepa, called by the Arabs basal, Hasselquist thinks one of the species of onions for which the Israelites longed. He would infer this from the quantities still used in Egypt, and their goodness. "Whoever has tasted onions in Egypt," says he, "must allow that none can be had better in any part of the universe. Here they are sweet: in other countries they are nauseous and strong. Here they are soft: whereas in the northern and other parts they are hard, and their coats so compact that they are difficult of digestion. Hence they cannot in any place be eaten with less prejudice, and more satisfaction, than in Egypt." The Egyptians are reproached with swearing by the leeks and onions of their gardens. Juvenal ridicules some of these superstitious people who did not dare to eat leeks, garlic, or onions, for fear of injuring their gods:

*Quis nescit, Volusi Bythynice, qualia demens
Ægyptus portenta colit?
Porrum et cepe nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!* SAT. xv.

"How Egypt, mad with superstition grown,
Makes gods of monsters, but too well is known
'Tis mortal sin an onion to devour;
Each clove of garlic has a sacred power.
Religious nation, sure! and blest abodes,
Where every garden is o'errun with gods!"

So Lucian in his Jupiter, where he is giving an account of the different deities worshipped by the several inhabitants of Egypt, says, Πηλουσιώταις δὲ κρίθμνον, "those of Pelusium worship the onion." Hence arises a question, how the Israelites durst venture to violate the national worship by eating those sacred plants. We may answer, in the first place, that whatever might be the case of the Egyptians in later ages, it is not probable that they were arrived at such a pitch of superstition in the time of Moses; for we find no indications of this in Herodotus, the most ancient of the Greek historians: secondly, the writers here quoted appear to be mistaken in imagining these plants to have been generally the objects of religious worship. The priests, indeed, abstained from the use of them, and several other vegetables; and this might give rise to the opinion of their being revered as divinities; but the use of them was not prohibited to the people, as is plain from the testimonies of ancient authors, particularly of Diodorus Siculus.

[ONYCHA. חֲבִי. An ingredient of the sacred incense. Exod. xxx. 34. Geddes thinks it was a resinous substance, probably the bdellium. It is generally supposed to have been the Babylonian onyx, or odoriferous shell. Compare Eccles. xxiv. 15 or 21. See Bochart and Scheuchzer. Rumphius says that as aloes are the basis of all oriental pills, so is the onyx, purpura, or murex shell, of all oriental incense.]

ONYX, שֹׁהַם, Gen. ii. 12: Exod. xxv. 7; xxviii. 9, 20; xxxv. 27; xxxix. 6: 1 Chron. xxix. 2: Job xxviii. 16: Ezekiel xxviii. 13: a precious stone, so called from the Greek δυνεξ, the nail, to the color of which it nearly approaches. It is first mentioned with the gold and bdellium of the river Pison in Eden; but the meaning of the Hebrew word is not easily determined. The Septuagint render it, in different places, the sardius, beryl, sapphire, emerald, etc. Such names are often ambiguous, even in Greek and Latin, and no wonder if they are more so in Hebrew. In Exodus xxviii. 9, 10, a direction is given that two onyx stones should be fastened on the ephod of the high-priest, on which were to be graven the names of the children of Israel, like the engravings on a signet: six of the names on one stone, and six on the other. In 1 Chron. xxix. 2, onyx stones are among the things prepared by David for the temple. The author of "Scripture Illustrated" observes, upon this passage, that "the word onyx is equivocal, signifying, first, a precious stone or gem; and, secondly, a marble called in Greek onychites, which Pliny mentions as a stone of Caramania. Antiquity gave both these stones this name, because of their resemblance to the nail of the fingers. The onyx of the high-priest's pectoral was, no doubt, the gem onyx; the stone prepared by David was the marble onyx, or rather onychus; for one would hardly think that gems of any kind were used externally in such a building, but variegated marble may readily be admitted."

[OPHEL. A ridge extending south from Moriah to Siloam, between the valleys of Jehoshaphat and Tyropeon. Its top is flat, and at the end where it joins the city-wall it is one hundred feet lower than the top of the wall of the area of the mosque. Robinson measured from this point fifteen hundred and fifty feet south-westerly to the end of the ridge, a rocky point forty or fifty feet above the pool of Siloam, in the north of the Tyropeon. The breadth of the ridge about the middle is two hundred and ninety feet. It descends rapidly toward the south, sometimes by offsets of rocks. It is covered with olive and other fruit trees. Here the Nethinim, or servants of the temple, resided, being close to the sacred place. Neh. iii. 26; xi. 21: compare 2 Chron. xxvii. 3; xxxiii. 14: Micah iv. 8, Heb. See JERUSALEM.]

[OPHIR. Son of Joktan. Gen. x. 29.]

OPHIR, a place or country remote from Judea, to which the ships of Solomon traded. There has been much discussion respecting the situation of this place; some supposing it to have been the island of Socotora, without the straits of Babel-mandel; others, that anciently called Tabrobana, which is supposed by some to have been Ceylon, and by others Sumatra; while others fix its situation on the continent of India. M. Huet, and, after him, Bruce, place Ophir at Sofala, in South Africa, where mines of gold and silver have been found, which show marks of having been very anciently and extensively worked. The latter says, also, that the situation of this place explains the period of three years which the Ophir ships were absent, from the different courses of the monsoons and trade-winds, which they would have to encounter going and returning. Ruins of ancient buildings have also been found in the neighborhood of these mines. In confirmation of this opinion, Bruce says there was a place called Tarshish near Melinda.

In the same direction with Ophir lay Tarshish, the voyage to both places being accomplished under one, and always, as it would seem, in the same space of time, three years: by which it may be inferred that, notwithstanding the imperfect navigation of the times, they must be at a considerable distance from the ports of Judea. But the true situation of these places must ever remain matter of conjecture; and all that can be considered as certain respecting them is, that from the articles imported from them, namely, gold, silver, ivory, apes, peacocks, and precious stones, they must have been situated in the tropical parts of either Africa or Asia.—[1 Kings ix. 28; x. 11; xxii. 48: 1 Chron. xxix. 4: 2 Chron. viii. 18: Job xxii. 24; xxviii. 16: Ps. xlv. 9: Isa. xlii. 12. Some are inclined to add California or Australia to the sixteen different countries heretofore presented as candidates for recognition as the scriptural Ophir. As Josephus calls it the Aurea Chersonesus, the conclusion has been drawn that the peninsula of Malacca is meant.]

[OPHNI. A city of Benjamin, fifteen miles north-east of Jerusalem. Robinson suggests it may be represented by the village of Jufna, which contains a population of two hundred Christians. Gophna was a strong place in the days of Josephus.]

[OPHRAH. A city of Benjamin, placed by Eusebius and Jerome five miles east of Bethel. Josh. xviii. 23: 1 Sam. xiii. 17. It is supposed to be the same as Aphrah, Micah i. 10. Robinson suggests it may be represented by Taiyibeh, a village containing some three hundred Greek Christians.—The city of Gideon, in Manasseh, was also called Ophrah. Judg. vi. 11, 24; viii. 27, 32; ix. 5.]

ORACLE denotes something delivered by supernatural wisdom; and the term is also used in the Old Testament to signify the most holy place from whence the Lord revealed his will to ancient Israel, 1 Kings vi. 5, 19–21, 23. But when the word occurs in the plural number, as it mostly does, it denotes the revelations contained in the sacred writings of which the nation of Israel were the depositaries. So Moses is said by Stephen to have received the "lively oracles" to give unto the Israelites. These oracles contained the law, both moral and ceremonial, with all the types and promises relating to the Messiah which are to be found in the writings of Moses. They also contained all the intimations of the Divine mind which he was pleased to communicate by means of the succeeding prophets, who prophesied beforehand of the coming and of the sufferings of the Messiah with the glory that should follow. The Jews were a highly privileged people in many and various respects, Rom. ix. 4, 5; but the Apostle Paul mentions it as their chief advantage that "unto them were committed the oracles of God." Rom. iii. 2. "What nation," says Moses, "is there that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law which I set before you this day?" Deut. iv. 8. The Psalmist David enumerates their excellent properties under various epithets; such as the law of the Lord, his testimony, his statutes, his commandments, his judgments, etc. Their properties are extolled as perfect, sure, right, pure, clean, true, and righteous altogether; more to be desired than much fine gold; sweeter than honey and the honeycomb. Their salutary effects are all mentioned; such as their converting the soul, making wise the simple, rejoicing the heart, enlightening the eyes; and the keeping of them is connected with a great reward. Psalm xix. The hundred and nineteenth Psalm abounds with praises of the lively oracles, the word of the living God; it abounds with the warmest expressions of love to it, of delight in it, and the most fervent petitions for Divine illumination in the knowledge of it. Such was the esteem and veneration which the faithful entertained for the lively oracles under the former dispensation, when they had only Moses and the prophets: how, then, ought they to be prized by Christians, who have also Christ and his apostles!

Among the heathen the term oracle is usually taken to signify an answer, generally couched in very dark and ambiguous terms, supposed to be given by demons of old, either by the mouths of their idols, or by those of their priests, to the people, who consulted them on things to come. Oracle is also used for the demon who gave the answer, and the place where it was given. Seneca defines oracles to be enunciations by the mouths of men of the will of the gods; and Cicero simply calls them, deorum oratio, the language of the gods. Among the pagans they were held in high estimation; and they were consulted on a variety of occasions pertaining to national enterprises and private life. When they made peace or war, enacted laws, reformed states, or changed the constitution, they had in all these cases recourse to the oracle by public authority. Also, in private life, if a man wished to marry, if he proposed to take a journey, or to engage in any business of importance, he repaired to the oracle for counsel. Mankind have had always a propensity to explore futurity; and conceiving that future events were known to their gods, who possessed the gift of prophecy, they sought information and advice from the oracles, which, in their opinion, were supernatural and Divine communications. The institution of oracles seemed to gratify the prevalent curiosity of mankind, and proved a source of immense wealth, as well as authority and influence, to those who had the command of them. Accordingly, every nation in which idolatry has subsisted had its oracles, by means of which imposture practiced on superstition and credulity. The principal oracles of antiquity are, that of Abœ, mentioned by Herodotus; that of Amphiaraus, at Oropus, in Macedonia; that of the Branchidæ, at Didymeum; that of the camps at Lacedæmon; that of Dodona; that of Jupiter Ammon; that of Nabarca, in the country of the Anariaci, near the Caspian Sea; that of Trophonius, mentioned by Herodotus; that of Chrysopolis; that of Claros, in Ionia; that of Amphiloehus, at Mallos; that of Petarea; that of Pella, in Macedonia; that of Phaselides, in Cilicia; that of Sinope, in Paphlagonia; that of Orpheus's head, at Lesbos, mentioned by Philostratus. But of all oracles, the oracle of Apollo Phythius, at Delphi, was the most celebrated: this was consulted in the dernier resort by most of the princes of those ages.

Most of the pagan deities had their appropriate oracles. Apollo had the greatest number:

such as those of Claros, of the Branchidæ, of the suburbs of Daphne at Antioch, of Delos, of Argos, of Troas, Æolis, etc., of Baïæ in Italy, and others in Cilicia, in Egypt, in the Alps, in Thrace, at Corinth, in Arcadia, in Laconia, and in many other places enumerated by Van Dale. Jupiter, beside that of Dodona and some others, the honor of which he shared with Apollo, had one in Bœotia under the name of Jupiter the Thunderer, and another in Elis, one at Thebes and at Meroe, one near Antioch, and several others. Æsculapius was consulted in Cilicia, at Apollonia, in the Isle of Cos, at Epidaurus, Pergamos, Rome, and elsewhere. Mercury had oracles at Patras, upon Hæmon, and in other places; Mars, in Thrace, Egypt, and elsewhere; Hercules, at Cadiz, Athens, in Egypt, at Tivoli, in Mesopotamia, where he issued his oracles by dreams, whence he was called Somnialis. Isis, Osiris, and Serapis delivered in like manner their oracles by dreams, as we learn from Pausanias, Tacitus, Arrian, and other writers; that of Amphiloehus was also delivered by dreams; the ox Apis had also his oracle in Egypt. The gods, called Cabiri, had their oracle in Bœotia. Diana, the sister of Apollo, had several oracles in Egypt, Cilicia, Ephesus, etc. Those of fortune at Præneste, and of the lots at Antium, are well known. The fountains also delivered oracles, for to each of them a divinity was ascribed: such was the fountain of Castalia at Delphi, another of the same name in the suburbs of Antioch, and the prophetic fountain near the temple of Ceres in Achaia. Juno had several oracles: one near Corinth, one at Nysa, and others at different places. Latona had one at Butis in Egypt; Leucothea had one in Colchis; Memnon in Egypt; Machaon at Gerania in Laconia; Minerva had one in Egypt, in Spain, upon Mount Ætna, at Mycenæ and Colchis, and in other places. Those of Neptune were at Delphos, at Calauria, near Neocesarea, and elsewhere. The nymphs had theirs in the cave of Corycia. Pan had several, the most famous of which was that in Arcadia. That of the Palici was in Sicily. Pluto had one at Nysa. Saturn had oracles in several places, but the most famous were those of Cumæ in Italy, and of Alexandria in Egypt. Those of Venus were dispersed in several places, at Gaza, upon Mount Libanus, at Paphos, in Cyprus, etc. Serapis had one at Alexandria, consulted by Vespasian. Venus Aphacite had one at Aphaca between Heliopolis and Byblus. Geryon, the three-headed monster slain by Hercules, had an oracle in Italy near Padua, consulted by Tiberius; that of Hercules was at Tivoli, and was given by lots, like those of Præneste and Antium. The demi-gods and heroes had likewise their oracles: such were those of Castor and Pollux at Lacedæmon, of Amphiaraus, of Mopsus in Cilicia, of Ulysses, Amphiloehus, Sarpedon in Troas, Hermione in Macedonia, Pasiphæ in Laconia, Chalcas in Italy, Aristæus in Bœotia, Autolyces at Sinope, Phryxus among the Colchi, Zamolxis among the Getæ, Hephestion the minion of Alexander, and Antinous, etc.

The responses of oracles were delivered in a variety of ways: at Delphi, they interpreted and put into verse what the priestess pronounced in the time of her furor. Mr. Bayle observes that at first this oracle gave its answers in verse; and that it fell at length to prose, upon the people's beginning to laugh at the poorness of its versification. The Epicureans made this the subject of their jests, and said, in raillery, it was surprising enough that Apollo, the god of poetry, should be a much worse poet than Homer, whom he himself had inspired. By the raileries of these philosophers, and particularly by those of the Cynics and Peripatetics, the priests were at length obliged to desist from the practice of versifying the responses of the Pythia, which, according to Plutarch, was one of the principal causes of the declension of the oracle of Delphos. At the oracle of Ammon, the priests pronounced the response of their god; at Dodona, the response was issued from the hollow of an oak; at the cave of Trophonius, the oracle was inferred from what the suppliant said before he recovered his senses; at Memphis, they drew a good or bad omen, according as the ox Apis received or rejected what was presented to him, which was also the case with the fishes of the fountain of Limyra. The suppliants who consulted the oracles were not allowed to enter the sanctuaries where they were given; and, accordingly, care was taken that neither the Epicureans nor Christians should come near them. In several places, the oracles were given by letters sealed up, as in that of Mopsus, and at Mallus in Cilicia. Oracles were frequently given by lot, the mode of doing which was as follows: the lots were a kind of dice, on which were engraven certain characters or words, whose explanations they were to seek on tables made for the purpose. The way of using these dice for knowing futurity, was different, according to the places where they were used. In some temples, the person himself threw; in others, they were dropped from a box; whence came the proverbial expression, "The lot is fallen." This playing with dice was always preceded by sacrifices and other customary ceremonies. The ambiguity of the oracles in their responses, and their double meaning, contributed to their support.

Ablandcourt observes, that the study or research of the meaning of oracles was but a fruitless thing; and that they were never understood till after their accomplishment. Historians relate that Croesus was tricked by the ambiguity and equivocation of the oracle:

Κροῖσος Ἄλυν διαβῆς μέγαν ἀρχὴν καταλύσει.

This rendered in Latin:

"Croesus Halym superans magnam pervertet opum vim."

[If Croesus cross the Halys, he will overthrow a great empire.]

Thus, if the Lydian monarch had conquered Cyrus, he overthrew the Assyrian empire: if he himself was routed, he overturned his own. That delivered to Pyrrhus, which is comprised in this Latin verse,

"Credo equidem Æcidas Romanos vincere posse,"

[I believe indeed that the sons of Æacus the Romans will conquer.]

had the same advantage; for, according to the rules of syntax, either of the two accusatives may be governed by the verb, and the verse be explained, either by saying the Romans shall conquer the Æcidae, of whom Pyrrhus was descended, or those shall conquer the Romans. When Alexander fell sick at Babylon, some of his courtiers who happened to be in Egypt, or who went thither on purpose, passed the night in the temple of Serapis, to inquire if it would not be proper to bring Alexander to be cured by him. The god answered, it was better that Alexander should remain where he was. This in all events was a very prudent and safe answer. If the king recovered his health, what glory must Serapis have gained by saving him the fatigue of the journey! If he died, it was but saying he died in a favorable juncture after so many conquests; which, had he lived, he could neither have enlarged nor preserved. This is actually the construction they put upon the response; whereas had Alexander undertaken the journey, and died in the temple, or by the way, nothing could have been said in favor of Serapis. When Trajan had formed the design of his expedition against the Parthians, he was advised to consult the oracle of Heliopolis, to do which he had no more to do but send a note under a seal. That prince, who had no great faith in oracles, sent thither a blank note; and they returned him another of the same kind. By this Trajan was convinced of the divinity of the oracle. He sent back a second note to the god, in which he inquired whether he should return to Rome after finishing the war he had in view. The god, as Macrobius tells the story, ordered a vine, which was among the offerings of his temple, to be divided into pieces, and brought to Trajan. The event justified the oracle; for the emperor dying in that war, his bones were carried to Rome, which had been represented by that broken vine. As the priests of that oracle knew Trajan's design, which was no secret, they happily devised that response, which, in all events, was capable of a favorable interpretation, whether he routed and cut the Parthians in pieces, or if his army met with the same fate. Sometimes the responses of the oracles were mere banter, as in the case of the man who wished to know by what means he might become rich, and who received for answer from the god, that he had only to make himself master of all that lay between Sicyon and Corinth. Another, wanting a cure for the gout, was answered by the oracle, that he was to drink nothing but cold water.

There are two points in dispute on the subject of human oracles; namely, whether they were human or diabolical machines; and whether or not they ceased upon the publication or preaching of the gospel. Most of the fathers of the Church supposed that the devil issued oracles; and looked on it as a pleasure he took to give dubious and equivocal answers, in order to have a handle to laugh at them. Vossius allows that it was the devil who spoke in oracles; but thinks that the obscurity of his answers was owing to his ignorance as to the precise circumstances of events. That artful and studied obscurity in which the answers were couched, says he, showed the embarrassment the devil was under; as those double meanings they usually bore provided for their accomplishment. Where the thing foretold did not happen accordingly, the oracle, forsooth, was misunderstood. Eusebius has preserved some fragments of a philosopher, called Enomaus, who, out of resentment for his having been so often fooled by the oracles, wrote an ample confutation of all their impertinences: "When we come to consult thee," says he to Apollo, "if thou seest what is in futurity, why dost thou use expressions that will not be understood? Dost thou not know that they will not be understood? If thou dost, thou takest pleasure in abusing us; if thou dost not, be informed of us, and learn to speak more clearly. I tell thee, that if thou intendest to equivocate, the Greek word whereby thou affirmdest that Croesus should overthrow a great empire was ill chosen, and that it could signify nothing but Croesus's conquering Cyrus. If things must necessarily come to pass, why dost thou amuse us with thy ambiguities? What dost thou, wretch as thou art, at Delphi? employed in muttering idle prophecies!" But Enomaus is still more out of humor with the oracle for the answer which Apollo gave the Athenians, when Xerxes was about to attack Greece with all the strength of Asia. The Pythian declared that Minerva, the protectress of Athens, had endeavored in vain to appease the wrath of Jupiter; yet that Jupiter, in complaisance to his daughter, was willing the Athenians should save themselves within wooden walls; and that Salamis should behold the loss of a great many children, dear to their mothers, either when Ceres was spread abroad, or gathered together. Here Enomaus loses all patience with the god of Delphi. "This contest," says he, "between father and daughter is very becoming the deities! It is excellent that there should be contrary inclinations and interests in heaven. Poor wizard, thou art ignorant whose the children are that Salamis shall see perish—whether Greeks or Persians. It is certain they must be either one or the other; but thou needest not to have told so openly that thou knewest not which. Thou concealest the time of the battle under those fine poetical expressions, 'either when Ceres is spread abroad, or gathered together;' and wouldest thou cajole us with such pompous language? Who knows not, that if there be a sea-fight, it must either be in seed-time or harvest? It is certain it cannot be in winter. Let things go how they will, thou wilt secure thyself by this Jupiter, whom Minerva is endeavoring to appease. If the Greeks lose the battle, Jupiter proved inexorable to the last; if they gain it, why then Minerva at length prevailed."

It is a very general opinion among the more learned, that oracles were all mere cheats and impostures; either calculated to serve the avaricious ends of the heathen priests, or the political views of the princes. Bayle says positively, they were mere human artifices, in which the devil had no hand. He was strongly supported by Van Dale and Fontenelle, who have written expressly on the subject. Father Balthus, a

Jesuit, wrote a treatise in defence of the fathers with regard to the origin of oracles; but without denying the imposture of the priests, often blended with the oracles. He maintains the intervention of the devil in some predictions, which could not be ascribed to the cheats of the priests alone. The Abbé Banier espouses the same side of the question, and objects that oracles would not have lasted so long, and supported themselves with so much splendor and reputation, if they had been merely owing to the forgeries of the priests. Bishop Sherlock, in his "Discourses concerning the Use and Intent of Prophecy," expresses his opinion, that it is impious to disbelieve the heathen oracles, and to deny them to have been given out by the devil; to which assertion Dr. Middleton, in his "Examination," etc., replies, that he is guilty of this impiety, and that he thinks himself warranted to pronounce from the authority of the best and wisest of the heathens themselves, and the evidence of plain facts which are recorded of those oracles, as well as from the nature of the thing itself, that they were all mere imposture, wholly invented and supported by human craft, without any supernatural aid or interposition whatsoever. He alleges that Cicero, speaking of the Delphic oracle, the most revered of any in the heathen world, declares that nothing was become more contemptible, not only in his days, but long before him; that Demosthenes, who lived about three hundred years earlier, affirmed, of the same oracle, in a public speech to the people of Athens, that it was gained to the interests of King Philip, an enemy to that city; that the Greek historians tell us how, on several other occasions, it had been corrupted by money, to serve the views of particular persons and parties, and the prophetess sometimes had been deposed for bribery and lewdness; that there were some great sects of philosophers, who, on principle, disavowed the authority of all oracles; agreeably to all which Strabo tells us, that divination in general and oracles had been in high credit among the ancients, but in his days were treated with much contempt; lastly, that Eusebius also, the great historian of the primitive Church, declares that there were six hundred writers among the heathens themselves who had publicly written against the reality of them. Plutarch has a treatise on the ceasing of some oracles; and Van Dale, a Dutch physician, has a volume to prove they did not cease at the coming of Christ; but that many of them ceased long before, and that others held till the fall of Paganism, under the empire of Theodosius the Great, when, Paganism being dissipated, these institutions could no longer subsist. Van Dale was answered by a German, one Mœbius, professor of theology at Leipsic, in 1685. Fontenelle espoused Van Dale's system, and improved upon it in his "History of Oracles;" and showed the weakness of the argument used by many writers in behalf of Christianity, drawn from the ceasing of oracles. Cicero says, the oracles became dumb in proportion as people, growing less credulous, began to suspect them for cheats. Plutarch alleges two reasons for the ceasing of oracles: the one was Apollo's chagrin; who, it seems, took it in dudgeon to be interrogated about so many trifles. The other was, that in proportion as the genii, or demons, who had the management of the oracles, died and became extinct, the oracles must necessarily cease. He adds a third and more natural cause for the ceasing of oracles; namely, the forlorn state of Greece, ruined and desolated by wars; for, hence, the smallness of the gains let the priests sink into a poverty and contempt too bare to cover the fraud. That the oracles were silenced about or soon after the time of our Saviour's advent, may be proved, says Dr. Leland, in the first volume of his learned work on "The Necessity and Advantage of Revelation," etc., from express testimonies, not only of Christian but of heathen authors. Lucan, who wrote his "Pharsalia" in the reign of Nero, scarcely thirty years after our Lord's crucifixion, laments it as one of the greatest misfortunes of that age, that the Delphian oracle, which he represents as one of the choicest gifts of the gods, was become silent.

Nostra carent majore Deum, quam Delphica sedes Quod sileat.* PHARSAL., lib. v. 111.

"Of all the wants with which the age is curst,
The Delphic silence surely is the worst."—ROWE.

In like manner, Juvenal says,

Et genus humanum damnat caligo futuri.*
SAT. VI. 554.

"Since Delphi now, if we may credit fame,
Gives no responses, and a long dark night
Conceals the future hour from mortal sight."

GIFFORD.

Lucian says, that when he was at Delphi, the oracle gave no answer, nor was the priestess inspired. This likewise appears from Plutarch's treatise, why the oracles cease to give answers, already cited; whence it is also manifest, that the most learned heathens were very much at a loss how to give a tolerable account of it. Porphyry, in a passage cited from him by Eusebius, says, "The city of Rome was overrun with sickness—Æsculapius, and the rest of the gods, having withdrawn their converse with men; because, since Jesus began to be worshipped, no man had received any public help or benefit from the gods." With respect to the origin of oracles, they were probably imitations, first, of the answers given to the holy patriarchs from the Divine presence or Shechinah, and, secondly, of the responses to the Jewish high-priest from the mercy-seat; for all Paganism is a parody of the true religion.

[ORATORY, PRIESTS OF THE. The Confraternity of the Holy Trinity, founded in Italy in 1548, by Philip of Neri, for the exercise of devotion and study. It consisted of fifteen poor persons, who met in the Church of St. Saviour, on the first Sunday of every month. Several persons of distinction having joined them, Philip proceeded to establish a hospital for poor pilgrims visiting the tombs of Peter and Paul. Pope Paul IV. gave them a parochial church, St. Benedict's, near which a hospital was built. The congregation consisted of two classes: the one governed the houses of this institute, the other studied the virtues of the ecclesiastical life. The order is still flourishing.]

[ORDEAL. See JUDGMENT OF GOD.]

[ORDERS, HOLY. The office of the ministry. Papists have seven orders: three they call holy—priesthood, deaconship, and subdeaconship; four they call minor—acolyte, exorcist, reader, and porter. The priesthood is the principal, and is supposed to impress an indelible character on those who receive it. It has different degrees, as priests, bishops, (who are identified with those spoken of Acts xx. 28,) archbishops, or metropolitans, patriarchs, and the pope. The Church of England and some other Churches have three orders—bishops, priests, or presbyters, and deacons. Presbyterians, Congregationalists, some Lutherans, and others, recognize only one order, the presbyterate, no other officers being considered ministers, although they sometimes set apart lay-elders and deacons by the imposition of hands. In the primitive Church, the word ordo simply denoted the distinction between the clergy and the laity—the former being the ordo ecclesiasticus.]

[ORDERS, RELIGIOUS. Congregations living under one superior, in one manner, and wearing a common habit, as monks, canons, regular clerks, knights, and mendicants.]

[ORDINAL. The formulary of ordination.]

[ORDINARY. One who has ordinary or immediate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters in any place. The bishop is ordinary of the diocese—the archbishop of the province. The Romish canonists call the pope the ordinary of ordinaries.]

ORDINATION, the act of conferring holy orders, or of initiating a person into the ministry of the gospel, by prayer and with or without the laying on of hands. In the Church of England, ordination has always been esteemed the principal prerogative of bishops; and bishops still retain the function as a mark of their spiritual sovereignty in their diocese. Without ordination no person can receive any benefice, parsonage, vicarage, etc. A person must be twenty-three years of age, or near it, before he can be ordained deacon, or have any share in the ministry; and full twenty-four before he can be ordained priest, and by that means be permitted to administer the holy communion. A bishop, on the ordination of clergymen, is to examine them in the presence of the ministers, who, in the ordination of priests, but not of deacons, assist him at the imposition of hands; but this is only done as a mark of assent, not because it is thought necessary. In case any crime, as drunkenness, perjury, forgery, etc., is alleged against any one that is to be ordained, either priest or deacon, the bishop ought to desist from ordaining him. The person to be ordained is to bring a testimonial of his life and doctrine to the bishop, and to give an account of his faith in Latin; and both priests and deacons are obliged to subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles. In the ancient discipline there was no such thing as a vague and absolute ordination; but every one was to have a church, whereof he was to be ordained clerk or priest. In the twelfth century the bishops grew more remiss, and ordained without any title or benefice. The Council of Trent, however, restored the ancient discipline, and appointed that none should be ordained but those who were provided with a benefice; which practice still obtains in the Church of England.

[In the primitive Church the following classes were excluded from ordination—women, catechumens, neophytes, energumens, penitents, apostates, players, slaves, and freedmen who were under any obligation to their former masters; soldiers, lawyers, and civilians; maimed persons, digamists, clinics, and simonians. A deacon must be at least twenty-five years of age—presbyters and bishops thirty—though the “Apostolical Constitutions” prescribed fifty for a bishop. Candidates were subjected to a strict examination. None could be ordained to a higher grade without passing through the lower. Every one was ordained to some spiritual charge. In the first four centuries ordinations were held at any time; afterward they were confined to the Lord’s day, usually at the celebration of the eucharist. The tonsure was introduced in the sixth century—anointing in the ninth—the custom of delivering the vessels, vestments, etc., in the seventh: an open Bible, a ring, and a staff were given to a bishop, to which, in the tenth century, a mitre was added—the presbyter received the sacramental plate and cup—the deacon a copy of the Gospels—the subdeacon an empty paten and cup, with a ewer and napkin—the reader a copy of the Scriptures—the acolyte a candlestick and taper—the porter the keys of the church. The person ordained was signed with the cross, and received the kiss of charity from his ordainers. Most of these ceremonies were abolished by the Church of England in the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth; but bishops alone are allowed to confer orders in that communion—three bishops being necessary for the ordination of a bishop, and at least one bishop and two or more priests for the ordination of a presbyter.]

The Reformed hold the call of the people the only thing essential to the validity of the ministry; and teach that ordination is only a ceremony, which renders the call more august and authentic. Accordingly, the Protestant Churches of Scotland, France, Holland, Switzerland, Germany, Poland, Hungary, Denmark, etc., have no episcopal ordination. For Luther, Calvin, Bucer, Melancthon, etc., and all the first reformers and founders of these Churches who ordained ministers among them, were themselves presbyters, and no other. And though in some of these Churches there are ministers called superintendents, or bishops, yet these are only primi inter pares, the first among equals; not pretending to any superiority of orders. Having themselves no other orders than what either presbyters gave them, or what was given them as presbyters, they can convey no other to those they ordain. On this ground the Protestant Dissenters plead that their ordination, though not episcopal, is the same with that of all the illustrious Protestant Churches abroad; and object that a priest ordained by a popish bishop should be received into the Church of England as a valid minister, rightfully ordained, while the orders of another, ordained by the most learned religious presbyter which any foreign country can boast, are pronounced not valid, and he is required to submit to be ordained afresh. In opposition to episcopal ordination, they urge that Timothy was ordained by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery, 1 Tim. iv. 14; that Paul and Barnabas were ordained by certain prophets and teachers in the Church of Antioch, and not by any bishop presiding in that city, Acts xiii. 1–3; and that it is a well-known fact, that presbyters in the Church of Alexandria ordained even their own bishops for more than two hundred years in the earliest ages of Christianity. They further argue, that bishops and presbyters are in Scripture the same, and not denominations of distinct orders or offices in the Church: referring to Phil. i. 1: Titus i. 5, 7: Acts xx. 27, 28: 1 Peter v. 1, 2. To the same purpose they maintain, that the superiority of bishops to presbyters is not pretended to be of Divine, but of human institution; not grounded on Scripture, but only upon the custom or ordinances of this realm, by the first reformers and founders of the Church of England; and by many of its most learned and eminent doctors since. See Stillingfleet’s Irenicum, in which the learned author affirms and shows this to be the sentiment of Cranmer, and other chief reformers both in Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth’s reign, of Archbishop Whitgift, Bishop Bridges, Lee, Hooker, Sutcliffe, Hales, Chillingworth, etc. Moreover, the book entitled the “Institution of a Christian Man,” subscribed by the clergy in convocation, and confirmed by parliament, owns bishops and presbyters by Scripture to be the same. Besides, the Protestant Dissenters allege, that if episcopal ordination be really necessary to constitute a valid minister, it does not seem to be enjoined by the constitution of the Church of England; because the power of ordination which the bishops exercise in this kingdom is derived entirely and only from the civil magistrate; and he authoritatively prescribes how and to whom ordination is to be given: that if an ordination should be conducted in other manner and form than that prescribed by him, such ordination would be illegal and of no authority in the Church. Accordingly, the bishop, at the ordination of the candidate, asks, “Are you called according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the due order of this realm?” The constitution and law of England seem to know nothing of uninterrupted lineal descent, but consider the king vested, by act of parliament, or the suffrage of the people, with a fulness of all power ecclesiastical in these realms, as empowering and authorizing bishops to ordain; and this power of ordination was once delegated to Cromwell, a layman, as viceregent to the king. They further think it strange that the validity of orders and ministrations should be derived, as some have contended, from a succession of popish bishops; bishops of a Church which, by the definition of the nineteenth article of the Church, can be no part of the true visible Church of Christ, and bishops, likewise, who consider the Protestant clergy, although ordained by Protestant bishops, as mere common unconsecrated laymen.

On reviewing the whole of this controversy, says Dr. Watts, that since there are some texts in the New Testament wherein single persons, either apostles, as Paul and Barnabas, ordained ministers in the Churches; or evangelists, as

Timothy and Titus; and since other missions or ordinations are intimated to be performed by several persons, namely, prophets, teachers, elders, or a presbytery, Acts xiii. 1: 1 Tim. iv. 14; since there is sometimes mention made of the imposition of hands in the mission of a minister, and sometimes no mention is made of it; and since it is evident that in some cases popular ordinations are and must be valid without any bishop or elder, I think none of these differences should be made a matter of violent contest among Christians; nor ought any words to be pronounced against each other by those of the Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Independent way. Surely all may agree thus far, that various forms or modes, seeming to be used in the mission or ordination of ministers in primitive times, may give a reasonable occasion or color for sincere and honest searchers after truth to follow different opinions on this head, and do therefore demand our candid and charitable sentiments concerning those who differ from us. Among the Wesleyan Methodists, the ordination of their ministers is in the annual conference, with a president at its head, and is by prayer without imposition of hands. The latter they hold to be a circumstance of ordination, not an essential. They sometimes therefore use it, and at others omit it. The missionaries sent out by that body, if not previously ordained by the conference, are set apart by a few senior ministers; and ordinarily in this case the service of the Church of England, with some alterations, is used, with imposition of the hands of the ministers present. [The imposition of hands is now invariably used by the British Wesleyan Methodists in ordination: it has always obtained in the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States.]

[OREB. A prince of Midian, slain at a rock called Oreb, perhaps from that event, as the winepress of Zeeb derived its name in all likelihood from the fact that that prince was slain there. The names of these princes, meaning Raven and Wolf, were probably descriptive of their character. Judg. vii. 25.]

[ORGAN. עננה. Gen. iv. 21: Job xxi. 12; xxx. 31: Ps. cl. 4: Ezek. xxxiii. 31, 32. Some suppose it means wind-instruments of music in general; but it is usually thought to refer to an instrument like the Pandean pipe. The large wind-organ—so called to distinguish it from the water-organ invented by Ctesibius—was introduced into the Church in the time of Charlemagne; he having received one as a present from the Emperor Constantine Michael. This use of the organ was not approved in the east; nor did it make way in the west without opposition.]

[OSPRAY. עננה. Lev. xi. 13: Deut. xiv. 12. As the root of this word indicates strength, Bochart and others understand by it the black eagle, which Homer describes as "swiftest and strongest of the feathered race." Bate, from the termination of the word, renders it whining kite, which Parkhurst favors. Geddes and others think it is the osprey.]

[OSSENIANS. A name sometimes given to the followers of Elxai. They are said to have taught that a man may dissemble his faith. See ELCESAITES.]

OSSIFRAGE, פירס, Lev. xi. 13: Deut. xiv. 12. Interpreters are not agreed on this bird: some read "vulture," others "the black eagle," others "the falcon." The name peres, by which it is called in Hebrew, denotes "to crush, to break;" and this name agrees with our version, which implies "the bone-breaker," which name is given to a kind of eagle, from the circumstance of its habit of breaking the bones of its prey, after it has eaten the flesh: some say also that he even swallows the bones thus broken. Onkelos uses a word which signifies "naked," and leads us to the vulture: indeed, if we were to take the classes of birds in any thing like a natural order in the passages here referred to, the vulture should follow the eagle as an unclean bird. The Septuagint interpreter also renders vulture; and so do Munster, Schindler, and the Zurich versions.

OSTRICH, יננה; in Arabic neamah; in Greek οστρεοθήκη, the camel bird; and still in the east, says Niebuhr, it is called thar edjammel, "the camel bird," Lev. xi. 16: Deut. xiv. 15: Job xxx. 29: Isaiah xlii. 21; xxxiv. 13; xliii. 20: Jer. l. 39: Lam. iv. 3: Micah i. 8: יננה, Job xxxix. 13. The first name in the places above quoted is, by our own translators, generally rendered "owls." "Now it should be recollected," says the author of "Scripture Illustrated," "that the owl is not a desert bird, but rather resides in places not far from habitations, and that it is not the companion of serpents; whereas, in several of these passages, the joneh is associated with deserts, dry, extensive, thirsty deserts, and with serpents, which are their natural inhabitants. Our ignorance of the natural history of the countries which the ostrich inhabits has undoubtedly perverted the import of the above passages; but let any one peruse them afresh, and exchange the owl for the ostrich, and he will immediately discover a vigor of description, and an imagery much beyond what he had formerly perceived." The Hebrew phrase בת יננה, means "the daughter of vociferation," and is understood to be the female ostrich, probably so called from the noise which this bird makes. It is affirmed by travellers of good credit, that ostriches make a fearful, screeching, lamentable noise.

Ostriches are inhabitants of the deserts of Arabia, where they live chiefly upon vegetables;

lead a social and inoffensive life, the male assorting with the female with connubial fidelity. Their eggs are very large, some of them measuring above five inches in diameter, and weighing twelve or fifteen pounds. These birds are very prolific, laying forty or fifty eggs at a clutch. They will devour leather, glass, hair, stones, metals, or any thing that is given to them; but those substances which the coats of the stomach cannot act upon pass whole. It is so unclean an animal as to eat its own ordure as soon as it voids it. This is a sufficient reason, were others wanting, why such a fowl should be reputed unclean, and its use as an article of diet prohibited. "The ostrich," says M. Buffon, "was known in the remotest ages, and mentioned in the most ancient books. How, indeed, could an animal so remarkably large, and so wonderfully prolific, and peculiarly suited to the climate as is the ostrich, remain unknown in Africa, and part of Asia, countries peopled from the earliest ages, full of deserts indeed, but where there is not a spot which has not been traversed by the foot of man? The family of the ostrich, therefore, is of great antiquity. Nor in the course of ages has it varied or degenerated from its native purity. It has always remained on its paternal estate; and its lustre has been transmitted, unsullied by foreign intercourse. In short, it is among the birds what the elephant is among the quadrupeds, a distinct race, widely separated from all the others by characters as striking as they are invariable." "On the least noise," says Dr. Shaw, "or trivial occasion, she forsakes her eggs, or her young ones, to which, perhaps, she never returns; or if she does, it may be too late either to restore life to the one, or to preserve the lives of the others. Agreeably to this account, the Arabs meet, sometimes, with whole nests of these eggs undisturbed: some of them are sweet and good, others are addle and corrupted; others again have their young ones of different growth, according to the time, it may be presumed, they have been forsaken of the dam. The Arabs often meet with a few of the little ones, no bigger than well-grown pullets, half starved, straggling and moaning about like so many distressed orphans for their mother. In this manner the ostrich may be said to be hardened against her young ones as though they were not hers; her labor in hatching and attending them so far being vain, without fear or the least concern of what becomes of them afterward. This want of affection is also recorded, Lam. iv. 3: 'The daughter of my people is become cruel, like ostriches in the wilderness;' that is, by apparently deserting their own, and receiving others in return." Natural affection and sagacious instinct are the grand instruments by which Providence continues the race of other animals; but no limits can be set to the wisdom and power of God. He preserveth the breed of the ostrich without those means, and even in a penury of all the necessities of life. Notwithstanding the stupidity of this animal, its Creator hath amply provided for its safety, by endowing it with extraordinary swiftness, and a surprising apparatus for escaping from its enemy. They, when they raise themselves up for flight, "laugh at the horse and his rider." They afford him an opportunity only of admiring at a distance the extraordinary agility and the stateliness likewise of their motions, the richness of their plumage, and the great propriety there was in ascribing to them an expanded quivering wing. Nothing certainly can be more entertaining than such a sight, the wings, by their rapid but unwearied vibrations, equally serving them for sails and oars; while their feet, no less assisting in conveying them out of sight, seem to be insensible of fatigue.

The eastern oven is sometimes nothing but a round hole in the earth, into which stones are put, and a fire kindled upon them. When the stones are hot, the dough is spread upon them and turned as often as necessary. Sometimes they are five or six feet deep, large enough to barbecue a sheep. Sometimes the oven is an earthen vessel without a bottom, lined with clay, and placed on a frame: the fire is made below it, and when the sides are heated, the dough is spread upon them and quickly baked. Sometimes a cylindrical jar, partly filled with pebbles, is heated, and the dough spread outside; when baked, it comes off in thin cakes.]

OWL. There are several varieties of this species, all too well known to need a particular description. They are nocturnal birds of prey, and have their eyes better adapted for discerning objects in the evening or twilight than in the glare of day. 1. בֵּיט, Lev. xi. 17: Deut. xiv. 16: Psalm cii. 6, is in our version rendered "the little owl" Aquila, Theodotion, Jerome, Kimchi, and most of the older interpreters, are quoted to justify this rendering. Michaelis, at some length, supports the opinion that it is the horned owl. Bochart, though with some hesitation, suspected it to be the onocrotalus, a kind of pelican, because the Hebrew name signifies cup, and the pelican is remarkable for a pouch or bag under the lower jaw; but there are good reasons for supposing that bird to be the קָמָר of the next verse. Dr. Geddes thinks this bird the cormorant; and as it begins the list of water-fowl, and is mentioned always in the same contexts with קָמָר, confessedly a water-bird, his opinion may be adopted. 2. יֵבֶשֶׁת, Lev. xi. 17: Deut. xiv. 16: Isaiah xxxiv. 11. In the first two places, our translators render this "the great owl," which is strangely placed after the little owl, and among water-birds. "Our translators," says the author of "Scripture Illustrated," "seem to have thought the owl a convenient bird, as we have three owls in two verses." Some critics think it means a species of night bird, because the word may be derived from בָּרָא, which signifies the twilight, the time when owls fly about. But this interpretation, says Parkhurst, seems very forced; and since it is mentioned among water-fowls, and the LXX. have, in the first and last of those texts, rendered it by ἵβυς, the ibis, we are disposed to adopt it here, and think the evidence strengthened by this, that in the Coptic version of Lev. xi. 17, it is called ip or hip, which, with a Greek termination, would very easily make ἵβυς. 3. קִפִּין, which occurs only in Isaiah xxxiv. 15, is in our version rendered "the great owl." [As the word comes from a root meaning to leap or skip, Bochart thinks it denotes a serpent called ἀκόντιας, jaculus, the darter.] 4. לַיְלִית, Isa. xxxiv. 14, in our version "the screech owl." The root signifies night; and as undoubtedly a bird frequenting dark places and ruins is referred to, we must admit some kind of owl.

A place of lonely desolation, where
The screeching tribe and pelicans abide,
And the dun ravens croak mid ruins drear,
And moaning owls from man the farthest hide.

[See OSTRICH.]

OX, בָּקָר—in Arabic, bækerre and bykar—the male of horned cattle of the beeve kind, at full age, when fit for the plough. Younger ones are called bullocks. Michaelis, in his elaborate work on the laws of Moses, has proved that castration was never practiced. The rural economy of the Israelites led them to value the ox as by far the most important of domestic animals, from the consideration of his great use in all the operations of farming. In the patriarchal ages, the ox constituted no inconsiderable portion of their wealth. Thus, Abraham is said to be very rich in cattle, Gen. xxiv. 35. Men of every age and country have been much indebted to the labors of this animal. So early as in the days of Job, who was probably contemporary with Isaac, "the oxen were ploughing, and the asses were feeding beside them," when the Sabeans fell upon them, and took them away. In times long posterior, when Elijah was commissioned to anoint Elisha, the son of Shaphat, prophet in his stead, he found him ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen. 1 Kings xix. 19. For many ages the hopes of oriental husbandmen depended entirely on their labors. This was so much the case in the time of Solomon, that he observes, in one of his proverbs, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean," or rather empty; "but much increase is by the strength of the ox." Prov. xiv. 4. The ass, in the course of ages, was compelled to bend his stubborn neck to the yoke, and share the labors of the ox; but still the preparation of the ground in the time of spring depended chiefly on the more powerful exertions of the latter. When this animal was employed in bringing home the produce of the harvest, he was regaled with a mixture of chaff, chopped straw, and various kinds of grain, moistened with acidulated water. But among the Jews, the ox was best fed when employed in treading out the corn; for the Divine law, in many of whose precepts the benevolence of the Deity conspicuously shines, forbade to muzzle him, and, by consequence, to prevent him from eating what he would of the grain he was employed to separate from the husks. The ox was also compelled to the labor of dragging the cart or wagon. The number of oxen commonly yoked to one cart appears to have been two. Num. vii. 3, 7, 8: 1 Sam. vi. 7: 2 Sam. vi. 3, 6.

The wild ox, אֵרֶבֶב, Deut. xiv. 5, is supposed to be the oryx of the Greeks, which is a species of large stag. [Pliny reckons the oryx among the wood-goats, rendered "wild bull" in Isa. li. 20, is supposed to be the same animal.]

PADAN-ARAM, called also Sedan-aram in Hosea; both names denoting Aram or Syria the fruitful, or cultivated, and apply to the northern part of Mesopotamia, in which Haran or Charan was situated. See MESOPOTAMIA.

[PAGANIZERS. A sect in the eighth century that blended heathenism with Christianity; hence called ETHNOPHRONES.]

PAGANS, heathens, and particularly those who worship idols. The term came into use after the establishment of Christianity, the cities and great towns affording the first converts. The heathens were called Pagans, from pagus, "a village," because they were then found chiefly in remote country places; but we use the term commonly for all who do not receive the Jewish, Christian, or Mohammedan religions.

PAINTING THE FACE. 2 Kings ix. 30. See EYES.

[PALACE. דִּירָה. Haichal denotes the sanctuary of the tabernacle, 1 Sam. i. 9, and of the temple, 1 Kings vi. 5: also the tabernacle or temple at large, Ps. xlviii. 10, (9, Eng.,) Isa. xlv. 28, and the temple or palace of God in heaven. Ps. xi. 4; xviii. 7, (6, Eng.) It also denotes a palace or residence of a king. 1 Kings xxi. 1: 2 Kings xx. 18: Dan. iv. 26, (29, Eng.) Ivory palaces, Ps. xlv. 9, (8, Eng.,) may mean palaces or wardrobes, inwrought with ivory, or perfumed caskets or vases, made of ivory. See IVORY. אֹתֵלֶת means a court-yard, Matt. xxvi. 69: Rev. xi. 2; also a large house, as the dwelling of the high-priest, Mark xiv. 66, or of a man of rank, Luke xi. 21, as the prætorium, occupied by the Roman governor, Mark xv. 16.]

[PALATINI. Subdeacons—the immediate assistants of the bishops.]

PALESTINE, taken in a limited sense, denotes the country of the Philistines or Palestines, including that part of the Land of Promise which extended along the Mediterranean Sea from Gaza south to Lydda north. The LXX. were of opinion that the word Philistim, which they generally translate Allophylti, signified "strangers," or men of another tribe. Palestine, taken in a more general sense, signifies the whole country of Canaan, the whole Land of Promise, as well beyond as on this side Jordan, though pretty frequently it is restrained to the country on this side that river; so that in later times the words Judea and Palestine were synonymous. We find, also, the name of Syria Palestina given to the Land of Promise, and even sometimes this province is comprehended in Cælo-Syria, or the Lower Syria. Herodotus is the most ancient writer we know that speaks of Syria Palestina. He places it between Phenicia and Egypt. See CANAAN.

[The length of Palestine from Mount Hermon to Kadesh-barnea is one hundred and ninety-three miles; its average breadth seventy-five miles; the area contains about eleven thousand square miles. In the fifth century it was divided into Palestina Prima, embracing all the country south of Samaria; Secunda, all north; and Tertia, all the region east and south of the Dead Sea, extending across the 'Arabah so as to embrace Beersheba and Elusa. These divisions had each a metropolitan see, viz., at Cæsarea, Seythopolis, and Petra. When the Council of Chalcedon erected Jerusalem into a patriarchate, these provinces were placed under it.]

[PALLIUM. A part of the pontifical dress, worn always by the pope whenever and wherever he officiates; and by patriarchs and archbishops, in their own churches, on certain festivals. It was formerly a cloth of white linen; it is now a band made of the wool of white sheep, which are blessed annually on the feast of St. Agnes, in her church on the Nomentan Way at Rome. The sheep are fed by the subdeacons of the Apostolic College. The palls made of their wool are laid over the tomb of Peter and Paul on the eve of their festival; and then delivered over to a subdeacon, to be kept till sent to those who are entitled to wear them.—The covering of the altar was sometimes called a pall.]

[PALMERS. Pilgrims returning from the Holy Land with palm-branches, which they offer at the altar in recognition of their success.]

PALMER WORM, דור, Joel i. 4: Amos iv. 9. Bochart says that it is a kind of locust, furnished with very sharp teeth, with which it gnaws off grass, corn, leaves of trees, and even their bark. The Jews support this idea by deriving the word from דור or דור, to cut, to shear, or mince. Notwithstanding the unanimous sentiments of the Jews that this is a locust, yet the LXX. read κίρπι, and the Vulgate eruca, “a caterpillar;” which rendering is supported by Fuller. Michaelis agrees with this opinion, and thinks that the sharp cutting teeth of the caterpillar, which, like a sickle, clear away all before them, might give name to this insect. Caterpillars also begin their ravages before the locust, which seems to coincide with the nature of the creature here intended.

[PALM-SUNDAY. The Sunday before Easter, so called because the multitude strewed palm-branches before Christ in his entry into Jerusalem, just before his passion.]

PALM TREE, דמר, Exodus xv. 27, etc. This tree, sometimes called the date tree, grows plentifully in the east. It rises to a great height. The stalks are generally full of rugged knots, which are the vestiges of the decayed leaves; for the trunk of this tree is not solid, like other trees, but its centre is filled with pith, round which is a tough bark full of strong fibres when young, which, as the tree grows old, hardens and becomes ligneous. To this bark the leaves are closely joined, which in the centre rise erect; but, after they are advanced above the vagina which surrounds them, they expand very wide on every side the stem; and, as the older leaves decay, the stalk advances in height. The leaves, when the tree has grown to a size for bearing fruit, are six or eight feet long, are very broad when spread out, and are used for covering the tops of houses, etc. The fruit, which is called date, grows below the leaves in clusters, and is of a sweet and agreeable taste. The learned Kæmpfer, as a botanist, an antiquary, and a traveller, has exhausted the whole subject of palm trees. “The diligent natives,” says Mr. Gibbon, “celebrated, either in verse or prose, the three hundred and sixty uses to which the trunk, the branches, the leaves, the juice, and the fruit, were skilfully applied.” “The extensive importance of the date tree,” says Dr. E. D. Clarke, “is one of the most curious subjects to which a traveller can direct his attention. A considerable part of the inhabitants of Egypt, of Arabia, and Persia, subsist almost entirely upon its fruit. They boast also of its medicinal virtues. Their camels feed upon the date stone. From the leaves they make couches, baskets, bags, mats, and brushes; from the branches, cages for their poultry, and fences for their gardens; from the fibres of the boughs, thread, ropes, and rigging; from the sap is prepared a spirituous liquor; and the body of the tree furnishes fuel. It is even said that from one variety of the palm tree, the phenix farinifera, meal has been extracted, which is found among the fibres of the trunk, and has been used for food.”

In the temple of Solomon were pilasters made in the form of palm trees. 1 Kings vi. 29. It was under a tree of this kind that Deborah dwelt between Ramah and Bethel. Judges iv. 5. To the fair, flourishing, and fruitful condition of this tree, the Psalmist very aptly compares the votary of virtue, Psalm xcii. 12, 13, 14:

The righteous shall flourish like a palm tree.
Those that are planted in the house of Jehovah,
In the courts of our God, shall flourish:
In old age they shall still put forth buds,
They shall be full of sap and vigorous.

The palm tree is crowned at its top with a large tuft of spiring leaves about four feet long, which never fall off, but always continue in the same flourishing verdure. The tree, as Dr. Shaw was informed, is in its greatest vigor about thirty years after it is planted, and continues in full vigor seventy years longer; bearing all this while, every year, about three or four hundred pounds' weight of dates. The trunk of the tree is remarkably straight and lofty. Jeremiah, speaking of the idols that were carried in procession, says they were upright as the palm tree. Jer. x. 5. And for erect stature and slenderness of form, the spouse, in Canticles vii. 7, is compared to this tree:

How framed, O my love, for delights!
Lo, thy stature is like a palm tree,
And thy bosom like clusters of dates.

On this passage Mr. Good observes, that “the very word tamar, here used for the palm tree, and whose radical meaning is ‘straight,’ or ‘upright,’ (whence it was afterward applied to pillars or columns, as well as to the palm,) was also a general name among the ladies of Palestine, and unquestionably adopted in honor of the stature they had already acquired, or gave a fair promise of attaining.”

A branch of palm was a signal of victory, and was carried before conquerors in the triumphs. To this, allusion is made, Rev. vii. 9; and for this purpose were they borne before Christ in his way to Jerusalem. John xii. 13. From the inspissated sap of the tree, a kind of honey, or dibs, as it is called, is produced, little inferior to that of bees. The same juice, after fermentation, makes a sort of wine much used in the east. It is once mentioned as wine, Num. xxviii. 7: Exodus xxix. 40; and by it is intended the strong drink, Isaiah v. 11; xxiv. 9. Theodoret and Chrysostom, on these places, both Syrians, and unexceptionable witnesses in what belongs to their own country, confirm this declaration. "This liquor," says Dr. Shaw, "which has a more luscious sweetness than honey, is of the consistence of a thin syrup, but quickly grows tart and ropy, acquiring an intoxicating quality, and giving by distillation an agreeable spirit, or arâky, according to the general name of these people for all hot liquors, extracted by the alembic." Its Hebrew name is סכר, the σικερά of the Greeks; and from its sweetness, probably, the saccharum of the Romans. Jerome informs us that in Hebrew "any inebriating liquor is called sicera, whether made of grain, the juice of apples, honey, dates, or any other fruit."

This tree was formerly of great value and esteem among the Israelites, and so very much cultivated in Judea, that in after times it became the emblem of that country, as may be seen in a medal of the Emperor Vespasian upon the conquest of Judea. It represents a captive woman sitting under a palm tree, with this inscription, "Judea capta;" [Judea captivated;] and upon a Greek coin, likewise, of his son Titus, struck upon the like occasion, we see a shield suspended upon a palm tree, with a Victory writing upon it. Pliny also calls Judea palmis incluta, "renowned for palms." Jericho, in particular, was called "the city of palms," Deut. xxxiv. 3; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15; because, as Josephus, Strabo, and Pliny have remarked, it anciently abounded in palm trees. And so Dr. Shaw remarks, that though these trees are not now either plentiful or fruitful in other parts of the Holy Land, yet there are several of them at Jericho, where there is the convenience they require of being often watered; where, likewise, the climate is warm, and the soil sandy, such as they thrive and delight in. Tamar, a city built in the desert by Solomon—1 Kings ix. 18; Ezekiel xlvii. 19; xlviii. 28—was probably so named from the palm trees growing about it; as it was afterward by the Romans called Palmyra, or rather Palmira, on the same account, from palma, "a palm tree."

PALSY. See DISEASES.

PAMPHYLIA, a province of Asia Minor which gives name to that part of the Mediterranean Sea which washes its coast. Acts xxvii. 5. To the south it is bounded by the Mediterranean, and to the north by Pisidia; having Lycia to the west, and Cilicia to the east. Paul and Barnabas preached at Perga, in Pamphylia. Acts xiii. 13; xiv. 24. [It is now called Teké-İli, and forms part of Karamania. See PERGA.]

[PANDECTS. This word, meaning containing all, is usually applied to the five hundred and thirty-four legal decisions, digested by order of Justinian, constituting the first part of the civil law.—Papias applied it to the Old and New Testaments.]

PANTHEISM, a doctrine into which some of the sages of antiquity fell by revolting at the monstrous absurdities of Polytheism. Not knowing the true God as an infinite and personal subsistence, a cause above and distinct from all effects, they believed that God was every thing, and every thing God. This monstrous, and in its effects immoral, notion, is still held by the Brahmins of India. [See OMNIPRESENCE.]

PAPER REED, בבא, Exod. ii. 3: Job viii. 11: Isaiah xviii. 2; xxxv. 7. When the outer skin, or bark, is taken off, there are several films, or inner pellicles, one within another. These, when separated from the stalk, were laid on a table artfully matched and flatted together, and moistened with the water of the Nile, which, dissolving the glutinous juices of the plant, caused them to adhere closely together. They were afterward pressed, and then dried in the sun, and thus were prepared sheets or leaves for writing upon in characters marked by a colored liquid passing through a hollow reed. The best papyrus was called leparatiky, or paper of the priests. On this the sacred documents of Egypt were written. Ancient books were written on papyrus, and those of the New Testament among the rest. In the fourth century, however, these sacred writings are found on skins. This was preferred for durability; and many decayed copies of the New Testament, belonging to libraries, were early transferred to parchment. Finally came paper, the name of which was taken from the Egyptian reed; but the materials of which it was fabricated were cotton and linen. See BULRUSH and BOOK.

PAPHOS, a celebrated city of Cyprus, lying on the western coast of the island, where Venus (who from thence took the name of Paphia) had her most ancient and most famous temple; and here the Roman proconsul, Sergius Paulus, resided, whom St. Paul converted to Christianity. Acts xiii. 6. [According to the Greek mythology, Venus landed here when she rose from the sea. Here she was worshipped with impure rites imported from Assyria or Phœnicia, and which, as Athanasius expresses it, constituted the "deification of lust." It was resorted to by pilgrims from various countries. Profligate processions were made to it, at stated periods, from New Paphos, which was on the sea-shore ten miles north. The new city was built at a time when navigation had become more secure than when the old city was founded. Old Paphos was nearly two miles from the sea, on the verge of a plain, watered by a small stream. A short time before it was visited by Paul and Barnabas, it had been destroyed by an earthquake, but Augustus had rebuilt it, and from him it was called Augusta or Sebaste. But the Paphos of Strabo and Luke became the Papho of the Venetians, and the Baffa of the Turks—a miserable collection of dwellings inhabited by Greeks and Mohammedans, amid ruins of palaces, temples, and churches, the remains of the ancient cities which in succession occupied this site. The Roman governor who resided here was not called ἡγεμὼν, proprætor, but ἀνθύπατος, proconsul, as Cyprus was a province of the senate; for though it was first retained by the emperor, it was afterward given to the senate in exchange for another district.]

PARABLE, παραβολή—formed from παραβάλλειν, to oppose or compare—an allegorical instruction, founded on something real or apparent in nature or history, from which a moral is drawn, by comparing it with some other thing in which the people are more immediately concerned. (See ALLEGORY.) Aristotle defines parable, a similitude drawn from form to form. Cicero calls it a collation; others, a simile. F. de Colonia calls it a rational fable; but it may be founded on real occurrences, as many parables of our Saviour were. The Hebrews call it משל, from a word which signifies either to predominate or to assimilate: the Proverbs of Solomon are by them also called משלים, parables, or proverbs.

Parable, according to the eminently learned Bishop Lowth, is that kind of allegory which consists of a continued narration of a fictitious or accommodated event, applied to the illustration of some important truth. The Greeks call these alvai, allegories, or apologues; the Latins fabule, or "fables;" and the writings of the Phrygian sage, or those composed in imitation of him, have acquired the greatest celebrity. Nor has our Saviour himself disdained to adopt the same method of instruction; of whose parables it is doubtful whether they excel most in wisdom and utility, or in sweetness, elegance, and perspicuity. As the appellation of parable has been applied to his discourses of this kind, the term is now restricted from its former extensive signification to a more confined sense. But this species of composition occurs very frequently in the prophetic poetry, and particularly in that of Ezekiel. If to us they should sometimes appear obscure, we must remember, that in those early times when the prophetic writings were indited, it was universally the mode throughout all the eastern nations to convey sacred truths under mysterious figures and representations. In order to our forming a more certain judgment upon this subject, Dr. Lowth has briefly explained some of the primary qualities of the poetic parables; so that, by considering the general nature of them, we may decide more accurately on the merits of particular examples.

It is the first excellence of a parable to turn upon an image well known and applicable to the subject, the meaning of which is clear and definite; for this circumstance will give it perspicuity, which is essential to every species of allegory. If the parables of the sacred prophets are examined by this rule, they will not be found deficient. They are in general founded upon such imagery as is frequently used, and similarly applied by way of metaphor and comparison in the Hebrew poetry. Examples of this kind occur in the parable of the deceitful vineyard, Isaiah v. 1-7, and of the useless vine, Ezek. xv. xix. 10-14; for under this imagery the ungrateful people of God are more than once described. Ezek. xix. 1-9; xxxi. xvi. xxiii. Moreover, the image must not only be apt and familiar, but it must be also elegant and beautiful in itself; since it is the purpose of a poetic parable, not only to explain more perfectly some proposition, but frequently to give it some animation and splendor. As the imagery from natural objects is in this respect superior to all others, the parables of the sacred poets consist chiefly of this kind of imagery. It is also essential to the elegance of a parable, that the imagery should not only be apt and beautiful, but that all its parts and appendages should be perspicuous and pertinent. Of all these excellences, there cannot be more perfect examples than the parables that have been just specified: to which we may add the well-known parable of Nathan, 2 Sam. xii. 1-4, although written in prose, as well as that of Jotham, Judges ix. 7-15, which appears to be the most ancient extant, and approaches somewhat nearer to the poetical form. It is also the criterion of a parable, that it be consistent throughout, and that the literal be never confounded with the figurative sense; and in this respect it materially differs from that species of allegory called the continued metaphor. Isaiah v. 1-7. It should be considered, that the continued metaphor and the parable have a very different view. The sole intention of the former is to embellish a subject, to represent it more magnificently, or at the most to illustrate it, that, by describing it in more elevated language, it may strike the mind more forcibly; but the intent of the latter is to withdraw the truth for a moment from our sight, in order to conceal whatever it may contain ungrateful or reproving, and to enable it secretly to insinuate itself, and obtain an ascendancy as it were by stealth. There is, however, a species of parable, the intent of which is only to illustrate the subject: such is that remarkable one of the cedar of Lebanon, Ezek. xxxi.; than which, if we consider the imagery itself, none was ever more apt or more beautiful; or the description and coloring, none was ever more elegant or splendid; in which, however, the poet has occasionally allowed himself to blend the figurative with the literal description, verses 11, 14-17: whether he has done this because the peculiar nature of this kind of parable required it, or whether his own fervid imagination alone, which disdained the stricter rules of composition, was his guide, our learned author can scarcely presume to determine.

In the New Testament, the word parable is used variously: in Luke iv. 23, for a proverb, or adage; in Matt. xv. 15, for a thing darkly and figuratively expressed; in Heb. ix. 9, etc., for a type; in Luke xiv. 7, etc., for a special instruction; in Matt. xxiv. 32, for a similitude or comparison.

[PARABOLANI. Christian martyrs who were exposed to wild beasts, the name being the common appellation of those who fought with wild beasts in the amphitheatre.—There was also an order of men in the Church, whose office it was to attend the sick in time of pestilence, to whom this name was given, because they perilled their lives in performing this service.]

[PARACELSISTS. Philosophers of the sixteenth century, sometimes called Theosophists, because they taught that a Divine illumination is necessary in order to arrive at truth. They are also called Fire-philosophers, because they held that the intimate essences of natural things are known only by the trying effects of fire. One of them, Daniel Hoffman, absurdly maintained that what is true in philosophy may be false in theology—an opinion which, after a bitter controversy, he was forced to retract.

They are called Paracelsists from Paracelsus, one of their leaders, an eminent physician and chemist.]

[PARACLETE. Παράκλητος. This word literally means, one who is called in to assist another in a judicial proceeding. It is thus applied to Christ in 1 John ii. 1. Christ is our advocate, intercessor, or patron, as he pleads our cause with the Father. In John xiv. 16, 26; xv. 26; xvi. 7, it is applied to the Holy Ghost, and is variously rendered comforter, teacher, exhorter, monitor, advocate, intercessor, helper, patron. As helper or patron has a more extended meaning than any of the other terms, and as the Spirit is said to help our infirmities by making intercession for us, and otherwise befriending us, Christ may have used the word in this general sense, when he spoke of the Holy Ghost as "another Paraclete," who should be sent to supply his place after his ascension. See Pearson on the Creed, Art. viii.; and Campbell, A. Clarke, and Bloomfield, on John xiv. 16.]

PARADISE, according to the original meaning of the term, whether it be of Hebrew, Chaldean, or Persian derivation, signifies, "a place enclosed for pleasure and delight." The LXX., or Greek translators of the Old Testament, make use of the word paradise, when they speak of the garden of Eden, which Jehovah planted at the creation, and in which he placed our first parents. There are three places in the Hebrew text of the Old Testament where this word is found, namely, Neh. ii. 8: Cant. iv. 13: Eccles. ii. 5. The term paradise is obviously used in the New Testament as another word for heaven: by our Lord, Luke xxiii. 43; by the Apostle Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 4; and in the Apocalypse, ii. 7. See EDEN.

PARAN, DESERT OF, a "great and terrible wilderness" which the children of Israel entered after leaving Mount Sinai, Num. x. 12: Deut. i. 19; and in which thirty-eight of their forty years of wandering were spent. It extended from Mount Sinai on the south, to the southern border of the land of Canaan on the north; having the desert of Shur, with its subdivisions, the deserts of Etham and Sin, on the west, and the eastern branch of the Red Sea, the desert of Zin, and Mount Seir, on the east. Burckhardt represents this desert, which he entered from that of Zin, or valley of El Araba, about the parallel of Suez, as a dreary expanse of calcareous soil, covered with black fints.

[PARANYMPH. The attendant of the bridegroom. It was his business to accompany the bridal pair to church, to act as sponsor, assist in the ceremonies, and preside at the festivities. Compare Judges xiv. 20: John iii. 29.]

[PARASCEVE. The word means preparation, and is applied to the day before Good Friday, when the candidates for baptism repeated the creed before the bishop.]

[PARCHED GROUND. שָׂרִיב, Isa. xxxv. 7, rendered heat in Isa. xlix. 10, appears to mean the mirage of the desert. The word occurs in the Koran: "As for the unbelievers, their works are like the serab of the plain: the thirsty imagines it water, but when he reaches it he finds it nothing." Serab signifies that false appearance seen on sandy plains about noon, resembling a large lake of water in motion, produced by the refraction of the rays of light during the exhalation of vapors by the sun. It tempts the thirsty traveller out of his way, but of course only deceives him, by either going forward or vanishing away. The world is deceptive like a mirage, but the reign of Christ brings rest and refreshment: it makes "the parched ground become a pool."]

[PARCHMENT. Μεμβράνα, 2 Tim. iv. 13. From Herodotus it appears that the skins of beasts were used to write on in very ancient times; but they were not well prepared for the purpose until the time of Eumenes, King of Pergamus, when and where a better mode was discovered; hence the name by which they are called, pergamena, corrupted to parchments. Those to which Paul referred are supposed by some to have been his adversaria, or commonplace books, containing extracts from the works which he had read; others suppose they were copies of the Hebrew Scriptures and the Septuagint, which he wished to bequeathe to some of his friends.]

[PARDON. See FORGIVENESS and JUSTIFICATION.]

[PARDONS. See INDULGENCES.]

[PARISH. The ancient παροικία included the towns, villages, and rural neighborhoods, near a city, which were placed with it under the jurisdiction of a bishop; whereas a diocese was applied to the jurisdiction of a presbyter. The words in modern times have interchanged their meanings. The division of England into parishes can be traced back as far as the reign of Edward the Confessor. Parish schools for the education of young persons for the ministry were formed at an early period.]

[PARMENAS. One of the seven deacons. Acts vi. 5.]

[PARSON. In the Church of England, one who has full possession of the rights of a parish church—having the four requisites, holy orders, presentation, institution, and induction. Some assign to the word the same etymology as to parish. Blackstone says, "He is called parson, persona, because by his person the Church, which is an invisible body, is represented."]

[PARTHIANS. Acts ii. 9. Originally the inhabitants of a small mountainous district, north-east of Media. Afterward this province was extended into a great kingdom. The Parthians were of Scythian origin: they formed a part of the army of Xerxes, and were noted for their skill in archery—especially for shooting behind them as they retreated from the enemy. They spoke the Persian language.]

PARTRIDGE, פָּרָדִיז, 1 Sam. xxvi. 20: Jer. xvii. 11; πέροδιξ, Eccus. xi. 30. In the first of these places David says, "The king of Israel is come out to hunt a partridge on the mountains;" and in the second, "The partridge sitteth," on eggs, "and produceth," or hatcheth, "not: so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be contemptible." This passage does not necessarily imply that the partridge hatches the eggs of a stranger, but only that she often fails in her attempts to bring forth her young. To such disappointments she is greatly exposed from the position of her nest on the ground, where her eggs are often spoiled by the wet, or crushed by the foot. So he that broods over his ill-gotten gains will often find them unproductive; or, if he leaves them, as a bird occasionally driven from her nest, may be despoiled of their possession. As to the hunting of the partridge, which, Dr. Shaw observes, is the greater, or red-legged kind, the traveller says: "The Arabs have another, though a more laborious, method of catching these birds; for, observing that they become languid and fatigued after they have been hastily put up twice or thrice, they immediately run in upon them, and knock them down with their zerwattys, or bludgeons, as we should call them." Precisely in this manner Saul hunted David, coming hastily upon him, putting him up incessantly, in hopes that at length his strength and resources would fail, and he would become an easy prey to his pursuer. Forskall mentions a partridge whose name in Arabic is kurr; and Latham says that in the province of Andalusia, in Spain, the name of the partridge is churr; both taken, no doubt, like the Hebrew, from its note.

[PARVAIM. 2 Chron. iii. 6. Some identify Parvaim with Sephervaim: others with Ceylon, or Taprobane, which Bochart derives from taph, the border, and Parvan, the coast of Parvan, which he identifies also with Ophir. Gesenius thinks it means the east. The Rabbins derive it from parim, heifers, the gold of Parvaim meaning gold of the color of heifers' blood. The Vulgate renders, the best gold.]

[PASAGINI, PASAGINIANS. A sect of Arians, in the twelfth century, in Lombardy, who are said to have observed all the Mosaic ceremonies, except sacrifices.]

[PASCH. The Passover. Easter.]

[PASHUR. Immer's son, who smote Jeremiah and put him in the stocks, Jer. xx. 1-6.—Also, a son of Melchiah, officer of Zedekiah, and enemy of Jeremiah. Ezra ix. 38: Jer. xxi. 1; xxxviii. 1-6.]

[PASSALORYNCHITES, PATTALORYNCHIANS. This name, from πάσσαλος, a nail, and διν, a nostril, was applied to a branch of the Montanists, who are said to have kept one finger constantly on the mouth, touching perhaps the nose, to indicate the necessity of perpetual silence.]

[PASSION. Sometimes this means suffering, as the last suffering of Christ. Acts i. 3. Πάθημα is rendered suffering, Rom. viii. 18: 2 Cor. i. 5: Heb. ii. 9. It is used in the plural for the emotions or affections, Rom. vii. 5: Gal. v. 24. Compare Acts xiv. 15: Jas. v. 17.]

[PASSION-WEEK. The week before Easter, so called in commemoration of our Lord's sufferings. It is also called the Holy Week and the Great Week. It was observed with great strictness by the early Christians, and some of the emperors released prisoners and suspended lawsuits in honor of the solemn season.]

PASSOVER, פסח, signifies leap, passage. The passover was a solemn festival of the Jews, instituted in commemoration of their coming out of Egypt; because the night before their departure the destroying angel that slew the first-born of the Egyptians passed over the houses of the Hebrews without entering them, because they were marked with the blood of the lamb, which, for this reason, was called the paschal lamb. The following is what God ordained concerning the passover: The month of the coming out of Egypt was after this to be the first month of the sacred or ecclesiastical year; and the fourteenth day of this month, between the two evenings—that is, between the sun's decline and its setting, or rather, according to our reckoning, between three o'clock in the afternoon and six in the evening, at the equinox—they were to kill the paschal lamb, and to abstain from leavened bread. The day following, being the fifteenth, reckoned from six o'clock of the preceding evening, was the grand feast of the passover, which continued seven days; but only the first and seventh days were peculiarly solemn. The slain lamb was to be without defect, a male, and of that year. If no lamb could be found, they might take a kid. They killed a lamb or a kid in each family; and if the number of the family were not sufficient to eat the lamb, they might associate two families together. With the blood of the lamb they sprinkled the door-posts and lintel of every house, that the destroying angel at the sight of the blood might pass over them. They were to eat the lamb the same night, roasted, with unleavened bread, and a salad of wild lettuces, or bitter herbs. It was forbidden to eat any part of it raw, or boiled; nor were they to break a bone; but it was to be eaten entire, even with the head, the feet, and the bowels. If any thing remained to the day following, it was thrown into the fire. Exod. xii. 46: Num. ix. 12: John xix. 36. They who ate it were to be in the posture of travellers, having their reins girt, shoes on their feet, staves in their hands, and eating in a hurry. This last part of the ceremony was but little observed; at least, it was of no obligation after that night when they came out of Egypt. During the whole eight days of the passover no leavened bread was to be used. They kept the first and last day of the feast; yet it was allowed to dress victuals, which was forbidden on the Sabbath-day. The obligation of keeping the passover was so strict, that whoever should neglect it was condemned to death. Num. ix. 13. But those who had any lawful impediment, as a journey, sickness, or uncleanness, voluntary or involuntary—for example, those who had been present at a funeral, etc., were to defer the celebration of the passover till the second month of the ecclesiastical year, the fourteenth day of the month Iair, which answers to April and May. We see an example of this postponed passover under Hezekiah. 2 Chron. xxx. 2, 3, etc.

The modern Jews observe in general the ceremonies practiced by their ancestors in the celebration of the passover. While the temple was in existence, the Jews brought their lambs thither, and there sacrificed them; and they offered their blood to the priest, who poured it out at the foot of the altar. The paschal lamb was an illustrious type of Christ, who became a sacrifice for the redemption of a lost world from sin and misery; but resemblances between the type and antitype have been strained by many writers into a great number of fanciful particulars. It is enough for us to be assured, that as Christ is called "our passover," and the "Lamb of God," without "spot," by the "sprinkling of whose blood" we are delivered from guilt and punishment; and as faith in him is represented to us as "eating the flesh of Christ," with evident allusion to the eating of the paschal sacrifice; so, in these leading particulars, the mystery of our redemption was set forth. The paschal lamb, therefore, prefigured the offering of the spotless Son of God, the appointed propitiation for the sins of the whole world; by virtue of which, when received by faith, we are delivered from the bondage of guilt and misery, and nourished with strength for our heavenly journey to that land of rest, of which Canaan, as early as the days of Abraham, became the Divinely instituted figure.

[PASTOPHORIA. The Septuagint and Josephus use this word to designate the chambers in the outer court of the temple: the fathers appropriate it to the side buildings of churches, used by ecclesiastical officers and for the sacred vessels. Παστορος was a kind of veil used in the worship of Isis and Osiris: the priests who carried it were called pastophori; and their places of residence pastophoria.]

[PASTOR. Ποιμήν. A shepherd, Luke ii. 8.—A minister, who has the spiritual charge of a church, Eph. iv. 11. It is applied to Christ, who is the Ἀρχιποιμήν, the Chief Shepherd, John x. 11, 12, 14, 16: Heb. xiii. 20: 1 Peter v. 4.]

[PATARA. Spratt and Forbes describe the ruins of Patara as lying some distance from the left bank of the river Xanthus, about ten miles from the city of that name. It contains the remains of temples, churches, tombs, a triple arch which formed the gate of the city, baths, and a theatre, above which is a pit, with a central square column, supposed, by Captain Beaufort, to have been the seat of the oracle of Apollo Patareus. "A fine group of palm trees rises among the ruins, and the aspect of the city when it was flourishing must have been very beautiful. Now its port is an inland marsh, generating poisonous malaria; and the mariner sailing along the coast would never guess that the sand-hills before him blocked up the harbor into which St. Paul sailed of old."]

[PATEN, PATINA. A plate used in the Lord's Supper.]

[PATHROS. The Pathrusim were descended from Mizraim, Gen. x. 13, 14: they peopled Upper or Southern Egypt, called by the Greeks and Romans Thebais, which in the Coptic is Pethoures, or Thoures, the south. Isa. xi. 11: Ezek. xxix. 14; xxx. 14.]

[PATIENCE. "In the New Testament," says Tillotson, "it is sometimes expressed by the word ὑπομονή, which signifies God's forbearance, and patient waiting for our repentance; sometimes by the word ὀνοχλή, (Rom. ii. 4; iii. 25,) which signifies holding in his wrath, and restraining himself from punishing; and sometimes by μακροθυμία, (Rom. ii. 4: 2 Peter iii. 9,) which signifies the extent of his patience, his long-suffering, and forbearing for a long time the punishment due to sinners." The first of these terms, as applied to God, Rom. xv. 5, as Bishop Sanderson observes, implies that patience which is from God as the cause, and man as the subject. In this sense it means the endurance of adversity with a calm submission to the Divine will, without murmuring or fretfulness. Rom. v. 3: 2 Cor. i. 6; vi. 4: 2 Thess. iii. 5. Μακροθυμία is used in a similar sense. Heb. vi. 12: Jas. v. 10. Patience, ὑπομονή, sometimes means perseverance, both in suffering ill and doing well. Luke viii. 15; xxi. 19: Rom. ii. 7: Heb. xii. 1. As it is promoted by the hope of future blessedness, it is called the "patience of hope." Rom. viii. 24, 25: 1 Thess. i. 3: Heb. vi. 11, 12.]

PATMOS, a small rocky island in the Ægean Sea, about eighteen miles in circumference; which, on account of its dreary and desolate character, was used by the Roman emperors as a place of confinement for criminals. To this island St. John was banished by the Emperor Domitian; and here he had his revelation, recorded in the Apocalypse. [It is now called Patimo and Patmosa. It has a population of four thousand Greeks, mostly seafaring persons. There is a church on the island, with a school, where ancient Greek is taught. On the east side is a deep indentation, which makes a secure harbor.]

[PATRIARCH. The term, meaning the first or chief father, is applied to the principal dignity of the Greek Church. As an official title it occurs first in the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 431. It was given to the bishops of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. According to Bingham, the patriarch was ordained by a synod; he was independent of other patriarchs; he ordained all the metropolitans of his patriarchate; convened diocesan synods and presided in them; received appeals from metropolitan and provincial synods; acted as censor over metropolitans and their suffragans; employed metropolitans as his commissioners; was consulted by metropolitans in matters of great importance; communicated to metropolitans such imperial laws as concerned the Church; and absolved great criminals. The patriarch of Constantinople is selected by the archbishops and bishops, with the consent and approbation of the Grand Seigneur, to whom he pays a large sum for his instalment. See GREEK CHURCH and MONOPHYSITES.]

PATRIARCHS. This name is given to the ancient fathers, chiefly those who lived before Moses, as Adam, Lamech, Noah, Shem, etc., Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the sons of Jacob, and heads of the tribes. The Hebrews call them princes of the tribes, or heads of the fathers. The name patriarch is derived from the Greek patriarcha, "head of a family."

[PATRICIANS. Followers of Patricius, a Marcionite of the third century. They held that the flesh was created by the devil; hence they hated it, and some of them committed suicide to get free from it.]

[PATRIPASSIANS. Followers of Praxeas,

a Montanist of the second century, who held that the Son and Spirit are only modes of operation of the one Divine Person. The sufferings of Christ were therefore the sufferings of the Father—hence their name. As they frequently used the expression, Monarchiam tenemus, they are also called Monarchians. They were defended by Artemon, Noetius, Beryllus, Sabellius, and Paul of Samosata. See SABELLIANS.]

[PATRONAGE. The right of presentation to a benefice. It means the same as advowson, which, coming from advocatio, signifies taking into protection. Chrysostom speaks of naming the founders of churches in the prayers of the congregation. The Council of Orange permitted a bishop to build a church in another's diocese, reserving the right of consecration to the latter, instructing him to ordain any one whom the founder might nominate to officiate in that church, and requiring him to acquiesce in the nomination if the person presented had already been ordained. It decreed, however, that the government of the Church should be vested in the bishop within whose diocese it was located. From the fifth century, patronage indicated the relation of a landlord to his dependents, he having settled a parsonage and glebe on the churches which he had built. The whole system of patronage, including the right of presentation, was not established until the eighth or ninth century. An advowson is called presentative, when the patron presents his clerk to the bishop to be instituted—collative, when the bishop is the patron and institutes his clerk—donative, when a church is founded by the king, and assigned to the patron, who confers the benefice on the clerk without presentation, institution, or induction—appendant, when it is annexed to a manor—in gross, when annexed to the person of the patron. In some of the Reformed Churches the members possess a negative vote concerning the presentation of a minister, but nothing more.]

PAUL was born at Tarsus, the principal city of Cilicia, and was by birth both a Jew and a citizen of Rome. Acts xxi. 39; xxii. 25. He was of the tribe of Benjamin, and of the sect of the Pharisees. Phil. iii. 5. In his youth he appears to have been taught the art of tent-making, Acts xviii. 3; but we must remember that among the Jews of those days a liberal education was often accompanied by instruction in some mechanical trade. It is probable that St. Paul laid the foundation of those literary attainments for which he was so eminent in the future part of his life, at his native city of Tarsus; and he afterward studied the law of Moses, and the traditions of the elders, at Jerusalem, under Gamaliel, a celebrated rabbi. Acts xxii. 4. St. Paul is not mentioned in the Gospels; nor is it known whether he ever heard our Saviour preach, or saw him perform any miracle. His name first occurs in the account given in the Acts of the martyrdom of St. Stephen, A. D. 34, to which he is said to have consented, Acts viii. 1: he is upon that occasion called a young man; but we are nowhere informed what was then his precise age. The death of St. Stephen was followed by a severe persecution of the Church at Jerusalem, and St. Paul became distinguished among its enemies by his activity and violence. Acts viii. 3. Not content with displaying his hatred to the gospel in Judea, he obtained authority from the high-priest to go to Damascus, and to bring back with him, bound, any Christians whom he might find in that city. As he was upon his journey thither, A. D. 35, his miraculous conversion took place, the circumstances of which are recorded in Acts ix., and are frequently alluded to in his Epistles. 1 Cor. xv. 9: Gal. i. 13: 1 Tim. i. 12, 13.

Soon after St. Paul was baptized at Damascus, he went into Arabia; but we are not informed how long he remained there. He returned to Damascus; and being supernaturally qualified to be a preacher of the gospel, he immediately entered upon his ministry in that city. The boldness and success with which he enforced the truths of Christianity so irritated the unbelieving Jews, that they resolved to put him to death, Acts ix. 23; but, this design being known, the disciples conveyed him privately out of Damascus, and he went to Jerusalem, A. D. 38. The Christians of Jerusalem, remembering St. Paul's former hostility to the gospel, and having no authentic account of any change in his sentiments or conduct, at first refused to receive him; but being assured by Barnabas of St. Paul's real conversion, and of his exertions at Damascus, they acknowledged him as a disciple. Acts ix. 27. He remained only fifteen days among them, Gal. i. 18; and he saw none of the apostles except St. Peter and St. James. It is probable that the other apostles were at this time absent from Jerusalem, exercising their ministry at different places. The zeal with which St. Paul preached at Jerusalem had the same effect as at Damascus: he became so obnoxious to the Hellenistic Jews, that they began to consider how they might kill him, Acts ix. 29; which when the brethren knew, they thought it right that he should leave the city. They accompanied him to Cæsarea, and thence he went into the regions of Syria and Cilicia, where he preached the faith which once he destroyed. Gal. i. 21, 23.

Hitherto the preaching of St. Paul, as well as of the other apostles and teachers, had been confined to the Jews; but the conversion of Cornelius, the first Gentile convert, A. D. 40, having convinced all the apostles that "to the Gentiles, also, God had granted repentance unto life," St. Paul was soon after conducted by Barnabas from Tarsus, which had probably been the principal place of his residence since he left Jerusalem, and they both began to preach the gospel to the Gentiles at Antioch, A. D. 42. Acts xi. 25. Their preaching was attended with great success. The first Gentile Church was now established at Antioch; and in that city, and at this time, the disciples were first called Christians. Acts xi. 26. When these two apostles had been thus employed about a year, a prophet called Agabus predicted an approaching famine, which would affect the whole land of Judea. Upon the prospect of this calamity, the Christians of Antioch made a contribution for their brethren in Judea, and sent the money to the elders at Jerusalem by St. Paul and Barnabas, A. D. 44. Acts xi. 28, etc. This famine happened soon after, in the fourth or fifth year of the Emperor Claudius. It is supposed that St. Paul had the vision mentioned in Acts xxii. 17, while he was now at Jerusalem this second time after his conversion.

St. Paul and Barnabas, having executed their commission, returned to Antioch; and soon after their arrival in that city they were separated, by the express direction of the Holy Ghost, from the other Christian teachers and prophets, for the purpose of carrying the glad tidings of the gospel to the Gentiles of various countries. Acts xiii. 1. Thus Divinely appointed to this important office, they set out from Antioch, A. D. 45, and preached the gospel successively at Salamis and Paphos, two cities of the isle of Cyprus, at Perga in Pamphylia, Antioch in Pisidia, and at Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, three cities of Lycaonia. They returned to Antioch in Syria, A. D. 47, nearly by the same route. This first apostolical journey of St. Paul, in which he was accompanied and assisted by Barnabas, is supposed to have occupied about two years; and in the course of it many, both Jews and Gentiles, were converted to the gospel.

Paul and Barnabas continued at Antioch a considerable time; and while they were there, a dispute arose between them and some Jewish Christians of Judea. These men asserted that the Gentile converts could not obtain salvation through the gospel, unless they were circumcised: Paul and Barnabas maintained the contrary opinion. Acts xv. 1, 2. This dispute was carried on for some time with great earnestness; and it being a question in which not only the present but all future Gentile converts were concerned, it was thought right that St. Paul and Barnabas, with some others, should go up to Jerusalem to consult the apostles and elders concerning it. They passed through Phenicia and Samaria, and upon their arrival at Jerusalem, A. D. 49, a council was assembled for the purpose of discussing this important point. Gal. ii. 1. St. Peter and St. James the Less were present, and delivered their sentiments, which coincided with those of St. Paul and Barnabas; and after much deliberation it was agreed, that neither circumcision, nor conformity to any part of the ritual law of Moses, was necessary in Gentile converts; but that it should be recommended to them to abstain from certain specified things prohibited by that law, lest their indulgence in them should give offence to their brethren of the circumcision, who were still very zealous for the observance of the ceremonial part of their ancient religion. This decision, which was declared to have the sanction of the Holy Ghost, was communicated to the Gentile Christians of Syria and Cilicia, by a letter written in the name of the apostles, elders, and whole Church at Jerusalem, and conveyed by Judas and Silas, who accompanied St. Paul and Barnabas to Antioch for that purpose.

St. Paul, having preached a short time at Antioch, proposed to Barnabas that they should visit the Churches which they had founded in different cities. Acts xv. 36. Barnabas readily consented; but while they were preparing for the journey, there arose a disagreement between them, which ended in their separation. In consequence of this dispute with Barnabas, St. Paul chose Silas for his companion, and they set out together from Antioch, A. D. 50. They travelled through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the Churches, and then came to Derbe and Lystra. Acts xvi. Thence they went through Phrygia and Galatia; and being desirous of going into Asia Propria, or the Proconsular Asia, they were forbidden by the Holy Ghost. They therefore went into Mysia; and not being permitted by the Holy Ghost to go into Bithynia, as they had intended, they went to Troas. While St. Paul was there, a vision appeared to him in the night: "There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us." St. Paul knew this vision to be a command from Heaven, and, in obedience to it, immediately sailed from Troas to Samothracia, and the next day to Neapolis, a city of Thrace; and thence he went to Philippi, the principal city of that part of Macedonia. St. Paul remained some time at Philippi, preaching the gospel; and several occurrences which took place in that city are recorded in Acts xvii. Thence he went through Amphipolis and Apollonia to Thessalonica, Acts xvii., where he preached in the synagogues of the Jews on three successive Sabbath-days. Some of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles of both sexes, embraced the gospel; but the unbelieving Jews, moved with envy and indignation at the success of St. Paul's preaching, excited a great disturbance in the city, and irritated the populace so much against him, that the brethren, anxious for his safety, thought it prudent to send him to Berea, where he met with a better reception than he had experienced at Thessalonica. The Bereans heard his instructions with attention and candor, and having compared his doctrines with the ancient Scriptures, and being satisfied that Jesus, whom he preached, was the promised Messiah, they embraced the gospel; but his enemies at Thessalonica, being informed of his success at Berea, came thither, and, by their endeavors to stir up the people against him, compelled him to leave that city also. He went thence to Athens, where he delivered that discourse recorded in Acts xvii. From Athens, Paul went to Corinth, Acts xviii., A. D. 51, and lived in the house of Aquila and Priscilla, two Jews, who, being compelled to leave Rome in consequence of Claudius's edict against the Jews, had lately settled at Corinth. St. Paul was induced to take up his residence with them, because, like himself, they were tent-makers. At first he preached to the Jews in their synagogue; but upon their violently opposing his doctrine, he declared that from that time he would preach to the Gentiles only; and, accordingly, he afterward delivered his instructions in the house of one Justus, who lived near the synagogue. Among the few Jews who embraced the gospel, were Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, and his family; and many of the Gentile Corinthians, "hearing, believed, and were baptized." St. Paul was encouraged in a vision to persevere in his exertions to convert the inhabitants of Corinth; and although he met with great opposition and disturbance from the unbelieving Jews, and was accused by them before Gallio, the Roman governor of Achaia, he continued there a year and six months, "teaching the word of God." During this time he supported himself by working at his trade of tent-making, that he might not be burdensome to the disciples. From Corinth, St. Paul sailed into Syria, and thence he went to Ephesus; thence to Cæsarea; and is supposed to have arrived at Jerusalem just before the feast of pentecost. After the feast he went to Antioch, A. D. 53; and this was the conclusion of his second apostolical journey, in which he was accompanied by Silas; and in part of it, Luke and Timothy were also with him.

Having made a short stay at Antioch, St. Paul set out upon his third apostolical journey. He passed through Galatia and Phrygia, A. D. 54, confirming the Christians of those countries; and thence, according to his promise, he went to Ephesus. Acts xix. He found there some disciples, who had only been baptized with John's baptism: he directed that they should be baptized in the name of Jesus, and then he communicated to them the Holy Ghost. He preached for the space of three months in the synagogue; but the Jews being hardened beyond conviction, and speaking reproachfully of the Christian religion before the multitude, he left them; and from that time he delivered his instructions in the school of a person called Tyrannus, who was probably a Gentile. St. Paul continued to preach in this place about two years, so that all the inhabitants of that part of Asia Minor "heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks." He also performed many miracles at Ephesus; and not only great numbers of people were converted to Christianity, but many also of those who in this superstitious city used incantations and magical arts, professed their belief in the gospel, and renounced their former practices by publicly burning their books. Previous to the disturbance raised by Demetrius, Paul had intended to continue at Ephesus till Titus should return, whom he had sent to inquire into the state of the Church at Corinth. 2 Cor. xii. 18. He now thought it prudent to go from Ephesus immediately, Acts xx., A. D. 56; and having taken an affectionate leave of the disciples, he set out for Troas, 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13, where he expected to meet Titus. Titus, however, from some cause which is not known, did not come to Troas; and Paul was encouraged to pass over into Macedonia, with the hope of making converts. St. Paul, after preaching in Macedonia, receiving from the Christians of that country liberal contributions for their poor brethren in Judea, 2 Cor. viii. 1, went to Corinth, A. D. 57, and remained there about three months. The Christians also of Corinth, and of the rest of Achaia, contributed to the relief of their brethren in Judea. St. Paul's intention was to have sailed from Corinth into Syria; but being informed that some unbelieving Jews, who had discovered his intention, lay in wait for him, he changed his plan, passed through Macedonia, and sailed from Philippi to Troas in five days, A. D. 58. He stayed at Troas seven days, and preached to the Christians on the first day of the week, the day on which they were accustomed to meet for the purpose of religious worship. From Troas he went by land to Assos; and thence he sailed to Mitylene; and from Mitylene to Miletus. Being desirous of reaching Jerusalem before the feast of pentecost, he would not allow time to go to Ephesus, and therefore he sent for the elders of the Ephesian Church to Miletus, and gave them instructions, and prayed with them. He told them that he should see them no more, which impressed them with the deepest sorrow. From Miletus he sailed by Cos, Rhodes, and Patara in Lycia, to Tyre, Acts xxi. Finding some disciples at Tyre, he stayed with them several days, and then went to Ptolemais, and thence to Cæsarea. While St. Paul was at Cæsarea, the prophet Agabus foretold by the Holy Ghost that St. Paul, if he went to Jerusalem, would suffer much from the Jews. This prediction caused great uneasiness to St. Paul's friends, and they endeavored to dissuade him from his intention of going thither. St. Paul, however, would not listen to their entreaties, but declared that he was ready to die at Jerusalem, if it were necessary, for the name of the Lord Jesus. Seeing him thus resolute, they desisted from their importunities, and accompanied him to Jerusalem, where he is supposed to have arrived just before the feast of pentecost, A. D. 58. This may be considered as the end of St. Paul's third apostolical journey.

St. Paul was received by the apostles and other Christians at Jerusalem with great joy and affection; and his account of the success of his ministry, and of the collections which he had made among the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia for the relief of their brethren in Judea, afforded them much satisfaction; but not long after his arrival at Jerusalem, some Jews of Asia, who had probably in their own country witnessed St. Paul's zeal in spreading Christianity among the Gentiles, seeing him one day in the temple, endeavored to excite a tumult, by crying out that he was the man who was aiming to destroy all distinction between Jew and Gentile; who taught things contrary to the law of Moses; and who had polluted the holy temple by bringing into it uncircumcised heathens. This representation did not fail to enrage the multitude against St. Paul: they seized him, dragged him out of the temple, beat him, and were upon the point of putting him to death, when he was rescued out of their hands by Lysias, a Roman tribune, and the principal military officer then at Jerusalem. What followed—his defence before Felix and Agrippa, his long detention at Cæsarea, and his appeal to the emperor, which occasioned his voyage to Rome, are all circumstantially stated in the latter chapters of the Acts. Upon his arrival at Rome, St. Paul was committed to the care of the captain of the guard, A. D. 61. The Scriptures do not inform us whether he was ever tried before Nero, who was at this time emperor of Rome; and the learned are much divided in their opinion upon that point. St. Luke only says, "Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him. And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him." During his confinement he converted some Jews resident at Rome, and many Gentiles, and, among the rest, several persons belonging to the emperor's household. Phil. iv. 22.

The Scripture history ends with the release of St. Paul from his two years' imprisonment at Rome, A. D. 63; and no ancient author has left us any particulars of the remaining part of this apostle's life. It seems probable that, immediately after he recovered his liberty, he went to Jerusalem; and that afterward he travelled through Asia Minor, Crete, Macedonia, and Greece, confirming his converts, and regulating the affairs of the different churches which he had planted in those countries. Whether at this time he also preached the gospel in Spain, as some have imagined, is very uncertain. It was the unanimous tradition of the Church, that St. Paul returned to Rome, that he underwent a second imprisonment there, and at last was put to death by the Emperor Nero. Tacitus and Suetonius have mentioned a dreadful fire which happened at Rome in the time of Nero. It was believed, though probably without any reason, that the emperor himself was the author of that fire; but to remove the odium from himself, he chose to attribute it to the Christians; and, to give some color to that unjust imputation, he persecuted them with the utmost cruelty. In this persecution St. Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom, probably A. D. 65; and if we may credit Sulpitius Severus, a writer of the fifth century, the former was crucified, and the latter beheaded.

St. Paul was a person of great natural abilities, of quick apprehension, strong feelings, firm resolution, and irreproachable life. He was conversant with Grecian and Jewish literature, and gave early proofs of an active and zealous disposition. If we may be allowed to consider his character independent of his supernatural endowments, we may pronounce that he was well qualified to have risen to distinction and eminence, and that he was by nature peculiarly adapted to the high office to which it pleased God to call him. As a minister of the gospel, he displayed the most unwearied perseverance and undaunted courage. He was deterred by no difficulty or danger, and endured a great variety of persecutions with patience and cheerfulness. He gloried in being thought worthy of suffering for the name of Jesus, and continued with unabated zeal to maintain the truth of Christianity against its bitterest and most powerful enemies. He was the principal instrument under Providence of spreading the gospel among the Gentiles; and we have seen that his labors lasted through many years, and reached over a considerable extent of country. Though emphatically styled the great Apostle of the Gentiles, he began his ministry, in almost every city, by preaching in the synagogue of the Jews; and though he owed by far the greater part of his persecutions to the opposition and malice of that proud and obstinate people, whose resentment he particularly incurred by maintaining that the Gentiles were to be admitted to an indiscriminate participation of the benefits of the new dispensation, yet it rarely happened in any place that some of the Jews did not yield to his arguments, and embrace the gospel. He watched with paternal care over the churches which he had founded; and was always ready to strengthen the faith and regulate the conduct of his converts, by such directions and advice as their circumstances might require.

The exertions of St. Paul in the cause of Christianity were not confined to personal instruction: he also wrote fourteen epistles to individuals or churches, which are now extant, and form a part of our canon. These letters furnish evidence of the soundness and sobriety of his judgment. His caution in distinguishing between the occasional suggestions of inspiration, and the ordinary exertions of his natural understanding, is without example in the history of enthusiasm. His morality is everywhere calm, pure, and rational; adapted to the condition, the activity, and the business of social life, and of its various relations; free from the overscrupulousness and austerities of superstition, and from what was more, perhaps, to be apprehended, the abstractions of quietism, and the soarings or extravagances of fanaticism. His judgment concerning a hesitating conscience, his opinion of the moral indifferency of many actions, yet of the prudence and even the duty of compliance, where non-compliance would produce evil effects upon the minds of the persons who observed it, are all in proof of the calm and discriminating character of his mind; and the universal applicability of his precepts affords strong presumption of his inspiration. What Lord Lyttleton has remarked of the preference ascribed by St. Paul to rectitude of principle above every other religious accomplishment, is weighty: "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal," etc. 1 Cor. xiii. 1-8. Did ever enthusiast prefer that universal benevolence, meant by charity here, (which, we may add, is attainable by every man,) to faith, and to miracles, to those religious opinions which he had embraced, and to those supernatural graces and gifts which he imagined he had acquired, nay, even to the merit of martyrdom? Is it not the genius of enthusiasm to set moral virtues infinitely below the merit of faith; and of all moral virtues to value that least which is most particularly enforced by St. Paul, a spirit of candor, moderation, and peace? Certainly, neither the temper nor the opinions of a man subject to fanatic delusions are to be found in this passage. His letters, indeed, everywhere discover great zeal and earnestness in the cause in which he was engaged; that is to say, he was convinced of the truth of what he taught; he was deeply impressed, but not more so than the occasion merited, with a sense of its importance. This produces a corresponding animation and solicitude in the exercise of his ministry. But would not these considerations, supposing them to have been well founded, have holden the same place, and produced the same effect, in a mind the strongest and the most sedate? Here, then, we have a man of liberal attainments, and in other respects of sound judgment, who had addicted his life to the service of the gospel. We see him, in the prosecution of his purpose, travelling from country to country, enduring every species of hardship, encountering every extremity of danger, assaulted by the populace, punished by the magistrates, scourged, beaten, stoned, left for dead; expecting, wherever he came, a renewal of the same treatment, and the same dangers; yet, when driven from one city, preaching in the next; spending his whole time in the employment; sacrificing to it his pleasures, his ease, his safety; persisting in this course to old age, unaltered by the experience of perverseness, ingratitude, prejudice, desertion; unsubdued by anxiety, want, labor, persecutions; unwearied by long confinement; undismayed by the prospect of death. Such was St. Paul; and such were "the proofs of apostleship found in him."

The following remarks of Hug on the character of this apostle are equally just and eloquent: This most violent man, having such terrible propensities, whose turbulent impulses rendered him of a most enterprising character, would have become nothing better than a John of Gishala, a blood-intoxicated zealot, ἐκτυνών ἀπειλῆς καὶ φόβου, breathing out threatenings and slaughter, Acts ix, 1, had not his whole soul been changed. The harsh tone of his mind inclined him to the principles of Pharisaism, which had all the appearance of severity, and was the predominant party among the Jews. Nature had not withheld from him the external endowments of eloquence, although he afterward spoke very modestly of them. At Lystra he was deemed the tutelar god of eloquence. This character, qualified for great things, but not master of himself from excess of internal power, was an extreme of human dispositions, and, according to the natural course, was prone to absolute extremities. His religion was a destructive zeal, his anger was fierceness, his fury required victims. A ferocity so boisterous did not psychologically qualify him for a Christian nor a philanthropist; but, least of all, for a quietly enduring man. He, nevertheless, became all this on his conversion to Christianity, and each bursting emotion of his mind subsided directly into a well-regulated and noble character. Formerly hasty and irritable, now only spirited and resolved; formerly violent, now full of energy and enterprising; once ungovernably refractory against every thing which obstructed him, now only persevering; once fanatical and morose, now only serious; once cruel, now only firm; once a harsh zealot, now fearing God; formerly unrelenting, deaf to sympathy and commiseration, now himself acquainted with tears, which he had seen without effect in others; formerly the friend of none, now the brother of mankind, benevolent, compassionate, sympathizing; yet never weak, always great; in the midst of sadness and sorrow manly and noble: so he showed himself at his deeply moving departure from Miletus, Acts xx.: it is like the departure of Moses, like the resignation of Samuel, sincere and heartfelt, full of self-recollection, and in the midst of pain full of dignity. His writings are a true expression of this character, with regard to the tone predominant in them. Severity, manly seriousness, and sentiments which ennoble the heart, are interchanged with mildness, affability, and sympathy; and their transitions are such as nature begets in the heart of a man penetrated by his subject, noble and discerning. He exhorts, reproaches, and consoles again; he attacks with energy, urges with impetuosity, then again he speaks kindly to the soul; he displays his finer feelings for the welfare of others, his forbearance, and his fear of afflicting anybody; all as the subject, time, opposite dispositions, and circumstances require. There prevails throughout in them an importuning language, an earnest and lively communication. Rom. i. 26-32, is a comprehensive and vigorous description of morals. His antitheses, Rom. ii. 21-24: 2 Cor. iv. 8-12; vi. 9-11; ix. 22-30: his enumerations, 1 Cor. xiii. 4-10: 2 Cor. vi. 4-7: 2 Tim. iii. 1-5: Eph. iv. 4-7; v. 3-6: his gradations, Rom. viii. 29, 30; Titus iii. 3, 4: the interrogations, exclamations, and comparisons, sometimes animate his language even so as to give a visible existence to it. That, however, which we principally perceive in Paul, and from which his whole actions and operations become intelligible, is the peculiar impression which the idea of a universal religion has wrought upon his mind. This idea of establishing a religion for the world had not so profoundly engrossed any soul, nowhere kindled so much vigor, and projected it into such a constant energy. In this he was no man's scholar; this he had immediately received from the Spirit of his Master; it was a spark of the Divine light which enkindled him. It was this which never allowed him to remain in Palestine and in Syria, which so powerfully impelled him to foreign parts. The portion of some others was Judea and its environs; but his mission was directed to the nations, and his allotment was the whole of the heathen world. Thus he began his career among the different nations of Asia Minor; and when this limit became also too confined for him, he went with equal confidence to Europe, among other nations, ordinances, sciences, and customs; and here likewise he finally with the same indefatigable spirit circulated his plans, even to the pillars of Hercules. In this manner Paul prepared the overthrow of two religions, that of his ancestors, and that of the heathen. [See Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, and especially "The Life and Epistles of St. Paul," by Conybeare and Howson.]

[PAULIANS, PAULIANISTS. Followers of Paul of Samosata, bishop and magistrate of Antioch, in the third century. He adopted the opinions of Artemon; and taught that the Son and Holy Ghost exist in God as reason and activity in man: that Christ was born a mere man, but that the reason or wisdom of the Father descended into him; hence he might, though improperly, be called God. Paul was degraded by a council of Antioch, but continued to enjoy the emoluments of his station until the defeat of his protectress, the renowned Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, when he was deposed by the Emperor Aurelian.]

[PAULICIANS. Some consider these a sect of Manichæans, founded by two brothers, Paul and John of Samosata. Others say they are called after Paul, an Armenian, who lived about A. D. 711. Others say the name is derived from their veneration for the Apostle Paul. Gieseler and others say, that about A. D. 600 one Constantine, a member of a Marcionite church of Mammalis, in Samosata, was so moved by reading the New Testament, and especially the writings of Paul, that he determined to form a Pauline church: this he did at Kibossa, in Armenia—still, however, maintaining his dualistic principles. He appointed successors, under whom the Paulicians spread into Asia Minor, having Phanaroa, in Helenopontus, as their chief settlement. They recognized an equality of ministers, and changed their names for Scripture names. Some say they rejected the Old Testament and the Epistles of Peter—denied that the world was created by the Supreme Being—maintained that Christ was invested with a celestial body, which passed through the Virgin, as a pure stream through a channel—and repudiated the sacraments. They were determined enemies of the Romish Church, by which they were severely persecuted after they migrated westward to escape the Grecian yoke, and by which, it is thought, they were greatly misrepresented. From many of the charges against them they are defended in Faber's "Vallenses and Waldenses." After the eleventh century they were found in great numbers scattered through Italy, Germany, France, and other countries, under the names of Cathari, Albigenes, Bulgarians, Beghards, Patarini, etc. They were finally exterminated by persecution, except some who were absorbed into the Waldensian churches.]

[PAVEMENT. Παυόμενος, John xix. 13, denotes a tessellated marble pavement. Julius Cæsar carried about with him pieces of sawn marble, of various colors, with which to adorn his prætorium. The Romans appear to have derived the custom from the east. See Bloomfield in loc.]

[PAX. A piece of wood or metal, or a book of the Gospels, with an image of Christ or the Virgin on it, which was carried about the church for the people to kiss. This was a substitute for the kiss of peace.]

[PEACE. שלום. Elpînûn. That sacred tranquillity which results from justification witnessed to the believer by the Holy Ghost. Rom. v. 1. It is confirmed and increased by his sanctifying grace. Isa. xxxii. 15–17: James iii. 17, 18. It is therefore called a "fruit of the Spirit." Gal. v. 22. As Christ has made peace through the blood of his cross, he is styled "our peace." Eph. ii. 14–17: Col. i. 20. Being Divine in its origin, it is called "the peace of God," Phil. iv. 7, Col. iii. 15, who is accordingly denominated "the God of peace. Rom. xv. 33: Heb. xiii. 20. The word frequently denotes all spiritual and temporal blessings. Num. vi. 26: Ps. cxix. 165: compare the salutations of the apostolic epistles. The Salam, "Peace be with thee," was, and still is, common among the orientals. Gen. xliii. 23: Judges xix. 20: compare Luke xxiv. 36: John xiv. 27; xx. 21. It was adopted by the early Church, but only in reference to the faithful. After the fourth century it was used when the bishop entered the church—when the reader began the lessons—sometimes at the beginning and close of the sermon—at the eucharist, and at dismissing the congregation: when the minister said, "Peace be with you," the people responded,

"And with thy spirit." Peace sometimes denotes public tranquillity, international friendship, and ecclesiastical harmony. 1 Sam. vii. 14: 1 Kings ii. 33; iv. 24; v. 12: Eph. iv. 3: 1 Thess. v. 13. It is the frequent subject of precept, promise, and prayer. Ps. cxii. 6: Isa. liv. 10: 2 Thess. iii. 16: 2 Tim. ii. 22: Heb. xii. 14: Rev. i. 4.]

PEACOCK, פרוכס, 1 Kings x. 22: 2 Chron. ix. 21: a bird distinguished by the length of its tail, and the brilliant spots with which it is adorned; which displays all that dazzles in the sparkling lustre of gems, and all that astonishes in the rainbow. The peacock is a bird originally of India; thence brought into Persia and Media. Aristophanes mentions Persian peacocks, and Suidas calls the peacock the Median bird. From Persia it was gradually dispersed into Judea, Egypt, Greece, and Europe. If the fleet of Solomon visited India, they might easily procure this bird, whether from India itself, or from Persia; and certainly the bird, by its beauty, was likely to attract attention, and to be brought among other rarities of natural history by Solomon's servants, who would be instructed to collect every curiosity in the countries they visited.

PEARL, a hard, white, shining body, usually roundish, found in a shell-fish resembling an oyster. The oriental pearls have a fine polished gloss, and are tinged with an elegant blush of red. They are esteemed in the east beyond all other jewels. [Gabish, rendered pearls, Job xxviii. 18, is supposed to mean crystals; and peninnim, Job xxviii. 18: Prov. iii. 15; viii. 11; xx. 15; xxxi. 10: Lam. iv. 7, rendered rubies, is supposed to mean pearls, though Hutchinson and others suggest magnets. Πάρρα and Pinna, Greek and Latin for the pearl oyster, seem to have been derived from the Hebrew peninnah. מארגלית occurs in Matt. vii. 6; xiii. 45, 46: 1 Tim. ii. 9: Rev. xvii. 4; xviii. 12, 16; xxi. 21.]

[PEDILAVIUM. The ceremony of washing feet on Maundy Thursday obtained as early as the fourth century. Augustin speaks of it as one of the ceremonies accompanying baptism. It is performed in great state by the pope. In the Greek Church it takes place on Good Friday. In the monasteries, the abbot represents Christ, and twelve of the monks the apostles—the steward acting the part of Peter, and the porter that of Judas. Some Anabaptists practice the pedilavium as a rite of universal and perpetual obligation, from a mistaken view of the example and precept of Christ, John xiii.]

PELAGIANS, a sect that arose in the fifth century. Pelagius was a British monk of some rank, and very exalted reputation. He, with his friend Celestius, travelled to Rome, where they resided very early in the fifth century, and opposed with warmth certain received notions respecting original sin, and the necessity of Divine grace. What reception their doctrines met with at Rome does not appear; but their virtue excited general approbation. On the approach of the Goths they retired to Africa, where Celestius remained, with a view of gaining admittance as a presbyter into the church of Carthage. Pelagius proceeded to Palestine, where he enjoyed the favor and protection of John, Bishop of Jerusalem. But his friend and his opinions met with a very different reception from St. Augustin, the celebrated Bishop of Hippo. Whatever parts were visited by these unorthodox friends, they still asserted their peculiar opinions; and they were gradually engaged in a warm contest, in the course of which they were probably led to advance more than had originally occurred to them. In contending for the truth of their doctrines, they are said to have asserted, "that mankind derived no injury from the sin of Adam; that we are now as capable of obedience to the will of God as he was; that, otherwise, it would have been cruel and absurd to propose to mankind the performance of certain duties, with the sanction of rewards and the denunciation of punishments; and that, consequently, men are born without vice, as well as without virtue." Pelagius is charged also with having maintained "that it is possible for men, provided they fully employ the powers and faculties with which they are endued, to live without sin;" and though he did not deny that external grace, or the doctrines and motives of the gospel, are necessary, yet he is said to have rejected the necessity of internal grace, or the aids of the Divine Spirit. He acknowledged "that the power we possess of obeying the will of God is a Divine gift;" but asserted "that the direction of this power depends upon ourselves; that natural death is not a consequence of the sin of Adam, but of the frame of man; and that Adam would have died, though he had not sinned." Isidore, Chrysostom, and Augustin strenuously opposed these opinions; and the latter procured their condemnation in a synod held at Carthage in 412. They were, however, favorably received at Rome, and Pope Zozimus was at the head of the Pelagian party; but his decision against the African bishops, who had opposed Pelagianism, was disregarded by them, and the pontiff yielded at length to their reasonings and remonstrances, and condemned the men whom he had before honored with his approbation. The Council of Ephesus likewise condemned the opinions of Pelagius and Celestius; and the Emperor Honorius, in 418, published an edict, which ordained that the leaders of the sect should be expelled from Rome, and their followers exiled. Some of the Pelagians taught that Christ was a mere man, and that men might lead sinless lives, because Christ did so; that Jesus became Christ after his baptism, and God after his resurrection; the one arising from his unction, the other from the merit of his passion. The Pelagian controversy, which began with the doctrines of grace and original sin, was extended to predestination, and excited continual discord and division in the Church. It must, however, be recollected, that we are acquainted with the sentiments of Pelagius only through the medium of his opponents; and that it is probable that they were much misrepresented. See AUGUSTIN.

The followers of the truly evangelical Arminians, or those who hold the tenet of general redemption with its concomitants, have often been greatly traduced, by the ignorant among their doctrinal opponents, as Pelagians, or at least as Semi-Pelagians. It may therefore serve the cause of truth to exhibit the appropriate reply which the Dutch Arminians gave to this charge when urged against them at the synod of Dort, and which they verified and maintained by arguments and authorities that were unanswerable. In their concluding observations they say, "From all these remarks a judgment may easily be formed at what an immense distance our sentiments stand from the dogmatical assertions of the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians on the grace of God in the conversion of man. Pelagius, in the first instance, attributed all things to nature; but we acknowledge nothing but grace. When Pelagius was blamed for not acknowledging grace, he began indeed to speak of it, but it is evident that by grace he understood the power of nature as created by God, that is, the rational will; but by grace we understand a supernatural gift. Pelagius, when afterward pressed with passages of Scripture, also admitted this supernatural grace; but he placed it solely in the external teaching of the law: though we affirm that God offers his word to men, yet we likewise affirm that he inwardly causes the understanding to believe. Subsequently Pelagius joined to this external grace that by which sins are pardoned: we acknowledge not only the grace by which sins are forgiven, but also that by which men are assisted to refrain from the commission of sin. In addition to his previous concessions, Pelagius granted that the grace of Christ was requisite beside the two kinds which he had enumerated; but he attributed it entirely to the doctrine and example of Christ that we are aided in our endeavors not to commit sin: we likewise admit that the doctrine and example of Christ afford us some aid in refraining from sin, but in addition to their influence we also place the gift of the Holy Spirit with which God endues us, and which enlightens our understandings, and confers strength and power upon our will to abstain from sinning. When Pelagius afterward owned the assistance of Divine power inwardly working in man by the Holy Spirit, he placed it solely in the enlightening of the understanding; but we believe that it is not only necessary for us to know or understand what we ought to do, but that it is also requisite for us to implore the aid of the Holy Spirit that we may be rendered capable of performing, and may delight in the performance of that which it is our duty to do. Pelagius admitted grace—but it has been a question with some whether he meant only illumination, or, beside this, a power communicated to the will—he admitted grace, but he did this only to show that by means of it man can with greater ease act aright: we, on the contrary, affirm that grace is bestowed, not that we may be able with greater ease to act aright, (which is as though we can do this even without grace,) but that grace is absolutely necessary to enable us to act at all aright. Pelagius asserted, that man, so far from requiring the aid of grace for the performance of good actions, is, through the powers implanted in him at the time of his creation, capable of fulfilling the whole law, of loving God, and of overcoming all temptations: we, on the contrary, assert that the grace of God is required for the performance of every act of piety. Pelagius declared, that by the works of nature man renders himself worthy of grace; but we, in common with the Church universal, condemn this dogma. When Pelagius afterward himself condemned this tenet, he understood by grace, partly natural grace, which is antecedent to all merit, and partly remission of sins, which he acknowledged to be gratuitous; but he added, that through works performed by the powers of nature alone, at least through the desire of good and the imperfect longing after it, men merit that spiritual grace by which they are assisted in good works; but we declare, that men will that which is good on account of God's prevenience, or going before them by his grace, and exciting within them a longing after good; otherwise grace would no longer be grace, because it would not be gratuitously bestowed, but only on account of the merit of man." That many who have held some tenets in common with the true Arminians have been, in different degrees, followers of Pelagius, is well known; but the original Arminians were in truth as far from Pelagian or Semi-Pelagian errors, granting the opinions of Pelagius to be fairly reported by his adversaries, as the Calvinists themselves. This is also the case with the whole body of Wesleyan Methodists, and of the cognate societies to which they have given rise, both in Great Britain and America.

[PELETHITES. The Cherethites and Pelethites were the body-guard of David. 2 Sam. viii. 18. The etymology of the words indicates that they were executioners and messengers. The Targum reads "archers and slingers." See CHEREETHIM.]

PELICAN, תרנגול, Lev. xi. 18: Deut. xiv. 17: Ps. cii. 7: Isa. xxxiv. 11: Zeph. ii. 14: a very remarkable aquatic bird, of the size of a large goose. Its color is a grayish white, except that the neck looks a little yellowish, and the middle of the back feathers are blackish. The bill is long, and hooked at the end, and has under it a lax membrane, extended to the throat, which makes a bag or sack, capable of holding a very large quantity. Feeding her young from this bag has so much the appearance of feeding them with her own blood, that it caused this fabulous opinion to be propagated, and made the pelican an emblem of parental, as the stork had been before chosen, more justly, of filial affection. The voice of this bird is harsh and dissonant, which some say resembles that of a man grievously complaining. David compares his groaning to it. Psalm cii. 7.

[PEN. קנה. Kálamos. A reed used for writing. Ps. xlv. 1: 3 John 13. Also, a stylus, made of metal, to mark on wax tables, or to engrave on stone or metal plates. Job xix. 24. It was sometimes pointed with a diamond. Jer. xvii. 1.]

[PENANCE. A sacrament of the Romish Church, "by which," says the Council of Trent, "the benefit of Christ's death is applied to those who have fallen after baptism." "The holy synod furthermore teacheth, that the form of the sacrament of penance, in which its force chiefly consisteth, is placed in those words of the minister, I absolve thee, etc.; to which words, indeed, certain prayers are, according to the custom of holy Church, laudably joined; which, nevertheless, by no means regard the essence of that form, neither are they necessary unto the administration of the sacrament itself. But the acts of the penitent himself, to wit, contrition, confession, and satisfaction, are, as it were, the matter of this sacrament." "As respects the minister of this sacrament, the holy synod declares all those doctrines to be false, and utterly alien from the truth of the gospel, which perniciously extend the ministry of the keys to any other men soever, besides bishops and priests." Their absolution "is after the manner of a judicial act." By contrition the Council means a "sorrow of mind, and a detestation for the sin committed, with the purpose of not sinning for the future." By confession it means auricular confession, or the private confession to a priest of all the deadly sins which the penitent can call to mind. By satisfaction is meant punishments voluntarily undertaken or imposed by the priest, as well as temporal scourges inflicted of God and endured patiently by us. The Council of Trent adduces various passages of Scripture to countenance its doctrine of penance; but they fail to yield it any support. The Primitive Church knew nothing of this "sacrament," although it had a system of penance which in many respects was very severe. The penitents were divided into four classes, Audientes, Consistentes, Flentes, and Genusflectentes. The various degrees of penitential discipline extended to three, seven, or ten years, at the discretion of the bishop, by whom alone the penitent could be restored to the communion of the Church. If he were a layman, he could never afterward be advanced to the ministry; if a minister, his ministerial functions could never be restored. In the Reformed Churches, penitential discipline is, for the most part, restricted to admonition, suspension, and excommunication. See Canons and Catechism of the Council of Trent; Edgar's "Variations of Popery;" and the articles CONFESSION and EXCOMMUNICATION.]

ance for such private crimes as might not be divulged. PENTATEUCH. This word, which is derived from the Greek πεντάτευχος, from πέντε, five, and τεῦχος, a volume, signifies the collection of the five books of Moses, which are Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. That the Jews have acknowledged the authenticity of the Pentateuch, from the present time back to the era of their return from the Babylonish captivity—a period of more than two thousand three hundred years—admits not a possibility of doubt. The five books of Moses have been during that period constantly placed at the head of the Jewish sacred volume, and divided into fixed portions, one of which was read and explained in their synagogues, not only every Sabbath with the other Scriptures, but in many places twice a week, and not unfrequently every evening, when they alone were read. They have been received as Divinely inspired by every Jewish sect, even by the Sadducees, who questioned the Divinity of the remaining works of the Old Testament. In truth, the veneration of the Jews for their Scriptures, and above all for the Pentateuch, seems to have risen almost to a superstitious reverence. Extracts from the Mosaic law were written on pieces of parchment, and placed on the borders of their garments, or round their wrists and foreheads; nay, they at a later period counted, with the minutest exactness, not only the chapters and paragraphs, but the words and letters which each book of their Scriptures contains. Thus also the translation, first of the Pentateuch, and afterward of the remaining works of the Old Testament, into Greek, for the use of the Alexandrian Jews, disseminated this sacred volume over a great part of the civilized world, in the language most universally understood, and rendered it accessible to the learned and inquisitive in every country; so as to preclude all suspicion that it could be materially altered by either Jews or Christians, to support their respective opinions as to the person and character of the Messiah; the substance of the text being, by this translation, fixed and authenticated at least two hundred and seventy years before the appearance of our Lord.

But, long previous to the captivity, two particular examples, deserving peculiar attention, occur in the Jewish history, of the public and solemn homage paid to the sacredness of the Mosaic law as promulgated in the Pentateuch; and which, by consequence, afford the fullest testimony to the authenticity of the Pentateuch itself: the one in the reign of Hezekiah, while the separate kingdoms of Judah and Israel still subsisted; and the other in the reign of his great-grandson Josiah, subsequent to the captivity of Israel. In the former we see the pious monarch of Judah assembling the priests and Levites and the rulers of the people, to deplore with him the trespasses of their fathers against the Divine law, to acknowledge the justice of those chastisements which, according to the prophetic warnings of that law, had been inflicted upon them, to open the house of God which his father had impiously shut, and restore the true worship therein according to the Mosaic ritual, 2 Kings xviii.: 2 Chron. xxix.: xxx.; with the minutest particulars of which he complied, in the sin-offerings and the peace-offerings which, in conjunction with his people, he offered for the kingdom and the sanctuary and the people, to make atonement to God for them and for all Israel; restoring the service of God as it had been performed in the purest times. “And Hezekiah,” says the sacred narrative, “rejoiced, and all the people, that God had prepared the people; for the thing was done suddenly,” 2 Chron. xxix. 36; immediately on the king’s accession to the throne, on the first declaration of his pious resolution. How clear a proof does this exhibit of the previous existence and clearly acknowledged authority of those laws which the Pentateuch contains!

But a yet more remarkable part of this transaction still remains. At this time, Hoshea was King of Israel, and so far disposed to countenance the worship of the true God, that he appears to have made no opposition to the pious zeal of Hezekiah; who, with the concurrence of the whole congregation which he had assembled, sent out letters and made a proclamation, not only to his own people of Judah, 2 Chron. xxx. 1, “but to Ephraim and Manasseh, and all Israel, from Beersheba even unto Dan, that they should come to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, to keep the passover unto the Lord God of Israel; saying, Ye children of Israel, turn again to the Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and he will return to the remnant of you who are escaped out of the hands of the kings of Assyria; and be not ye like your fathers and your brethren, which trespassed against the Lord God of their fathers, who therefore gave them up to desolation, as ye see. Now be ye not stiff-necked, as your fathers were; but yield yourselves unto the Lord, and enter into his sanctuary which he hath sanctified for ever, and serve the Lord your God, that the fierceness of his wrath may turn away from you. So the posts passed from city to city through the country of Ephraim and Manasseh even unto Zebulun.” 2 Chron. xxx. 6, etc.

Now, can we conceive that such an attempt as this could have been made, if the Pentateuch containing the Mosaic code had not been as certainly recognized through the ten tribes of Israel as in the kingdom of Judah? The success was exactly such as we might reasonably expect if it were so acknowledged; for, though many of the ten tribes laughed to scorn and mocked the messengers of Hezekiah, who invited them to the solemnity of the passover, from the impious contempt which through long disuse they had conceived for it; "Nevertheless," says the sacred narrative, "divers of Asher and Manasseh and of Zebulun humbled themselves, and came to Jerusalem; and there assembled at Jerusalem much people, to keep the feast of unleavened bread in the second month, a very great congregation; and they killed the passover, and the priests and Levites stood in their places after their manner, according to the law of Moses, the man of God. So there was great joy in Jerusalem; for since the time of Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel, there was not the like at Jerusalem. And when all this was finished, all Israel that were present went out to the cities of Judah, and brake the images in pieces, and cut down the groves, and threw down the high places and the altars out of all Judah and Benjamin, in Ephraim also, and Manasseh, until they had utterly destroyed them all." 2 Chron. xxx. 11-xxxi. 1. Can any clearer proof than this be desired of the constant and universal acknowledgment of the Divine authority of the Pentateuch throughout the entire nation of the Jews, notwithstanding the idolatries and corruptions which so often prevented its receiving such obedience as that acknowledgment ought to have produced? The argument from this certain antiquity of the Pentateuch, a copy of which existed in the old Samaritan character as well as in the modern Hebrew, is most conclusive as to the numerous prophecies of Christ, and the future and present condition of the Jews which it contains. These are proved to have been delivered many ages before they were accomplished; they could be only the result of Divine prescience, and the uttering of them by Moses proves, therefore, the inspiration and the authority of his writings. See LAW and MOSES.

PENTECOST, Πεντεκοστή, a solemn festival of the Jews; so called, because it was celebrated on the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of Nisan, which was the second day of the passover. The Hebrews call it the feast of weeks, because it was kept seven weeks after the passover. They then offered the first-fruits of the wheat harvest, which was then completed; besides which, they presented at the temple seven lambs of that year, one calf, and two rams, for a burnt-offering; two lambs for a peace-offering; and a goat for a sin-offering. Lev. xxiii. 15, 16: Exod. xxxiv. 22: Deut. xvi. 9, 10. The feast of pentecost was instituted among the Israelites, first to oblige them to repair to the temple of the Lord, there to acknowledge his absolute dominion over the whole country, by offering him the first-fruits of the harvest; and, secondly, to commemorate and give thanks to God for the law which he had given them from Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their coming out of Egypt.

The modern Jews celebrate the pentecost for two days. They deck the synagogues, where the law is read, and their own houses, with garlands of flowers. They hear an oration in praise of the law, and read from the Pentateuch and prophets lessons which have a relation to this festival, and accommodate their prayers to the same occasion. It was on the feast of pentecost that the Holy Ghost descended in the miraculous manner related, Acts ii. [In the primitive Church, the whole space of fifty days after Easter was celebrated under the name of Pentecost. The sacraments were administered, churches adorned, and general rejoicings made. Afterward the festival was restricted to the fiftieth day, when the Holy Ghost was poured out on the apostles. Great absurdities have been practiced in Romish countries on this day: fire and flowers, to represent the cloven tongues and various gifts of the Spirit, have been scattered abroad, and doves let loose to symbolize his sacred presence in the Church. The Reformed Churches generally celebrate Whitsuntide, as it is called, by spiritual observances suited to the occasion.]

[PEPUZIANS. A name by which the Montanists were called, from Pepuzia, a village in Phrygia, which Montanus called the New Jerusalem.]

[PERES. See BELSHAZZAR.]

[PERGA. A city of Pamphylia, situated on the river Cestrus, the modern Ak-Sou, seven miles from its mouth. Strabo says an annual festival was celebrated at Perga, in honor of Diana, who had a temple at that place. The coins and other remains of the city—now called Eski Kelesi—refer exclusively to its Grecian history. Conybeare and Howson say, "Its prosperity was probably arrested by the building of Attaleia, after the death of Alexander, in a more favorable situation, on the shore of the bay. Attaleia has never ceased to be an important town since the day of its foundation by Attalus Philadelphus. But when the traveller pitches his tent at Perga, he finds only the encampments of shepherds, who pasture their cattle amidst the ruins. These ruins are halls and towers, columns and cornices, a theatre and a stadium, a broken aqueduct encrusted with the calcareous deposit of the Pamphylian streams, and tombs scattered on both sides of the site of the town. Nothing else remains of Perga but the beauty of its natural situation, between and upon the sides of two hills, with an extensive valley in front, watered by the river Cestrus, and backed by the mountains of the Taurus." As the route from Perga, in Pamphylia, to Antioch, in Pisidia, lay through the mountains which separate the table-land in the interior of Asia Minor from the plains on the south coast, a region formerly replete with "perils of robbers" as well as "of waters," for this reason, perhaps, John Mark abandoned Paul and Barnabas at Perga, and returned to Jerusalem. Acts xiii. 13, 14; xiv. 24, 25; xv. 36-41. Attaleia is supposed to be represented by the modern Adalia, or Satalia, which contains a population of eight thousand: it is on the gulf of the same name, the ancient Mare Pamphylum. The Catarrhactes flows into it near the city.]

PERGAMOS, a city of Troas, very considerable in the time of John the Evangelist. Rev. ii. 12, 13. This city was, for the space of one hundred and fifty years, the capital of a kingdom of the same name founded by Philetærus, B. C. 283; who treacherously made use of the treasures committed to his care by Lysimachus after the battle of Ipsus, and, seizing on Pergamos, established an independent kingdom. After Philetærus were five kings of the same race; the last of whom, Attalus Philopater, left his kingdom, which comprehended Mysia, Æolis, Ionia, Lydia, and Caria, to the Roman empire; to which it belonged when the first Christian Church was established there. This Church early became corrupted by the Nicolaitanes, for which it was reproved by St. John, and charged quickly to repent. Rev. ii. 14-16. Pergamos, now called Bergamo, like most other places which have been cursed by the presence of the Turks, is reduced to comparative decay, containing a poor population, who are too indolent or too oppressed to profit by the richness of their soil and the beauty of the climate. The number of inhabitants, however, is still said to amount to thirty thousand, of whom three thousand are Greek Christians. Many remains of former magnificence are still to be found; among which are those of several Christian churches. It is about sixty miles north of Smyrna. The celebrated physician Galen was a native of this place.

PERIZZITES. The ancient inhabitants of Palestine, mingled with the Canaanites. There is also a great probability that they themselves were Canaanites, but, having no fixed habitations, were wandering about here and there, and scattered over all the country. Thus, in the time of Abraham and Lot, the Canaanite and Perizzite were in the land. Gen. xiii. 7: Josh. xvii. 15. Solomon subdued the remains of the Canaanites and Perizzites, which the children of Israel had not rooted out, and made them tributary to him. 1 Kings ix. 20, 21: 2 Chron. viii. 7. There still remained some of this people as late as the time of Ezra, ix. 1.

PERSECUTION is any pain or affliction which a person designedly inflicts upon another; and, in a more restrained sense, the sufferings of Christians on account of their religion. The establishment of Christianity was opposed by the powers of the world, and occasioned several severe persecutions against Christians, during the reigns of several Roman emperors. Though the absurdities of polytheism were openly derided and exposed by the apostles and their successors, yet it does not appear that any public laws were enacted against Christianity till the reign of Nero, A. D. 64, by which time it had acquired considerable stability and extent. As far the greater number of the first converts to Christianity were of the Jewish nation, one secondary cause for their being so long preserved from persecution may probably be deduced from their appearing to the Roman governors only as a sect of Jews, who had seceded from the rest of their brethren on account of some opinion, trifling in its importance, and perhaps difficult to be understood. Nor, when their brethren were fully discovered to have cast off the religion of the synagogue, did the Jews find it easy to infuse into the breasts of the Roman magistrates that rancor and malice which they themselves experienced. But the steady and uniform opposition made by the Christians to heathen superstition could not long pass unnoticed. The open attacks upon Paganism made them extremely obnoxious to the populace, by whom they were represented as a society of atheists, who, by attacking the religious constitution of the empire, merited the severest animadversion of the civil magistrate. Horrid tales of their abominations were circulated throughout the empire; and the minds of the Pagans were, from all these circumstances, prepared to regard with pleasure or indifference every cruelty which could be inflicted upon this despised sect. Historians usually reckon ten general persecutions.

First general persecution.—Nero selected the Christians as a grateful sacrifice to the Roman people, and endeavored to transfer to this hated sect the guilt of which he was strongly suspected, that of having caused and enjoined the fire which had nearly desolated the city. (See NERO.) This persecution was not confined to Rome: the emperor issued edicts against the Christians throughout most of the provinces of the empire. He was far, however, from obtaining the object of his hopes and expectations; and the virtues of the Christians, their zeal for the truth, and their constancy in suffering, must have considerably contributed to make their tenets more generally known.

Second general persecution.—From the death of Nero to the reign of Domitian, the Christians remained unmolested and daily increasing; but toward the close of the first century, they were again involved in all the horrors of persecution. In this persecution many eminent Christians suffered; but the death of Domitian soon delivered them from this calamity.

Third general persecution.—This persecution began in the third year of the Emperor Trajan, A. D. 100. Many things contributed toward it; as the laws of the empire, the emperor's zeal for his religion, and aversion to Christianity, and the prejudices of the Pagans, supported by falsehoods and calumnies against the Christians. Under the plausible pretence of their holding illegal meetings and societies, they were severely persecuted by the governors and other officers; in which persecution great numbers fell by the rage of popular tumult, as well as by laws and processes. This persecution continued several years, with different degrees of severity in many parts of the empire; and was so much the more afflicting, because the Christians generally suffered under the notion of malefactors and traitors, and under an emperor famed for his singular justice and moderation. The most noted martyr in this persecution was Clement, Bishop of Rome. After some time the fury of this persecution was abated, but did not cease during the whole reign of Trajan. In the eighth year of his successor, Adrian, it broke out with new rage. This is by some called the fourth general persecution; but is more commonly considered as a revival or continuance of the third.

Fourth general persecution.—This took place under Antoninus the philosopher; and at different places, with several intermissions, and different degrees of severity, it continued the greater part of his reign. Antoninus himself has been much excused as to this persecution. As the character of the virtuous Trajan, however, is sullied by the martyrdom of Ignatius, so the reign of the philosophic Marcus is for ever disgraced by the sacrifice of the venerable Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, the friend and companion of St. John. A few days previous to his death, he is said to have dreamed that his pillow was on fire. When urged by the proconsul to renounce Christ, he replied, "Fourscore and six years have I served him, and he has never done me an injury: can I blaspheme my King and my Saviour?" Several miracles are reported to have happened at his death. The flames, as if unwilling to injure his sacred person, are said to have arched over his head; and it is added, that at length, being dispatched with a sword, a dove flew out of the wound; and that from the pile proceeded a most fragrant smell. It is obvious that the arching of the flames might be an accidental effect, which the enthusiastic veneration of his disciples might convert into a miracle; and as to the story of the dove, etc., Eusebius himself apparently did not credit it; since he has omitted it in his narrative of the transaction. Among many other victims of persecution in this philosophic reign, we must also record that of the excellent and learned Justin. But it was at Lyons and Vienne in Gaul that the most shocking scenes were acted. Among many nameless sufferers, history has preserved from oblivion Pothinus, the respectable bishop of Lyons, who was then more than ninety years of age; Sanctus, a deacon of Vienne; Attalus, a native of Pergamos; Maturus, and Alexander; some of whom were devoured by wild beasts, and some of them tortured in an iron chair made red-hot. Some females, also, and particularly Bibles and Blandina, reflected honor both upon their sex and religion by their constancy and courage.

Fifth general persecution.—A considerable part of the reign of Severus proved so far favorable to the Christians, that no additions were made to the severe edicts already in force against them. For this lenity they were probably indebted to Proculus, a Christian, who, in a very extraordinary manner, cured the emperor of a dangerous distemper by the application of oil. But this degree of peace, precarious as it was, and frequently interrupted by the partial execution of severe laws, was terminated by an edict, A. D. 197, which prohibited every subject of the empire, under severe penalties, from embracing the Jewish or Christian faith. This law appears, upon a first view, designed merely to impede the further progress of Christianity; but it incited the magistracy to enforce the laws of former emperors, which were still existing, against the Christians; and during seven years they were exposed to a rigorous persecution in Palestine, Egypt, the rest of Africa, Italy, Gaul, and other parts. In this persecution Leonidas, the father of Origen, and Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, suffered martyrdom. On this occasion Tertullian composed his "Apology." The violence of Pagan intolerance was most severely felt in Egypt, and particularly at Alexandria.

Sixth general persecution.—This persecution began with the reign of the Emperor Maximinus, A. D. 235, and seems to have arisen from that prince's hatred to his predecessor, Alexander, in whose family many Christians had found shelter and patronage. Though this persecution was very severe in some places, yet we have the names of only a few martyrs. Origen at this time was very industrious in supporting the Christians under these fiery trials.

Seventh general persecution.—This was the most dreadful persecution that ever had been known in the Church. During the short reign of Decius, the Christians were exposed to greater calamities than any they had hitherto suffered. It has been said, and with some probability, that the Christians were involved in this persecution by their attachment to the family of the Emperor Philip. Considerable numbers were publicly destroyed; several purchased safety by bribes, or secured it by flight; and many deserted from the faith, and willingly consented to burn incense on the altars of the gods. The city of Alexandria, the great theatre of persecution, had even anticipated the edicts of the emperor, and had put to death a number of innocent persons, among whom were some women. The imperial edict for persecuting the Christians was published A. D. 249; and shortly afterward, Fabianus, Bishop of Rome, with a number of his followers, was put to death. The venerable bishops of Jerusalem and Antioch died in prison, the most cruel tortures were employed, and the numbers that perished are by all parties confessed to have been very considerable.

Eighth general persecution.—The Emperor Valerian, in the fourth year of his reign, A. D. 257, listening to the suggestions of Macrinus, a magician of Egypt, was prevailed upon to persecute the Christians, on pretence that by their wicked and execrable charms they hindered the prosperity of the emperor. Macrinus advised him to perform many impious rites, sacrifices, and incantations; to cut the throats of infants, etc.; and edicts were published in all places against the Christians, who were exposed without protection to the common rage. We have the names of several martyrs, among whom were the famous St. Laurence, Archdeacon of Rome, and the great St. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage.

Ninth general persecution.—This persecution took place under the Emperor Aurelian, A. D. 274; but it was so small and inconsiderable, that it gave little interruption to the peace of the Church.

Tenth general persecution.—The tenth and last general persecution of the Christians began in the nineteenth year of the Emperor Diocletian, A. D. 303. The most violent promoters of it were Hierocles the philosopher, who wrote against the Christian religion, and Galerius, whom Diocletian had declared Cæsar. This latter was excited not only by his own cruelty and superstition, but likewise by his mother, who was a zealous pagan. Diocletian, contrary to his inclination.

was prevailed upon to authorize the persecution by his edicts. Accordingly, it began in the city of Nicomedia, whence it spread into other cities and provinces, and became at last universal. Great numbers of Christians suffered the severest tortures in this persecution, though the accounts given of it by succeeding historians are probably exaggerated. There is, however, sufficient of well-authenticated facts to assure us amply of the cruel and intolerant disposition of the professors of pagan philosophy. The human imagination was, indeed, almost exhausted in inventing a variety of tortures. Some were impaled alive; some had their limbs broken, and in that condition were left to expire. Some were roasted by slow fires; and some suspended by their feet with their heads downward, and a fire being placed under them, were suffocated by the smoke. Some had melted lead poured down their throats, and the flesh of some was torn off with shells, and others had splinters of reeds thrust under the nails of their fingers and toes. The few who were not capitally punished had their limbs and their features mutilated. It would be endless to enumerate the victims of superstition. The bishops of Nicomedia, of Tyre, of Sidon, of Emesa, several matrons and virgins of the purest character, and a nameless number of plebeians, arrived at immortality through the flames of martyrdom. At last it pleased God that the Emperor Constantine, who himself afterward became a Christian, openly declared for the Christians, and published the first law in favor of them. The death of Maximin, Emperor of the East, soon after put a period to all their troubles; and this was the great epoch when Christianity triumphantly got possession of the thrones of princes.

The guilt of persecution has, however, been attached to professing Christians. Had men been guided solely by the spirit and the precepts of the gospel, the conduct of its blessed Author, and the writings and example of his immediate disciples, we might have boldly affirmed that among Christians there could be no tendency to encroach upon freedom of discussion, and no approach to persecution. The gospel, in every page of it, inculcates tenderness and mercy; it exhibits the most unwearied indulgence to the frailties and errors of men; and it represents charity as the badge of those who in sincerity profess it. In St. Paul's inimitable description of this grace, he has drawn a picture of mutual forbearance and kindness and toleration, upon which it is scarcely possible to dwell without being raised superior to every contracted sentiment, and glowing with the most diffusive benevolence. In the Churches which he planted he had often to counteract the efforts of teachers who had labored to subvert the foundation which he had laid, to misrepresent his motives, and to inculcate doctrines which, through the inspiration that was imparted to him, he discerned to proceed from the most perverted views, and to be inconsistent with the great designs of the gospel. These teachers he strenuously and conscientiously opposed; he endeavored to show the great importance of those to whom he wrote being on their guard against them; and he evinced the most ardent zeal in resisting their insidious purposes; but he never, in the most distant manner, insinuated that they should be persecuted, adhering always to the maxim which he had laid down, that the weapons of a Christian's warfare are not carnal but spiritual. He does, indeed, sometimes speak of heretics; and he even exhorts that, after expostulation with him, a heretic should be rejected, and not acknowledged to be a member of the Church to which he had once belonged. But that precept of the apostle has no reference to the persecution which it has sometimes been conceived to sanction, and which has been generally directed against men quite sincere in their belief, however erroneous that belief may be esteemed.

Upon a subject thus enforced by precept and example, it is not to be supposed that the first converts, deriving their notions of Christianity immediately from our Lord or his apostles, could have any opinion different in theory, at least, from that which has been now established. Accordingly, we find that the primitive fathers, although in many respects they erred, unequivocally express themselves in favor of the most ample liberty as to religious sentiment, and highly disapprove of every attempt to control it. Passages from many of these writers might be quoted to establish that this was almost the universal sentiment till the age of Constantine. Lactantius, in particular, has, with great force and beauty, delivered his opinion against persecution: "There is no need of compulsion and violence, because religion cannot be forced; and men must be made willing, not by stripes, but by arguments. Slaughter and piety are quite opposite to each other; nor can truth consist with violence, or justice with cruelty. They are convinced that nothing is more excellent than religion, and therefore think that it ought to be defended with force; but they are mistaken, both in the nature of religion, and in proper methods to support it; for religion is to be defended, not by murder, but by persuasion; not by cruelty, but by patience; not by wickedness, but by faith. If you attempt to defend religion by blood, and torments, and evil, this is not to defend, but to violate and pollute it; for there is nothing that should be more free than the choice of religion, in which, if consent be wanting, it becomes entirely void and ineffectual."

The general conduct of Christians during the first three centuries was in conformity with the admirable maxims now quoted. Eusebius has recorded that Polycarp, after in vain endeavoring to persuade Anicetus, who was Bishop of Rome, to embrace his opinion as to some point with respect to which they differed, gave him, notwithstanding, the kiss of peace, while Anicetus communicated with the martyr; and Irenæus mentions that although Polycarp was much offended with the Gnostic heretics, who abounded in his days, he converted numbers of them, not by the application of constraint or violence, but by the facts and arguments which he calmly submitted for their consideration. It must be admitted, however, that even during the second century some traces of persecution are to be found. Victor, one of the early pontiffs, because, the Asiatic bishops differed from him about the rule for the observation of Easter, excommunicated them as guilty of heresy; and he acted in the same manner toward a person who held what he considered as erroneous notions respecting the trinity. This stretch of authority was, indeed, reprobated by the generality of Christians, and remonstrances against it were accordingly presented. There was, however, in this proceeding of Victor, too clear a proof that the Church was beginning to deviate from the perfect charity by which it had been adorned, and too sure an indication that the example of one who held so high an office, when it was in harmony with the corruption or with the worst passions of our nature, would be extensively followed. But still there was, in the excommunication rashly pronounced by the pope, merely an exertion of ecclesiastical power, not interfering with the personal security, with the property, or with the lives of those against whom it was directed; and we may, notwithstanding this slight exception, consider the first three centuries as marked by the candor and the benevolence implied in the charity which judgeth not, and thinketh no evil.

It was after Christianity had been established as the religion of the empire, and after wealth and honor had been conferred on its ministers, that the monstrous evil of persecution acquired gigantic strength, and threw its blasting influence over the religion of the gospel. The causes of this are apparent. Men exalted in the scale of society were eager to extend the power which had been intrusted to them; and they sought to do so by exacting from the people acquiescence in the peculiar interpretations of tenets and doctrines which they chose to publish as articles of faith. The moment that this was attempted, the foundation was laid for the most inflexible intolerance; because reluctance to submit was no longer regarded solely as a matter of conscience, but as interfering with the interest and the dominion of the ruling party. It was therefore proceeded against with all the eagerness which men so unequivocally display when the temporal blessings that gratify their ambition or add to their comfort are attempted to be wrested from them. To other dictates than those of the word of God the members of the Church now listened; and opinions were viewed not in reference to that word, but to the effect which they might produce upon the worldly advancement or prosperity of those by whom they were avowed. From the era, then, of the conversion of Constantine we may date, if not altogether the introduction, at least the decisive influence of persecution.

PERSIDA, an ancient kingdom of Asia, bounded on the north by Media, on the west by Susiana, on the east by Caramania, and on the south by the Persian Gulf. The Persians became very famous from the time of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy. Their ancient name was Elamites, and in the time of the Roman emperors they went by the name of Parthians; but now Persians. See CYRUS; and for the religion of the ancient Persians, MAGI.

which is translated person in Heb. i. 3. The Synod of Alexandria, A. D. 362, decided that the words might be used interchangeably. The three Divine Persons, or Hypostases, are each the subject of attributes and actions, and yet they are not three distinct essences on the one hand, nor merely three names or relations on the other. See SABELLIANS and TRINITY.]

PESTILENCE, or plague, generally is used by the Hebrews for all epidemic or contagious diseases. The prophets usually connect together sword, pestilence, and famine, being three of the most grievous inflictions of the Almighty upon a guilty people. See DISEASES.

PETER, the great apostle of the circumcision, was the son of Jona, and born at Bethsaida, a town situated on the west shore of the Lake of Gennesaret, but in what particular year we are not informed. John i. 42, 43. His original name was Simon or Simeon, which his Divine Master, when he called him to the apostleship, changed for that of Cephas, a Syriac word signifying a stone or rock; in Latin, petra, from whence is derived the term Peter. He was a married man, and had his house, his mother-in-law, and his wife at Capernaum, on the Lake of Gennesaret. Matt. viii. 14; Mark i. 29; Luke iv. 38. He had also a brother of the name of Andrew, who had been a disciple of John the Baptist, and was called to the knowledge of the Saviour prior to himself. Andrew was present when the venerable Baptist pointed his disciples to Jesus, and added, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world;" and, meeting Simon shortly afterward, said, "We have found the Messiah," and then brought him to Jesus. John i. 41. When the two brothers had passed one day with the Lord Jesus, they took their leave of him, and returned to their ordinary occupation of fishing. This appears to have taken place in the thirtieth year of the Christian era. Toward the end of the same year, as Jesus was one morning standing on the shore of the Lake of Gennesaret, he saw Andrew and Peter engaged about their employment. They had been fishing during the whole night, but without the smallest success; and, after this fruitless expedition, were in the act of washing their nets. Luke v. 1-3. Jesus entered into their boat, and bade Peter throw out his net into the sea, which he did; and now, to his astonishment, the multitude of fishes was so immense that their own vessel and that of the sons of Zebedee were filled with them. Peter evidently saw there was something supernatural in this, and, throwing himself at the feet of Jesus, he exclaimed, "Depart from me, O Lord, for I am a sinful man." The miracle was no doubt intended for a sign to the four disciples of what success should afterward follow their ministry in preaching the doctrine of his kingdom; and therefore Jesus said unto them, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men;" on which they quitted their boats and nets, and thenceforth became the constant associates of the Saviour, during the whole of his public ministry. Luke xviii. 28.

From the instant of his entering upon the apostolic office, we find St. Peter on almost every occasion evincing the strength of his faith in Jesus as the Messiah, and the most extraordinary zeal in his service, of which many examples are extant in the Gospels. When Jesus in private asked his disciples, first, what opinion the people entertained of him; next, what was their own opinion: "Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Matt. xvi. 16. Having received this answer, Jesus declared Peter blessed on account of his faith; and, in allusion to the signification of his name, added, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church; and I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth," etc. Many think these things were spoken to St. Peter alone, for the purpose of conferring on him privileges and powers not granted to the rest of the apostles. But others, with more reason, suppose that, though Jesus directed his discourse to St. Peter, it was intended for them all; and that the honors and powers granted to St. Peter by name were conferred on them all equally; for no one will say that Christ's Church was built upon St. Peter singly: it was built on the foundation of all the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone. As little can any one say that the power of binding and loosing was confined to St. Peter, seeing it was declared afterward to belong to all the apostles. Matt. xviii. 18: John xx. 23. To these things add this, that as St. Peter made his confession in answer to a question which Jesus put to all the apostles, that confession was certainly made in the name of the whole; and, therefore, what Jesus said to him in reply was designed for the whole without distinction; excepting this, which was peculiar to him, that he was to be the first who, after the descent of the Holy Ghost, should preach the gospel to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles: an honor which was conferred on St. Peter in the expression, "I will give thee the keys," etc.

St. Peter was one of the three apostles whom Jesus admitted to witness the resurrection of Jairus's daughter, and before whom he was transfigured, and with whom he retired to pray in the garden the night before he suffered. He was the person who, in the fervor of his zeal for his Master, cut off the ear of the high-priest's slave, when the armed band came to apprehend him. Yet this same Peter, a few hours after that, denied his Master three different times in the high-priest's palace, and that with oaths. In the awful defection of the apostle on this occasion, we have melancholy proof of the power of human depravity even in regenerate men, and of the weakness of human resolutions when left to ourselves. St. Peter was fully warned by his Divine Master of his approaching danger; but confident in his own strength, he declared himself ready to accompany his Lord to prison and even to judgment. After the third denial, "Jesus turned and looked upon Peter:" that look pierced him to the heart; and, stung with deep remorse, "he went out and wept bitterly." St. Peter, however, obtained forgiveness; and when Jesus had risen from the dead, he ordered the glad tidings of his resurrection to be conveyed to St. Peter by name: "Go tell my disciples and Peter." Mark xvi. 8. He afterward received repeated assurances of his Saviour's love, and from that time uniformly showed the greatest zeal and fortitude in his Master's service.

Soon after our Lord's ascension, in a numerous assembly of the apostles and brethren, St. Peter gave it as his opinion, that one should be chosen to be an apostle in the room of Judas. To this they all agreed; and, by lot, chose Matthias, whom on that occasion they numbered with the eleven apostles. On the day of pentecost following, when the Holy Spirit fell on the apostles and disciples, St. Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice; that is, St. Peter, rising up, spake with a loud voice, in the name of the apostles, as he had done on various occasions in his Master's lifetime, and gave the multitude an account of that great miracle. Acts ii. 14. St. Peter now began to experience the fulfilment of Christ's promise to make him a fisher of men, and also that he would give him the keys of the kingdom of heaven. His sermon on this occasion produced an abundant harvest of converts to Christ. Three thousand of his audience were pricked to the heart, and cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" St. Peter proclaimed to them the riches of pardoning mercy through the Divine blood of the Son of God; and they that gladly received his doctrine were baptized and added to the Church. Acts ii. 37-43. The effects produced on the mind of this great apostle of the circumcision by the resurrection of his Divine Master, and the consequent effusion of the Holy Spirit, were evidently of the most extraordinary kind, and such as it is impossible to account for upon natural principles. He was raised superior to all considerations of personal danger and the fear of man. And though all the apostles could now say, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind," yet an attentive reader of the Acts of the Apostles cannot fail to perceive that upon almost every occasion of difficulty St. Peter is exhibited to our view as standing foremost in the rank of apostles. When St. Peter and John were brought before the council to be examined concerning the miracle wrought on the impotent man, St. Peter spake. It was St. Peter who questioned Ananias and Sapphira about the price of their lands; and, for their lying in that matter, punished them miraculously with death. It is remarkable, also, that although by the hands of the apostles many signs and wonders were wrought, it was by Peter's shadow alone that the sick, who were laid in the streets of Jerusalem, were healed as he passed by. Lastly: it was St. Peter who replied to the council in the name of the apostles, not obeying their command to preach no more in the name of Jesus.

St. Peter's fame was now become so great, that the brethren of Joppa, hearing of his being in Lydda, and of his having cured Eneas miraculously of a palsy, sent, desiring him to come and restore a disciple to life, named Tabitha, which he did. During his abode in Joppa, the Roman centurion Cornelius, directed by an angel, sent for him to come and preach to him. On that occasion the Holy Ghost fell on Cornelius and his company, while St. Peter spake. St. Peter, by his zeal and success in preaching the gospel, having attracted the notice of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Herod Agrippa, who, to please the Jews, had killed St. James, the brother of St. John, still further to gratify them, cast St. Peter into prison. But an angel brought him out; after which he concealed himself in the city, or in some neighboring town, till Herod's death, which happened about the end of the year. Some learned men think St. Peter at that time went to Antioch or to Rome. But if he had gone to any celebrated city, St. Luke, as L'Enfant observes, would probably have mentioned it. Besides, we find him in the Council of Jerusalem, which met not long after this to determine the famous question concerning the circumcision of the Gentiles. The council being ended, St. Peter went to Antioch, where he gave great offence, by refusing to eat with the converted Gentiles. But St. Paul withstood him to the face, rebuking him before the whole Church for his pusillanimity and hypocrisy. Gal. ii. 11-21.

In the Acts of the Apostles, no mention is made of St. Peter after the Council of Jerusalem. But from Gal. ii. 11, it appears that after that council he was with St. Paul at Antioch. He is likewise mentioned by St. Paul, 1 Cor. i. 12; iii. 22. It is generally supposed that after St. Peter was at Antioch with St. Paul, he returned to Jerusalem. What happened to him after that is not told in the Scriptures. But Eusebius informs us that Origen wrote to this purpose: St. Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia; and at length, coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downward.

We are indebted to this apostle for two Epistles, which constitute a valuable part of the inspired writings. The first Epistle of St. Peter has always been considered as canonical; and in proof of its genuineness we may observe that it is referred to by Clement of Rome, Hermas, and Polycarp; that we are assured by Eusebius that it was quoted by Papias; and that it is expressly mentioned by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, and most of the later fathers. The authority of the second Epistle of St. Peter was for some time disputed, as we learn from Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome; but since the fourth century it has been universally received, except by the Syriac Christians. It is addressed to the same persons as the former Epistle, and the design of it was to encourage them to adhere to the genuine faith and practice of the gospel.

[PETER-PENCE. A tax of a penny on each house, collected on St. Peter's day. It was first levied in 725, by Ina, King of the West Saxons, for a college at Rome; but the popes subsequently appropriated it to themselves. It was abolished by Henry VIII.]

PETHOR, a city of Mesopotamia, of which the prophet Balaam was a native. The Hebrews call this city Pethura. Ptolemy calls it Pachora; and Eusebius, Pathara. He places it in the Upper Mesopotamia.

[PETRA. See SELA.]

[PETROBRUSSIANS. Followers of Peter de Bruys, in Languedoc and Provence. He maintained that it is superstitious to build churches, and that those erected ought to be demolished, and that no person should be baptized until he has come to mature age. He assailed the abuses of the Church of Rome, and was burnt to death in 1180. His followers continued till the end of the thirteenth century.]

PHARAOH, a common name of the kings of Egypt. We meet with it as early as Gen. xii. 18. Josephus says that all the kings of Egypt, from Minæus, the founder of Memphis, who lived several ages before Abraham, always had the name of Pharaoh, down to the time of Solomon, for more than three thousand three hundred years. He adds, that in the Egyptian language the word Pharaoh means king, and that these princes did not assume the name until they ascended the throne, at which time they quitted their former name. [It means sun, which is the hieroglyph for king. In Osburn's "Ancient Egypt" there are the names of sixteen Pharaohs, descendants of Amosis, forming the eighteenth dynasty of Manetho. Their hieroglyphics are in two rings, or cartels, one containing the inaugural title, the other the proper name. Thus we find PHARAOH-NECHO, in 2 Kings xxiii. 29, and PHARAOH-HOPHRA—a name which has been found in the hieroglyphics—in Jer. xlv. 30. The prediction concerning this latter monarch was fulfilled when, after an unfortunate expedition against Cyrene, he was strangled by his rebellious army.]

PHARISEES, a sect of the Jews. The earliest mention of them is by Josephus, who tells us that they were a sect of considerable weight when John Hyrcanus was high-priest, B. C. 108. They were the most numerous, distinguished, and popular sect among the Jews: the time when they first appeared is not known, but it is supposed to have been not long after the institution of the Sadducees, if, indeed, the two sects did not gradually spring up together. They derived their name from the Hebrew word pharash, which signifies "separated," or "set apart;" because they separated themselves from the rest of the Jews to superior strictness in religious observances. They boasted that, from their accurate knowledge of religion, they were the favorites of Heaven; and thus, trusting in themselves that they were righteous, despised others. Luke xi. 52; xviii. 9, 11. Among the tenets inculcated by this sect, we may enumerate the following, namely: they ascribed all things to fate or providence; yet not so absolutely as to take away the free-will of man; for fate does not coöperate in every action. Acts v. 38, 39. They also believed in the existence of angels and spirits, and in the resurrection of the dead. Acts xxiii. 8. Lastly: the Pharisees contended that God stood engaged to bless the Jews, to make them all partakers of the terrestrial kingdom of the Messiah, to justify them, and make them eternally happy. The cause of their justification they derived from the merits of Abraham, from their knowledge of God, from their practicing the rite of circumcision, and from the sacrifices they offered. And as they conceived works to be meritorious, they had invented a great number of supererogatory ones, to which they attached greater merit than to the observance of the law itself. To this notion St. Paul has some allusions in those parts of his Epistle to the Romans in which he combats the erroneous suppositions of the Jews. Rom. i.-xi.

The Pharisees were the strictest of the three principal sects that divided the Jewish nation, Acts xxvi. 5, and affected a singular probity of manners according to their system; which, however, was, for the most part, both lax and corrupt. Thus many things which Moses had tolerated in civil life, in order to avoid a greater evil, the Pharisees determined to be morally right: for instance, the law of divorce from a wife for any cause, Matt. v. 31, etc.; xix. 3-12. (See DIVORCE.) Further: they interpreted certain of the Mosaic laws most literally, and distorted their meaning so as to favor their own selfish system. Thus, the law of loving their neighbor, they expounded solely of the love of their friends, that is, of the whole Jewish race; all other persons being considered by them as natural enemies, whom they were in no respect bound to assist. Matt. v. 43: Luke x. 31-33. They also trifled with oaths. Dr. Lightfoot has cited a striking illustration of this from Maimonides. An oath in which the name of God was not distinctly specified, they taught was not binding, Matt. v. 33; maintaining that a man might even swear with his lips, and at the same time annul it in his heart! And yet so rigorously did they understand the command of observing the Sabbath day, that they accounted it unlawful to pluck ears of corn, and heal the sick, etc. Matt. xii.: Luke vi. 6, etc.; xiv. Many moral rules they accounted inferior to the ceremonial laws, to the total neglect of mercy and fidelity. Matt. v. 19; xv. 4; xxiii. 23. Hence they accounted causeless anger and impure desires as trifles of no moment, Matt. v. 21, 22, 27-30: they compassed sea and land to make proselytes to the Jewish religion from among the Gentiles, that they might rule over their consciences and wealth; and these proselytes, through the influence of their own scandalous examples and characters, they soon rendered more profligate and abandoned than ever they were before their conversion. Matt. xxiii. 15. Esteeming temporal happiness and riches as the highest good, they scrupled not to accumulate wealth by every means, legal or illegal, Matt. xv. 1-12; xxiii. 5: Luke xvi. 14: James ii. 1-8: vain and ambitious of popular applause, they offered up long prayers in public places, but not without self-complacency in their own holiness, Matt. vi. 2-5: Luke xviii. 11: under a sanctimonious appearance of respect for the memories of the prophets whom their ancestors had slain, they repaired and beautified their sepulchres, Matt. xxiii. 29; and such was their idea of their own sanctity, that they thought themselves defiled if they but touched or conversed with sinners, that is, with publicans or tax-gatherers, and persons of loose and irregular lives. Luke vii. 39; xv. 1.

But, above all their other tenets, the Pharisees were conspicuous for their reverential observance of the traditions or decrees of the elders: these traditions, they pretended, had been handed down from Moses through every generation, but were not committed to writing; and they were not merely considered as of equal authority with the Divine law, but even preferable to it. "The words of the scribes," said they, "are lovely above the words of the law; for the words of the law are weighty and light, but the words of the scribes are all weighty." Among the traditions thus sanctimoniously observed by the Pharisees, we may briefly notice the following: the washing of hands up to the wrist before and after meat, Matt. xv. 2: Mark vii. 3; which they accounted not merely a religious duty, but considered its omission as a crime equal to fornication, and punishable by excommunication: the purification of the cups, vessels, and couches used at their meals by ablutions or washings, Mark vii. 4; for which purpose the six large water-pots mentioned by St. John, ii. 6, were destined: their fasting twice a week with great appearance of austerity, Luke xviii. 12: Matt. vi. 16; thus converting that exercise into religion which is only a help toward the performance of its hallowed duties: their punctilious payment of tithes, (temple offerings,) even of the most trifling things, Luke xviii. 12: Matt. xxiii. 23; and their wearing broader phylacteries and larger fringes to their garments than the rest of the Jews. Matt. xxiii. 5. See PHYLACTERIES.

With all their pretensions to piety, the Pharisees entertained the most sovereign contempt for the people; whom, being ignorant of the law, they pronounced to be accursed. John vii. 49. Yet such was the esteem and veneration in which they were held by the populace, that they may almost be said to have given what direction they pleased to public affairs; and hence the great men dreaded their power and authority. It is unquestionable, as Mosheim has well remarked, that the religion of the Pharisees was, for the most part, founded in consummate hypocrisy; and that, at the bottom, they were generally the slaves of every vicious appetite, proud, arrogant, and avaricious, consulting only the gratification of their lusts, even at the very moment when they professed themselves to be engaged in the service of their Maker. These odious features in the character of the Pharisees caused them to be reprimanded by our Saviour with the utmost severity, even more so than the Sadducees; who, although they had departed widely from the genuine principles of religion, yet did not impose on mankind by a pretended sanctity, or devote themselves with insatiate greediness to the acquisition of honors and riches. A few, and a few only, of the sect of the Pharisees, in those times, might be of better character—men who, though self-righteous and deluded and bigoted, were not, like the rest, hypocritical. Of this number was Saul of Tarsus; but as a body, their attachment to traditions, their passionate expectation of deliverance from the Roman yoke by the Messiah and the splendor of his civil reign, their pride, and, above all, their vices, sufficiently account for that unconquerable unbelief which had possessed their minds as to the claims of Christ, and their resistance to the evidence of his miracles. The sect of the Pharisees was not extinguished by the ruin of the Jewish commonwealth. The greater part of the Jews are still Pharisees, being as much devoted to traditions, or the oral law, as their ancestors were.

PHARPAR. See ABANA.

PHEBE, a deaconess of the port of Corinth, called Cenchrea. St. Paul had a particular esteem for this holy woman; and Theodoret thinks the apostle lodged at her house for some time, while he continued in or near Corinth. It is thought she carried the Epistle to Rome which he wrote to the Church of that city, in which she is so highly commended. Rom. xvi. 1, 2. It is thought that, in quality of deaconess, she was employed by the Church in some ministrations suitable to her sex and condition; as to visit and instruct the Christian women, and attend them in their sickness, and distribute alms to them in their necessities. [From the use of the legal terms παροστήτε, stand by, defend, and προστάτις, a patrona, protectress, it has been thought that Phoebe's "business" at Rome was connected with a lawsuit.]

[PHENICE. A harbor of Crete, which Conybeare and Howson identify with Lutro, which is sheltered from the south-west and north-west winds. They understand the language in Acts xxvii. 12 as that of sailors who "speak of every thing from their own point of view, and that such a harbor does 'look'—from the water toward the land which encloses—in the direction of 'south-west and north-west.'"]

PHENICIA, a province of Syria, the limits of which have been differently represented. Sometimes it has been defined as extending from north to south, from Orthosia as far as Pelusium. At other times its southern limit is said to have been Mount Carmel and Ptolemais. It is certain that, from the conquest of Palestine by the Hebrews, its limits were narrow, containing no part of the country of the Philistines, which occupied all the coast from Mount Carmel along the Mediterranean, as far as the borders of Egypt. It had also very little extent on the land side, because the Israelites, who possessed all Galilee, confined it to the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. The chief cities of Phenicia were Sidon, Tyre, Ptolemais, Ecdippe, Sarepta, Berythe, Biblos, Tripoli, Orthosia, Simira, Aradus. They formerly had possession of some cities in Libanus; and sometimes the Greek authors comprehend all Judea under the name of Phenicia. Phenicia may be considered as the birthplace of commerce, if not also of letters and the arts. It was a Phœnician who introduced into Greece the knowledge and the use of letters. Phœnician workmen built the temple of Solomon; Phœnician sailors navigated his ships; Phœnician pilots directed them; and before other nations had ventured to lose sight of their own shores, colonies of Phœnicians were established in the most distant parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa. These early advantages were owing, doubtless, in part to their own enterprising character, and in part also to their central situation, which enabled them to draw into their own narrow territory all the commerce between the east and the west. Bochart has labored to show that they sent colonies to almost all the isles and coasts of the Mediterranean Sea; but the most famous of all their colonies was that of Carthage. [Some derive the name from φαινός, because the Phœnicians traded largely in purple: Strabo derived it from the Red Sea, as they emigrated from its shores: Reland, and others, from φαινός, the palm tree, which abounded in Phenicia. Paul visited Phenicia in his route from Patara to Jerusalem. Acts xxi. 1-7.]

PHILADELPHIA, a city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, and one of the seven Churches of Asia. It derived its name from Attalus Philadelphus, its founder, and was seated on a branch of Mount Tmolus, about twenty-five miles south-east of Sardis, and seventy in nearly the same direction from Smyrna. It suffered greatly, in common with all this part of Asia, in the terrible earthquake during the reign of Tiberius, and in the seventeenth year of the Christian era. It has, however, retained a better fate than most of its neighbors; for, under the name of Alahsher, or the city of God, it is still a place of some repute, chiefly supported by trade, it being in the route of the caravans to Smyrna. "Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia," says Gibbon, "Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins." Although this city is now in the possession of the Turks, it has about a thousand Christian inhabitants, chiefly Greeks; who have five churches, with a resident bishop and inferior clergy. [Rabbath-ammon was also called Philadelphia. See RABBATH.]

PHILEMON was an inhabitant of Colosse; and from the manner in which he is addressed by St. Paul in his Epistle to him, it is probable that he was a person of some consideration in that city. St. Paul seems to have been the means of converting him to the belief of the gospel. Philemon 19. He calls him his fellow-laborer; and from that expression some have thought that he was bishop or deacon of the Church at Colosse; but others have been of opinion that he was only a private Christian, who had shown a zealous and active disposition in the cause of Christianity, without holding any ecclesiastical office. We learn from this Epistle itself, that it was written when St. Paul was a prisoner, and when he had hope of soon recovering his liberty; Philemon 1, 22; and thence we conclude that it was written toward the end of his first confinement at Rome. This Epistle has always been deservedly admired for the delicacy and address with which it is written; and it places St. Paul's character in a very amiable point of view. He had converted a fugitive slave to the Christian faith; and he here intercedes with his master in the most earnest and affectionate manner for his pardon: he speaks of Onesimus in terms calculated to soften Philemon's resentment, engages to make full compensation for any injury which he might have sustained from him, and conjures him to reconciliation and forgiveness by the now endearing connection of Christian brotherhood. See ONESIMUS.

[PHILIP. The name of two sons of Herod the Great. Luke iii. 1, 19. See ANTIPAS.]

PHILIP, the apostle, was a native of Bethsaida, in Galilee. Jesus Christ having seen him, said to him, "Follow me." John i. 43, 44. Philip followed him: he was present at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. Philip was called at the beginning of our Saviour's mission. He is mentioned, Luke vi. 13: Matt. x. 3: John vi. 5-7. Some Gentiles having a curiosity to see Jesus, a little before his passion, addressed themselves to Philip, John xii. 21, 22, who mentioned it to Andrew, and these two to Christ. At the last supper Philip desired the Saviour to show them the Father, John xiv. 8-10. This is all that we find concerning Philip in the Gospel.

PHILIP, the second of the seven deacons, Acts vi. 5, was, some say, of Caesarea in Palestine. It is certain his daughters lived in that city. Acts xxi. 8, 9. After the death of Stephen, all the Christians, except the apostles, having left Jerusalem, and being dispersed in several places, Philip went to preach at Sebaste or Samaria, where he performed several miracles, and converted many persons. Acts viii. 1-3, etc. He baptized them, but informed the apostles at Jerusalem that Samaria had received the word of God, that they might come and communicate the Holy Ghost to them. Peter and John came thither for that purpose. Philip was probably at Samaria when an angel commanded him to go on the road that leads from Jerusalem to old Gaza. Philip obeyed, and there met with an Ethiopian eunuch, belonging to Candace, Queen of Ethiopia, whom he converted and baptized. Acts viii. 26. Being come out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord took away Philip, and the eunuch saw him no more.

PHILIPPI, one of the chief cities of Macedonia, lying on the north-west of Neapolis, and formerly called Datum or Datus, but afterward taking its name from Philip, the celebrated king of Macedon, by whom it was repaired and beautified. In process of time it became a Roman colony. It was the first place at which St. Paul preached the gospel upon the continent of Europe, A. D. 51. He made many converts there, who soon afterward gave strong proofs of their attachment to him. Phil. iv. 15. He was at Philippi a second time, but nothing which then occurred is recorded. The Philippian Christians having heard of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, with their accustomed zeal sent Epaphroditus to assure him of the continuance of their regard, and to offer him a supply of money. His Epistle was written in consequence of that act of kindness; and it is remarkable for its strong expressions of affection. As the apostle tells the Philippians that he hoped to see them shortly, Phil. ii. 24, and there are plain intimations in this Epistle of his having been some time at Rome, Phil. i. 12, ii. 26, it is probable that it was written A. D. 62, toward the end of his confinement.

"It is a strong proof," says Chrysostom, "of the virtuous conduct of the Philippians, that they did not afford the apostle a single subject of complaint; for, in the whole Epistle which he wrote to them, there is nothing but exhortation and encouragement, without the mixture of any censure whatever."

[Philippi was first called Crenides, from the numerous fountains which were there, and which formed the Gaggitas, the "river" spoken of Acts xvi. 13, that flowed into the Strymon. Why it was called the "chief city" of Macedonia has occasioned no small discussion, seeing that Thessalonica was the metropolis of the province, and Amphipolis the chief city of its first division, Macedonia Prima. See Bloomfield in loc. Bishop Pearce suggests that in Paul's time it may have taken the honor from Amphipolis, in view of the victory gained there by Augustus. Conybeare and Howson say, πρώτη "must certainly mean the first city in its geographical relation to St. Paul's journey, not the first politically either of Macedonia or a part of it."]

PHILISTIM, or PHILISTINES, a people who are commonly said to have descended from Caslulim, the son of Mizraim or Mizr, who peopled Egypt. The Philistines, it is probable, continued with their progenitors in Egypt until they were sufficiently numerous and powerful to stretch themselves along the coast of Canaan, doubtless by driving out that portion of the family of Ham. It is certain that, in the time of Abraham, the Canaanites were in possession of the rest of the land, to which they gave their name; but the extreme south of Philistia, or Palestine, was even then possessed by the Philistines, whose king, Abimelech, reigned at Gerar. After this, in the time of Joshua, we find their country divided into five lordships or principalities; namely, Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron; giving sometimes also, as it appears, the title of king to their respective rulers; Achish being termed king of Gath, 1 Sam. xxi. 10. The time of their coming to Palestine is unknown; but they had been long in Canaan when Abraham came thither, in the year of the world 2083. The name Philistine is not Hebrew. The Septuagint generally translate it Ἀλλόφυλοι, strangers. The Pelethites and Cherethites were also Philistines; and the Septuagint sometimes translate Cherethim, Κρηῖται, Cretes. They were not of the cursed seed of Canaan. However, Joshua did not forbear to give their land to the Hebrews, and to attack them by command from the Lord, because they possessed a country promised to Israel. But these conquests of Joshua must have been ill maintained, since, under the Judges, under Saul, and at the beginning of the reign of King David, the Philistines had their kings and their lords, whom they called Sazanim; since their state was divided into five little kingdoms, or satrapies; and since they oppressed the Israelites during the government of the high-priest Eli, and of Samuel, and during the reign of Saul, for about a hundred and twenty years, from A. M. 2848 to A. M. 2960. True it is, that Shamgar, Samson, Samuel, and Saul, opposed them, and killed some of their people, but did not reduce their power. They continued independent till the time of David, who subdued them. 2 Sam. v. 17; viii. 1, 2, etc.

They continued in subjection to the kings of Judah down to the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, about two hundred and forty-six years, when they revolted from Jehoram. 2 Chron. xxi. 16. Jehoram made war against them, and probably reduced them to his obedience again; because it is observed in Scripture that they revolted again from Uzziah, who kept them to their duty during his whole reign. 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7. Uzziah began to reign A. M. 3194. During the unfortunate reign of Ahaz, the Philistines made great havoc in the territory of Judah; but his son and successor, Hezekiah, subdued them again. 2 Chrn. xxviii. 18: 2 Kings xviii. 8. Lastly, they regained their full liberty under the later kings of Judah; and we may see, by the menaces made against them by the prophets Isaiah, Amos, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, that they brought a thousand hardships and calamities on the children of Israel, for which God threatened to punish them with great misfortunes.

Esar-haddon, successor to Sennacherib, besieged Ashdod, or Azoth, and took it by the arms of his general, Thasthan, or Tartan. Psammetichus, King of Egypt, took the same city after a siege of twenty-nine years, according to Herodotus. During the siege of Tyre, which held out thirteen years, Nebuchadnezzar used part of his army to subdue the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and other nations bordering on the Jews. There is great probability that the Philistines could not withstand him, but were reduced to his obedience, as well as the other people of Syria, Phenicia, and Palestine. Afterward they fell under the dominion of the Persians; then under that of Alexander the Great, who destroyed the city of Gaza, the only city of the Phenicians that dared to oppose him. After the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Asmoneans took by degrees several cities from the country of the Philistines, which they subjected. Tryphon, regent of the kingdom of Syria, gave to Jonathan, the Asmonean, the government of the whole coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt; consequently, all the country of the Philistines.

The land of the Philistines bordered on the west and south-west of Judea, and lies on the south-east point of the Mediterranean Sea. The country to the north of Gaza is very fertile, and long after the Christian era it possessed a very numerous population and strongly fortified cities. No human probability, says Keith, could have existed in the time of the prophets, or at a much more recent date, of its eventual desolation. But it has belied, for many ages, every promise which the fertility of its soil, and the excellence both of its climate and situation, gave for many preceding centuries of its permanency as a rich and well-cultivated region. And the voice of prophecy, which was not silent respecting it, proclaimed the fate that awaited it, in terms as contradictory, at the time, to every natural suggestion, as they are descriptive of what Philistia now actually is. "I will stretch out my hand upon the Philistines, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coasts." Ezek. xxv. 16. "Baldness is come upon Gaza; Ashkelon is cut off with the remnant of their valley." Jer. xlvii. 5. "Thus saith the Lord, For three transgressions of Gaza, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof. I will send a fire upon the wall of Gaza, which shall devour the palaces thereof. And I will cut off the inhabitant from Ashdod, and him that holdeth the sceptre from Ashkelon; and I will turn my hand against Ekron; and the remnant of the Philistines shall perish, saith the Lord God." Amos i. 6, 7, 8. "For Ashkelon shall be a desolation;" it shall be cut off with the remnant of the valley; "and Ekron shall be rooted up.—O Canaan, the land of the Philistines, I will even destroy thee, that there shall be no inhabitant; and the sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks." Zeph. ii. 4, 5, 6. "The king shall perish from Gaza, and Ashkelon shall not be inhabited." Zech. ix. 5.

The land of the Philistines was to be destroyed. It partakes of the general desolation common to it with Judea and other neighboring states. While ruins are to be found in all Syria, they are particularly abundant along the sea-coast, which formed, on the south, the realm of the Philistines. But its aspect presents some existing peculiarities, which travellers fail not to particularize, and which, in reference both to the state of the country and the fate of its different cities, the prophets failed not to discriminate as justly as if their description had been drawn both with all the accuracy which ocular observation, and all the certainty which authenticated history, could give. Volney, (though, like one who in ancient times was instrumental to the fulfilment of a special prediction, "he meant not so, neither did his heart think so,") from the manner in which he generalizes his observations, and marks the peculiar features of the different districts of Syria, with greater acuteness and perspicuity than any other traveller whatever, is the ever-ready purveyor of evidence in all the cases which came within the range of his topographical description of the wide field of prophecy; while, at the same time, from his known, open, and zealous hostility to the Christian cause, his testimony is alike decisive and unquestionable; and the vindication of the truth of the following predictions may safely be committed to this redoubted champion of infidelity. "In the plain between Ramla and Gaza"—the very plain of the Philistines along the sea-coast—"we met with a number of villages badly built, of dried mud, and which, like the inhabitants, exhibit every mark of poverty and wretchedness. The houses, on a nearer view, are only so many huts, (cottages,) sometimes detached, at others ranged in the forms of cells around a courtyard, enclosed by a mud wall. In winter, they and their cattle may be said to live together; the part of the dwelling allotted to themselves being only raised two feet above that in which they lodge their beasts:"—"Dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks." "Except the environs of these villages, all the rest of the country is a desert, and abandoned to the Bedouin Arabs, who feed their flocks on it." Thus accomplishing the words of prophecy, "The remnant shall perish; the land of the Philistines shall be destroyed, that there shall be no inhabitant; and the sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks." "The ruins of white marble, sometimes found at Gaza, prove that it was formerly the abode of luxury and opulence. It has shared in the general destruction; and, notwithstanding its proud title of the capital of Palestine, it is now no more than a defenceless village," (baldness has come upon it,) "peopled by, at most, only two thousand inhabitants."—"It is forsaken," says the prophet, "and bereaved of its king." "The sea-coast, by which it was formerly washed, is every day removing farther from the deserted ruins of Ashkelon." "Amidst the various successive ruins, those of Edzoud," Ashdod, "so powerful under the Philistines, are now remarkable for their scorpions." Here again we are reminded of the words of inspiration: "The inhabitants shall be cut off from Ashdod."

Thus Volney becomes an unconscious commentator upon prophecy. But let us hear a Christian traveller. "Ashkelon," says Richardson, "was one of the proudest satrapies of the lords of the Philistines: now there is not an inhabitant within its walls; and the prophecy of Zechariah is fulfilled: 'The king shall perish from Gaza, and Ashkelon shall not be inhabited.' When the prophecy was uttered, both cities were in an equally flourishing condition; and nothing but the prescience of Heaven could pronounce on which of the two, and in what manner, the vial of its wrath should be poured out. Gaza is truly without a king. The lofty towers of Ashkelon lie scattered on the ground, and the ruins within its walls do not shelter a human being. How is the wrath of man made to praise his Creator! Hath he not said, and shall he not do it? The oracle was delivered by the mouth of the prophet more than five hundred years before the Christian era, and we beheld its accomplishment eighteen hundred years after that event." There is yet another city which was noted by the prophets, the very want of any information respecting which, and the absence of its name from several modern maps of Palestine, while the sites of other ruined cities are marked, are really the best confirmation of the truth of the prophecy that could possibly be given. "Ekron shall be rooted up." It is rooted up. It was one of the chief cities of the Philistines; but, though Gaza still subsists, and while Ashkelon and Ashdod retain their names in their ruins, the very name of Ekron is missing. [See ASHDOD, ASKELEON, EKRON, GATH, GAZA, PALESTINE.]

[PHILOPONISTS. Followers of Philoponus, an Alexandrian philosopher of the sixth century, who taught Tritheism, and maintained, in opposition to the Conists, that the form as well as substance of the body will be restored in the resurrection.]

PHILOSOPHY, in general, is defined, "the knowledge and study of nature and morality, founded on reason and experience." Philosophy owes its name to the modesty of Pythagoras, who refused the high title of σοφός, wise, given to his predecessors, Thales, Pherecydes, etc., as too assuming; and contented himself with the simple appellation of φιλόσοφος, quasi φίλος τῆς σοφίας, a friend, or lover of wisdom; but Chauvin rather chooses to derive the name from φίλις, desire to study, and σοφία, studium sapientiae; and says that Pythagoras, conceiving that the application of the human mind ought rather to be called study than science, set aside the appellation of wise, and, in lieu thereof, took that of philosopher.

A knowledge of the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, or the science of natural history, was always an object of interest. We are informed that Solomon himself had given a description of the animal and vegetable kingdoms.

1 Kings iv. 33. Traces of philosophy, strictly so called, that is, the system of prevailing moral opinions, may be found in the book of Job, in the thirty-seventh, thirty-ninth, and seventy-third Psalms; also in the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, but chiefly in the apocryphal book of Wisdom, and the writings of the son of Sirach. During the captivity, the Jews acquired many new notions, particularly from the Mahestani, and appropriated them, as occasion offered, to their own purposes. They at length became acquainted with the philosophy of the Greeks, which makes its appearance abundantly in the book of Wisdom. After the captivity, the language in which the sacred books were written was no longer vernacular. Hence arose the need of an interpreter on the sabbatic year, a time when the whole law was read, and also on the Sabbath in the synagogues, which some think had been recently erected, in order to make the people understand what was read. These interpreters learned the Hebrew language at the schools. The teachers of these schools, who, for the two generations preceding the time of Christ, had maintained some acquaintance with the Greek philosophy, were not satisfied with a simple interpretation of the Hebrew idiom, as it stood, but shaped the interpretation so as to render it conformable to their philosophy. Thus arose contentions, which gave occasion for the various sects of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. In the time of our Saviour, divisions had arisen among the Pharisees themselves. No less than eighteen nice questions, if we may believe the Jewish rabbins, were contested at that period between the schools of Hillel and Shammai; one of which questions was an inquiry, what cause was sufficient for a bill of divorce. If the Shammai and Hillel of the Talmud are the same with the learned men mentioned in Josephus, namely, Sameas and Pollio, who flourished thirty-four years before Christ, then Shammai, or Sameas, is undoubtedly the same with the Simeon who is mentioned, Luke ii. 25-35; and his son Gamaliel, so celebrated in the Talmud, is the same with the Gamaliel mentioned, Acts v. 34; xxii. 3.

Anciently, learned men were denominated among the Hebrews חכמים, as among the Greeks they were called σοφοί, wise men. In the time of Christ, the common appellative for men of that description was γραμματεὺς, in the Hebrew סופר, a scribe. They were addressed by the honorary title of rabbi, רבי, "great," or "master." The Jews, in imitation of the Greeks, had their seven wise men, who were called rabbont. Gamaliel was one of the number. They called themselves the children of wisdom; expressions which correspond very nearly to the Greek φιλόσοφος. Matt. xi. 19: Luke vii. 35. The heads of sects were called "Fathers;" the disciples were denominated "sons," or "children." Matt. xii. 27; xxiii. 1-9. The Jewish teachers, at least some of them, had private lecture-rooms; but they also taught and disputed in synagogues, in temples, and, in fact, wherever they could find an audience. The method of these teachers was the same with that which prevailed among the Greeks. Any disciple who chose might propose questions, upon which it was the duty of the teachers to remark and give their opinions. Luke ii. 46. The teachers were not invested with their functions by any formal act of the Church, or of the civil authority: they were self-constituted. They received no other salary than some voluntary present from the disciples, which was called an "honorary," τιμὴ, honorarium. 1 Tim. v. 17. They acquired a subsistence, in the main, by the exercise of some art or handicraft. That they took a higher seat than their auditors, although it was probably the case, does not follow, as is sometimes supposed, from Luke ii. 46. According to the Talmudists, they were bound to hold no conversation with women, and to refuse to sit at table with the lower class of people. Matt. ix. 11: John iv. 27. The subjects on which they taught were numerous, commonly intricate, and of no great consequence; in which there are abundant examples in the Talmud.

St. Paul bids the Colossians beware lest any man should spoil them "through philosophy and vain deceit;" that is, a vain and deceitful philosophy, such as was popular in that day, and had been compounded out of all preceding systems, Grecian and oriental. An explanation of this philosophy is given under Gnostics, and CABAŁA.

On these ancient systems of pretended wisdom, Dr. Burton justly remarks: "Philosophy is indeed the noblest stretch of intellect which God has vouchsafed to man; and it is only when man forgets that he received his reasoning powers from God, that he is in danger of losing himself in darkness when he sought for light. To measure that which is infinite, is as impossible in metaphysics as in physics. If it had not been for revelation, we should have known no more of the Deity than the heathen philosophers knew before; and to what did their knowledge amount? They felt the necessity of a First Cause, and they saw that that Cause must be intrinsically good; but when they came to systems, they never went farther than the point from which they first set out, that evil is not good, and good is not evil. The Gnostics thought to secure the triumph of their scheme by veiling its weaker points in mystery, and by borrowing a part from almost every system. But popular, and even successful, as this attempt may have been, we may say with truth, that the scheme which flattered the vanity of human wisdom, and which strove to conciliate all opinions, has died away, and is forgotten; while the gospel, the unassuming, the uncompromising doctrine of the gospel, aided by no human wisdom, and addressing itself not merely to the head but to the heart, has triumphed over all systems and all philosophers, and still leads its followers to that true knowledge which some have endeavored to teach 'after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ.'"

PHINEHAS, son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron, third high-priest of the Jews. A. M. 2571 to about A. M. 2590, B. C. 1414. He is particularly commended in Scripture for zeal in vindicating the glory of God, when the Midianites had sent their daughters into the camp of Israel, to tempt the Hebrews to fornication and idolatry. Num. xxv. 7. On this account the Lord promised the priesthood to Phinehas by perpetual covenant; evidently including this tacit condition, that his children should continue faithful and obedient; for we know the priesthood passed out of the family of Eleazar and Phinehas to that of Ithamar, and that it returned not to the posterity of Eleazar until after about a hundred and fifty years.

[PHOTINIANS. Followers of Photinus, disciple of Marcellus, and Bishop of Sirminum. He taught that Christ was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary; that he then became the subject of a Divine emanation which he called the Word; and that, on account of the union between the Word and the human nature, Christ is called the Son of God and even God himself. He held, also, that the Holy Ghost is not a person, but a celestial virtue, proceeding from God. He was deposed A. D. 351, but his followers continued to the end of the fifth century.]

[PHRYGIA. A province of Asia Minor, which, under the Persian empire and after the death of Alexander, was bounded on the north by Bithynia and Pamphlagonia, on the south by Lycia, Pisidia, and Lycæonia, on the east by Pontus and Cappadocia, and on the west by Lydia and Mysia. The Gauls abstracted a considerable amount of the northern part, and called it Galatia. The ancients speak of Lesser Phrygia, which was a part of Mysia. Great Phrygia was Phrygia Proper. Phrygia Epictetus was the name given to its northern part after the abstraction of Galatia, as it was annexed to the kingdom of Pergamus. The southern part, bordering on Mount Taurus, was called Phrygia Paroreios. In the fourth century, the Romans divided Phrygia into two provinces, Salutaris on the east, and Pacatiana on the west. Phrygia is a high table-land, very fertile on the north and west, but abounding on the south and east with salt-marshes, rivers, and lakes. Of the salt lakes, one called Tatta by Strabo, now Tuzla, is thirty miles long. The Phrygians appear to have been of Thracian origin, and are said to have immigrated a hundred years before the Trojan war. They were conquered by Cræsus, and by the Persians. On the partition of Alexander's dominions, Phrygia fell to Antigonus, and afterward to the Seleucidæ. After the conquest of Antiochus the Great, it fell to Eumenes, King of Pergamus, and on the death of Attalus, B. C. 133, to the Romans. It was represented at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 10, and was twice traversed by Paul, Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23. Colosse, Hierapolis, and Laodicea were in the south and west of Phrygia.]

PHUT, or PUT, the posterity of Phut, the son of Ham. Gen. x. 6. Calmet is of opinion that Phut, the third son of Ham, peopled either the canton of Phtemphu, Phtemphiti, Phtembuti, of Pliny and Ptolemy, whose capital was Thara, in Lower Egypt, inclining toward Libya; or the canton called Phthenotes, of which Buthas was the capital. The prophets often speak of Phut. In the time of Jeremiah, xlv. 9, Phut was under the obedience of Necho, King of Egypt. Nahum, iii. 9, reckons this people in the number of those who ought to come to the assistance of No-Ammon, or Diospolis.

PHYLACTERIES, called by the Jews פְּתִילֵי, [Tephelin,] are little scrolls of parchment, in which are written certain sentences of the law, enclosed in leather cases, and bound with thongs on the forehead and on the left arm. They are called in Greek φυλακτήρια, from φυλάττω, custodio, either because they were supposed to preserve the law in memory, or rather because they were looked upon as a kind of amulets or charms to keep them from danger. The making and wearing these phylacteries, as the Jews still do in their private devotions, is owing to a misinterpretation of those texts on which they ground the practice, namely, God's commanding them "to bind the law for a sign on their hands, and to let it be as frontlets between their eyes," etc. Deut. vi. 8. The command ought doubtless to be understood metaphorically, as a charge to remember it, to meditate upon it, to have it as it were continually before their eyes, and to conduct their lives by it; as when Solomon says, concerning the commandments of God in general, "Bind them about thy neck, write them upon the table of thy heart." Prov. iii. 1, 3; vi. 21. However, the Jews, understanding the precept literally, wrote out the several passages wherever it occurs, and to which it seems to refer, and bound them upon their foreheads and upon their arms. It seems the Pharisees used to "make broad their phylacteries." This some understand of the knots of the thongs by which they were fastened, which were tied very artificially in the form of Hebrew letters; and that the pride of the Pharisees induced them to have these knots larger than ordinary, as a peculiar ornament. The Pharisees are further said to "enlarge the borders of their garments," τὰ κράσπεδα τῶν ἱματίων. Matt. xxiii. 5. These κράσπεδα were the פְּתִילֵי, the fringes which the Jews are commanded to wear upon the borders of their garments. Num. xv. 38, 39. The Targum of Onkelos calls them בְּרִיסְתֵּיךְ, which has so near an affinity with the Greek word κράσπεδον, that there is no doubt it signifies the same thing; which is, therefore, an evidence that κράσπεδα were the פְּתִילֵי. These were worn by our Saviour, as appears from the following passage: "Behold, a woman, which was diseased with an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the hem of his garment," κράσπεδον τοῦ ἱματίου. Matt. ix. 20. Again: the inhabitants of Gennesaret are said to have brought unto him their diseased, and to have "besought him that they might only touch the hem of his garment," κράσπεδον τοῦ ἱματίου. Matt. xiv. 36. Κράσπεδον τοῦ ἱματίου is, in both these passages, very improperly translated the "hem of his garment:"

it should have been rendered "the fringe." The Pharisees are censured by our Saviour for enlarging these fringes of their garments, which we may suppose they did partly from pride, and partly from hypocrisy, as pretending thereby an extraordinary regard for the precepts of the law. It is reported by Jerome, as quoted by Godwin, that they used to have fringes extravagantly long; sticking thorns in them, that, by pricking their legs as they walked, they might put them in mind of the law. See FRONTLETS.

[The primitive Christians called the cases in which they enclosed the dead, phylacteries: they sometimes gave the name also to the sacraments.]

[PHYSICIAN. Medical practitioners obtained among the ancient Egyptians: Gen. i. 2: Jer. xlv. 11; and also among the Jews: 2 Chron. xvi. 12: Job xiii. 4: Prov. xvii. 22: Jer. viii. 22: Ezek. xxx. 21: Ecclus. x. 10; xxxviii. 1-15: Matt. ix. 12: Mark v. 26: Luke iv. 23: Col. iv. 14.]

It was famous for a temple of Bubastes, or Diana, whose worship was celebrated by seventy thousand persons, exclusive of children. Here also the sacred cats were interred. See Herodotus, Euterpe, 59, 67, 156. The remains, called Tel Basta, comprise extensive mounds and ruins of temples.]

[PICARDS. According to Æneas Sylvius, they were the followers of Picard of Bohemia in the sixteenth century, who inculcated the licentious principles of the Adamites. But this has been denounced as a slander upon the Picards, who are thought to have been Waldenses who fled to Bohemia to escape persecution.]

[PICTURES. The use of pictures in churches was condemned by the Council of Iliberis, A. D. 305. In the fifth century the practice became common. No representations of the Trinity, however, were tolerated until after the second Council of Nice. Pictures are used in the Greek and Lutheran Churches, but they are not worshipped.]

[PIE. An old Popish service-book, so called, according to some, from pinax, the index, or tables in it showing how the service was to be read. Others think it was called pie from the different colors of the text and rubric. The old phrase, "cock and pie," which Dr. Johnson did not understand, is supposed to have been an adoration by the service-book, referring to the various colors in which it was written or printed—cock being an abbreviation of κόκκος, scarlet, or red: pie, from litera picata, a great black letter at the beginning of some new order in the service: hence pica letter among printers.]

PIETISTS, PROTESTANT, a denomination in the seventeenth century, which owed its origin to "the pious and learned Spener," as Dr. Mosheim calls him, who formed private devotional societies at Frankfurt, in order to cultivate vital and practical religion; and published a book entitled "Pious Desires," which greatly promoted this object. His followers laid it down as an essential maxim, that none should be admitted into the ministry but those who not only had received a proper education, but were also distinguished by their wisdom and sanctity of manners, and had hearts filled with divine love. Hence they proposed an alteration in the schools of divinity, which embraced the following points: 1. That the scholastic theology, which reigned in the academies, and was composed of intricate and disputable doctrines, and obscure and unusual forms of expression, should be totally abolished. 2. That polemical divinity, which comprehended the controversies subsisting between Christians of different communions, should be less eagerly studied, and less frequently treated, though not entirely neglected. 3. That all mixture of philosophy and human science with Divine wisdom was to be most carefully avoided; that is, that pagan philosophy and classical learning should be kept distinct from, and by no means supersede, biblical theology. But, 4. That, on the contrary, all those students who were designed for the ministry, should be accustomed from their early youth to the perusal and study of the Holy Scriptures, and be taught a plain system of theology, drawn from these unerring sources of truth. 5. That the whole course of their education was to be so directed as to render them useful in life, by the practical power of their doctrine, and the commanding influence of their example. Such, in substance, is Mosheim's account of the meditated reforms in the public schools. But it was not intended to confine these reforms to students and the clergy. Religious persons of every class and rank were encouraged to meet in what were called biblical colleges, or colleges of piety, (we might call them prayer-meetings,) where some exercised in reading the Scriptures, singing, and prayer, and others engaged in the exposition of the Scriptures; not in a dry and critical way, but in a strain of practical and experimental piety, by which they mutually edified each other. This practice, which always more or less obtains where religion flourishes, as, for instance, at the Reformation, raised the same sort of outcry as at the rise of Methodism; and those who entered not into the spirit of the design, were eager to catch at every instance of weakness or imprudence, to bring disgrace on that which, in fact, brought disgrace upon themselves, as lukewarm and formal Christians. "In so saying, Master, thou reproachest us also." This work began about 1670. In 1691 Dr. Spener removed from Dresden to Berlin, where he propagated the same principles, which widely spread, and were well supported in many parts of Germany by the excellent Professor Francke and others, until the general decline of religion which has unhappily prevailed in Germany for the last half century. See NEOLOGY.

PI-HAHIROTH. The Hebrew pi answers to the modern Arabic word fum, signifying "mouth;" and is generally applied to the passes in the mountains. In the English and Septuagint versions, Hahiroth is taken as a proper name; and the whole word would imply the mouth or pass of Hahiroth or Hiroth, whatever particular origin or signification may belong to that word. The name, however, sufficiently explains the situation of the children of Israel; who were hemmed in at this place, between the sea in front, and a narrow mountain-pass behind; which no doubt encouraged Pharaoh to make his attack upon them in so disadvantageous a position; thinking that they must inevitably fall an easy prey into his hands, or be cut to pieces: when their deliverance, and his own destruction, were unexpectedly wrought by the parting of the waters of the sea. The place where this miracle is supposed to have happened, is still called Bahral-Kolsum, or the Sea of Destruction; and just opposite to the situation which answers to the opening called Pi-hahiroth, is a bay, where the north cape is called Ras Musa, or the Cape of Moses. That part of the western or Heropolitan branch of the Red Sea, where, from these coincidences, the passage most probably took place, is described by Bruce as about three leagues over, with fourteen fathoms of water in the channel, nine at the sides, and good anchorage everywhere. The farther side is also represented as a low sandy coast, and an easy landing-place. See RED SEA.

PILATE. It is not known of what country or family Pontius Pilate was, but it is believed that he was of Rome, or, at least, of Italy. He was sent to govern Judea in the room of Gratus, A. D. 26 or 27. He presided over this province for ten years, from the twelfth or thirteenth year of Tiberius to the twenty-second of the same emperor. He is represented, both by Philo and Josephus, as a man of an impetuous and obstinate temper, and, as a judge, one who used to sell justice, and, for money, to pronounce any sentence that was desired. The same authors make mention of his rapines, his injuries, his murders, the torments that he inflicted upon the innocent, and the persons he put to death without any form of process. Philo, in particular, describes him as a man that exercised an excessive cruelty during the whole time of his government; who disturbed the repose of Judea; and was the occasion of the troubles and revolt that followed. St. Luke acquaints us that Pilate had mingled the blood of the Galileans with their sacrifices; and that the matter, having been related to Jesus Christ, he introduced the subject into his discourse. Luke xiii. The reason why Pilate treated them in this manner, while sacrificing in the temple, is not known. At the time of our Saviour's passion, Pilate made some attempts to deliver him out of the hands of the Jews. He knew the reasons of their enmity against him. Matthew xxvii. 18. His wife, also, having had a dream that alarmed her, requested that he would not stain his hands with the blood of that just person, verse 19. He therefore attempted to appease the wrath of the Jews by scourging Jesus, John xix. 1: Matt. xxvii. 26; and also tried to take him out of their hands by proposing to deliver him or Barabbas on the day of the passover. Lastly, he thought to discharge himself from pronouncing judgment against him, by sending him to Herod, King of Galilee. Luke xxiii. 7, 8. When he saw all this would not satisfy the Jews, and that they even threatened him in some manner, saying he could be no friend to the emperor if he suffered Jesus to be set at liberty, John xix. 12-15, he caused water to be brought, and washed his hands before all the people, and publicly declared himself innocent of the blood of that just person. Matt. xxvii. 23, 24. Yet at the same time he delivered him to his soldiers that they might crucify him. This was enough to justify Jesus Christ, as Calmet observes, and to prove that he held him as innocent; but it was not enough to vindicate the conscience and integrity of a judge, whose duty it was as well to assert the cause of oppressed innocence as to punish the guilty. He ordered the inscription to be placed over the head of our Saviour, John xix. 19; and when requested by the Jews to alter it, peremptorily refused. He also gave leave for the removal of our Lord's body, and to place a guard over the sepulchre. Matt. xxvii. 65. These are all the particulars that we learn concerning Pilate from the writers of the Gospels.

The extreme reluctance of Pilate to condemn Christ, considering his merciless character, is signally remarkable, and still more his repeated protestations of the innocence of his prisoner; although, on occasions of massacre, he made no scruple of confounding the innocent with the guilty. But he was unquestionably influenced by the overruling providence of God to make the righteousness of his Son appear as clear as the noon-day, even when condemned and executed as a malefactor, by the fullest, the most authentic, and the most public evidence: 1. By the testimony even of his judges, Pilate and Herod, after examination of evidence. 2. By the message of Pilate's wife, delivered to him on the tribunal. 3. By the testimony of the traitor Judas, who hanged himself in despair, for betraying the innocent blood. 4. By the testimony of the Roman centurion and guard, at his crucifixion, to his divinity and righteousness. And, 5. Of his fellow-sufferer on the cross. Never was innocence so attested as his innocence.

Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Eusebius, and after them several others, both ancient and modern, assure us that it was formerly the custom for Roman magistrates to prepare copies of all verbal processes and judicial acts which they passed in their several provinces, and to send them to the emperor. And Pilate, in compliance with the custom, having sent word to Tiberius of what had passed relating to Jesus Christ, the emperor wrote an account of it to the senate, in a manner that gave reason to judge that he thought favorably of the religion of Jesus Christ, and showed that he should be willing for them to confer divine honors upon him; but the senate was not of the same opinion, and so the matter dropped. It appears by what Justin says of these acts, that the miracles of Christ were mentioned there, and even that the soldiers had divided his garments among them. Eusebius insinuates that they spoke of his resurrection and ascension. Tertullian and Justin refer to these acts with so much confidence, as would make one believe they had read and handled them. However, neither Eusebius nor Jerome, who were both inquisitive and understanding persons, nor any other author who wrote afterward, seems to have seen them, at least not the true and original acts. For as to what we have now in great number, they are not authentic, being neither ancient nor uniform. There are also some pretended letters of Pilate to Tiberius, giving a history of our Saviour; but they are universally allowed to be spurious. Pilate being a man who, by his excessive cruelties and rapine, had disturbed the repose of Judea, during the whole time of his government, was at length deposed by Vitellius, the proconsul of Syria, A. D. 36, and sent to Rome to give an account of his conduct to the emperor. But, though Tiberius died before Pilate arrived at Rome, yet his successor Caligula banished him to Vienne in Gaul, where he was reduced to such extremity that he laid violent hands upon himself. The evangelists call him governor, though in reality he was nothing more than procurator of Judea, not only because governor was a name of general use, but because Pilate, in effect, acted as one, by taking upon him to judge in criminal matters, as his predecessors had done, and as other procurators in the small provinces of the empire, where there was no proconsul, constantly did.

[PILGRIMAGE. A journey to foreign countries for the purpose of visiting holy places. Pilgrimages became common after the visit of Helena to Jerusalem—the Holy Sepulchre being the great point of attraction. Expeditions to the Holy Land were in high repute about A. D. 1046, being encouraged by the belief of the approaching end of the world. In 1064, seven thousand fanatics, under the guidance of Siegfried, Archbishop of Mentz, and other prelates, undertook a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, only five thousand of whom returned. Pilgrimages to Rome became common in the eighth century; and gave rise to many abuses. Loretto, where the house of the Virgin was located by the angels, has been a famous place of resort for pilgrims: so also Compostella. Treves is another point visited by myriads of pilgrims, even in our own day, because of the Saviour's coat which is said to be there exhibited. Hindoos, Mohammedans, and Jews lay great stress on pilgrimages to the sites which they respectively recognize as holy. According to a tradition of Mohammed, the journey to Mecca is so necessary, that he who dies without performing it may as well die a Christian or a Jew.]

[PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE. At the time of the suppression of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII., forty thousand men in Yorkshire rose up in opposition to the measure, and marched with crucifixes and banners before them, avowing their object to be the removal of low-born counsellors—alluding to Cromwell, the chancellor, who was a blacksmith's son—the suppression of heresy, and the restoration of the Church of Rome. This expedition they called The Pilgrimage of Grace. They were suppressed without difficulty, and their ostensible leader, Aske, was beheaded for treason. Many of the abbots and friars were supposed to be the instigators of the movement.]

PILLAR properly means a column raised to support a building; but in Scripture the term mostly occurs in a metaphorical or figurative sense. Thus we have a pillar of cloud, a pillar of fire, a pillar of smoke, etc.; signifying a cloud, a fire, a smoke raised up toward heaven in the form or shape of a pillar. Exod. xiii. 21: Judg. xx. 40. Job speaks of the pillars of heaven and the pillars of the earth, Job ix. 6; xxvi. 11; which are strong metaphorical expressions, that suppose the heavens and the earth to be an edifice raised by the hand of the Almighty Creator, and founded upon its basis. St. Paul speaks of the Christian Church under the similitude of a pillar or column on which the truth, or doctrine of the glorious gospel is inscribed. 1 Tim. iii. 15. [A monument is so called, Gen. xxxv. 20. Jeremiah, James, Peter, and John, are called pillars, to indicate their strength and firmness. Jer. i. 18: Gal. ii. 9. Compare Rev. iii. 12.]

[PILLARISTS. Monks who lived on pillars, like Simeon Stylites.]

[PILLAR OF SALT. Gen. xix. 26. It is generally supposed that Lot's wife was invested with nitro-sulphureous matter, and kept in a standing position by the incrustation. Arentinus says that in his time, in Carinthia, about fifty country-people, with their cows and calves, were destroyed by strong and suffocating saline exhalations which arose out of the earth, immediately upon the earthquake of 1348. They were by this reduced to saline statues or pillars, like Lot's wife, and the historian says they were seen by himself and the chancellor of Austria. It is not, however, to be supposed that Lot's wife remained in her monumental position for any great length of time. The Book of Wisdom, x. 7, indeed, speaking of the cities of the plain, says, "Of whose wickedness even to this day the waste land that smoketh is a testimony, and plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness; and a standing pillar of salt is a monument of an unbelieving soul." Josephus states that this pillar was standing in his day, and that he had seen it. Clement and Irenæus state that it was standing in their day. The old Rabbies say the same. Of course no one is bound to credit their testimony; and yet one seems forced to think there was some ground of truth in it. Lieutenant Lynch, of the United States Exploring Expedition, says that among the salt mountains of Usdum, [Sodom?] on the west side of the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, they found a lofty round pillar, apparently detached from the general mass. It was of solid salt, capped with carbonate of lime, cylindrical in front and pyramidal behind. It was forty feet high, and raised forty or sixty feet above the level of the sea. The position, as well as the size, shows that it could not have had Lot's wife for its nucleus; but may it not have been so considered in a more credulous age than the present? See Lot.]

PILLOWS. The prophet speaks of "sewing pillows to arm-holes." There is here, probably, an allusion to the easy indulgence of the great. To this day in the east they cover the floors of their houses with carpets; and along the sides of the wall or floor, a range of narrow beds or mattresses is often placed upon these carpets; and, for their further ease and convenience, several velvet or damask bolsters are placed upon these carpets or mattresses; indulgences that seem to be alluded to by the stretching of themselves upon couches, and by "the sewing of pillows to arm-holes." Ezekiel xiii. 18: Amos vi. 4.

PINE TREE. The pine appears in our translation three times: Neh. viii. 15: Isaiah xli. 19; lx. 13. Nehemiah, viii. 15, giving directions for observing the feast of tabernacles, says, "Fetch olive branches, pine branches, myrtle branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths." The Hebrew phrase, עץ שֵׁן, means literally branches of oily or gummy plants. The LXX. say cypress. Scheuchzer says the Turks call the cypress zemin. The author of "Scripture Illustrated" says, "I should prefer the species called jasmin, on account of its verdure, its fragrance, and its flowers, which are highly esteemed. The word jasmin and jasemin of the Turks, resembles strongly the shemen of the Hebrew original here. The Persians also name this plant semen and simsyk." The authority, however, of the Septuagint must prevail. In Isa. xli. 19, lx. 13, the Hebrew word is תרדמא; a tree, says Parkhurst, so called from the springiness or elasticity of its wood. Luther thought it the elm, which is a lofty and spreading tree; and Dr. Stock renders it the ash. After all, it may be thought advisable to retain the pine. La Roche, describing a valley near to Mount Lebanon, has this observation: "La continuelle verdure des pins et des chênes verts fait toujours sa beauté." [The perpetual verdure of the pines and the live oaks makes it ever beautiful.]

[PINNACLE. The pterugion of the temple is generally identified with the "king's portico," Josephus, Ant. xv. 11, called "Solomon's porch," John x. 23: Acts iii. 11; which overhung a prodigious abyss on the south-east side of the temple. Matt. iv. 5. The word comes from πτερύγη, a wing. See TEMPLE.]

[PISCICULI. Tertullian says Christians were called little fishes, because they were born in the water of baptism.]

[PISCIS. See FISH.]

PISGAH, a part of Mount Nebo, so called, being, in all probability, a distinct, and most likely the highest, summit of that mountain. Here Moses climbed to view the land of Canaan; and here he died. [See NEBO.]

PISIDIA, a province of Asia Minor, having Phrygia to the north, Pamphylia to the south, Cilicia and Cappadocia to the east, and the Province of Asia to the west. St. Paul preached at Antioch in Pisidia. Acts xiii. 14; xiv. 24.

[PISTORES. A name given to Christians, probably from the circumstance that Plautus, a noted Christian, was forced during a famine to hire himself to a miller. One of the early Christians is called a Plautinian, a chief man among the bakers.]

[PIT. Shuchath, Prov. xxii. 14; xxiii. 27: Jer. ii. 6; xviii. 20, 22: shichah, Ps. lvii. 7; (6, Eng.); cxix. 85: shachath, Ps. vii. 16; (15, Eng.) ix. 16; (15, Eng.): Prov. xvi. 27: Isa. li. 14: Ezek. xix. 4, 8: a hole, such as is dug for catching wild beasts: shachath, in Job xxxiii. 30, seems to be nearly synonymous with shool: comp. Ps. xvi. 10, Heb. Shool is rendered pit, Num.

xvi. 30, 33; though it is generally rendered grave, or hell, and, like hades, is supposed to mean the common receptacle of the dead, or the invisible world. See Campbell's "Dissertations," and the article HELL. Goommatz, Eccl. x. 8, seems to be synonymous with shuchath. Bor, Gen. xxxvii. 20, 22, 24, Lev. xi. 36, means a hole, such as is dug for water: it is sometimes rendered well, fountain, cistern, dungeon: Exod. xii. 29: Deut. vi. 11: 2 Kings xviii. 31: 2 Chron. xxvi. 10: Jer. vi. 7; xxxviii. 6. It is synonymous with shuchath in Ps. vii. 16, (15, Eng;) and seems to mean the grave in Ps. xxviii. 1. The bottomless pit, Rev. ix. 1, 2, means hell. See ABYSS.]

PITCH, רֶסֶת, Exod. ii. 3: Isaiah xxxiv. 9; Septuagint, ἄσφαλτος; a fat, combustible, oily matter, sometimes called asphaltos, from the Lake Asphaltites, or Dead Sea, in Judea, on the surface of which it rises in the nature of liquid pitch, and floats like other oleaginous bodies; but is condensed by degrees, through the heat of the sun, and grows dry and hard. The word which our translators have rendered pitch in Gen. vi. 14, and רֶסֶת, slime, Gen. xi. 3, xiv. 10, is generally supposed to be bitumen. In the first of these places it is mentioned as used for smearing the ark, and closing its interstices. It was peculiarly adapted to this purpose. Being at first soft, viscous, and pliable, it might be thrust into every chasm and crevice with the greatest ease; but would soon acquire a tenacity and hardness superior to those of our pitch. A coat of it spread over both the inside and outside of the ark would make it perfectly water-proof. The longer it was kept in the water, the harder and stronger it would grow. The Arabs still use it for calking their vessels. In the second passage it is described as applied for cement in building the tower of Babel. It was much used in ancient buildings in that region; and, in the ruins of Babylon, large masses of brick-work cemented with it are discovered. It is known that the plain of Shinar did abound with it, both in its liquid and solid state; that there was there a cave and fountain which was continually casting it out; and that the famous tower and no less famous walls of Babylon were built by this kind of cement, is confirmed by the testimony of several ancient authors. The slime pits of Siddim, Gen. xiv. 10, were holes out of which issued this liquid bitumen, or naphtha. Bitumen was formerly much used by the Egyptians and Jews in embalming the bodies of their dead.

PITHOM, one of the cities that the Israelites built for Pharaoh in Egypt, during the time of their servitude. Exod. i. 11. [Some identify it with Patumos, which was about twelve miles from Heroöpolis. See Herod., Euterpe, 158.]

PLAGUES OF EGYPT. The design of these visitations, growing more awful and tremendous in their progress, was to make Pharaoh know, and confess, that the God of the Hebrews was the supreme Lord, and to exhibit his power and his justice in the strongest light to all the nations of the earth, Exod. ix. 16: 1 Sam. iv. 8, etc.; to execute judgment upon the Egyptians and upon all their gods, inanimate and bestial, for their cruelty to the Israelites, and for their grovelling polytheism and idolatry. Exod. vii. 14-17; xii. 12. The Nile was the principal divinity of the Egyptians. According to Heliodorus, they paid divine honors to this river, and revered it as the first of their gods. They declared him to be the rival of heaven, since he watered the country without the aid of the clouds and rain. His principal festival was at the summer solstice, when the inundation commenced; at which season, in the dog-days, by a cruel idolatrous rite, they sacrificed red-haired persons, principally foreigners, to Typhon, or the power that presided over tempests, at Busiris, Heliopolis, etc., by burning them alive, and scattering their ashes in the air, for the good of the people, as we learn from Plutarch. Hence Bryant infers the probability that these victims were chosen from among the Israelites, during their residence in Egypt. The judgment then inflicted upon the river, and all the waters of Egypt, in the presence of Pharaoh and of his servants, as foretold—when, as soon as Aaron had smitten the waters of the river, they were turned into blood, and continued in that state for seven days, so that all the fish died, and the Egyptians could not drink of the waters of the river, in which they delighted as the most wholesome of all waters, but were forced to dig wells for pure water to drink—was a significant sign of God's displeasure for their senseless idolatry in worshipping the river and its fish, and also "a manifest reproof of that bloody edict whereby the infants were slain." Wisdom xi. 7.

In the plague of frogs, their sacred river itself was made an active instrument of their punishment, together with another of their gods. The frog was one of their sacred animals, consecrated to the sun, and considered as an emblem of divine inspiration in its inflations.

The plague of lice, which was produced without any previous intimation to Pharaoh, was peculiarly offensive to a people so superstitiously nice and cleanly as the Egyptians; and, above all, to their priests, who used to shave their whole body every third day, that neither louse, nor any other vermin, might be found upon them while they were employed in serving their gods, as we learn from Herodotus; and Plutarch informs us, that they never wore woollen garments, but linen only, because linen is least apt to produce lice. This plague, therefore, was particularly disgraceful to the magicians themselves; and when they tried to imitate it, but failed, on account of the minuteness of the objects, (not like serpents, water, or frogs, of a sensible bulk that could be handled,) they were forced to confess that this was no human feat of legerdemain, but rather "the finger of God." Thus were "the illusions of their magic put down, and their vaunting in wisdom reproved with disgrace." Wisdom xvii. 7. "Their folly was manifest unto all men," in absurdly and wickedly attempting at first to place the feats of human art on a level with the stupendous operations of Divine power, in the first two plagues; and being foiled in the third, by shamefully mis-carrying, they exposed themselves to the contempt of their admirers. Philo, the Jew, has a fine observation on the plagues of Egypt:—"Some, perhaps, may inquire, Why did God punish the country by such minute and contemptible animals as frogs, lice, flies, rather than by bears, lions, leopards, or other kinds of savage beasts which prey on human flesh? Or, if not by these, why not by the Egyptian asp, whose bite is instant death? But let him learn, if he be ignorant, first, that God chose rather to correct than to destroy the inhabitants; for, if he desired to annihilate them utterly, he had no need to have made use of animals as his auxiliaries, but of the Divinely inflicted evils of famine and pestilence. Next, let him further learn that lesson so necessary for every state of life, namely, that men, when they war, seek the most powerful aid to supply their own weakness; but God, the highest and the greatest power, who stands in need of nothing, if at any time he chooses to employ instruments, as it were, to inflict chastisement, chooses not the strongest and greatest, disregarding their strength, but rather the mean and the minute, whom he endues with invincible and irresistible power to chastise offenders." The first three plagues were common to the Egyptians and the Israelites, to convince both that "there was none like the Lord;" and to wean the latter from their Egyptian idolatries, and induce them to return to the Lord their God. And when this end was answered, the Israelites were exempted from the ensuing plagues; for the Lord severed the land of Goshen from the rest of Egypt; whence the ensuing plagues, confined to the latter, more plainly appeared to have been inflicted by the God of the Hebrews, Exod. viii. 20-23, to convince both more clearly of the goodness and severity of God," Rom. xi. 22; that "great plagues remain for the ungodly, but mercy embraceth the righteous on every side." Psalm xxxii. 10.

The visitation of flies, of the gad-fly, or hornet, was more intolerable than any of the preceding. By this, his minute but mighty army, God afterward drove out some of the devoted nations of Canaan before Joshua. Exod. xiii. 28: Deut. vii. 20: Josh. xxiv. 12. This insect was worshipped in Palestine and elsewhere under the title of Baal-zebub, "lord of the gad-fly." 2 Kings i. 1, 2. Egypt, we learn from Herodotus, abounded with prodigious swarms of flies, or gnats; but this was in the heat of summer, during the dog-days: whence this fly is called by the Septuagint κνέφουσα, the dog-fly. But the appointed time of this plague was in the middle of winter; and, accordingly, this plague extorted Pharaoh's partial consent, "Go ye, sacrifice to your God, but in the land;" and when Moses and Aaron objected the offence they would give to the Egyptians, who would stone them for sacrificing "the abomination of the Egyptians," namely, animal sacrifices, he reluctantly consented, "only ye shall not go very far away;" for he was apprehensive of their flight, like his predecessor, who first enslaved the Israelites, Exod. i. 10; and he again desired them to "entreat for him." But he again dealt deceitfully; and after the flies were removed so effectually that not one was left, when Moses "entreated the Lord, Pharaoh hardened his heart this fifth time also, neither would he let the people go."

This second breach of promise on the part of Pharaoh drew down a plague of a more deadly description than the preceding. The fifth plague of murrain destroyed all the cattle of Egypt, but of "the cattle of the Israelites died not one." It was immediately inflicted by God himself, after previous notification, and without the agency of Moses and Aaron, to manifest the Divine indignation at Pharaoh's falsehood. And though the king sent and found that not one of the cattle of the Israelites was dead, yet his heart was hardened this sixth time also, and he would not let the people go. Exod. ix. 1-7.

At length, after Pharaoh had repeatedly abused the gracious respites and warnings vouchsafed to him and his servants, a sorer set of plagues, affecting themselves, began to be inflicted; and Moses now, for the first time, appears as the executioner of Divine vengeance; for in the presence of Pharaoh, by the Divine command, he sprinkled ashes of the furnace toward heaven, and it became a boil, breaking forth with blains upon man and upon beast. And the magicians could not stand before Moses because of the boil, which affected them and all the Egyptians. Exod. ix. 8-11. This was a very significant plague: the furnace from which the ashes were taken aptly represented "the iron furnace" of Egyptian bondage, Deut. iv. 20; and the scattering of the ashes in the air might have referred to the usage of the Egyptians in their Typhonian sacrifices of human victims; while it converted another of the elements, and of their gods, the air, or ether, into an instrument of their chastisement. And now "the Lord," for the first time, "hardened the heart of Pharaoh," after he had so repeatedly hardened it himself, "and he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had foretold unto Moses." Exod. ix. 12. Though Pharaoh probably felt the scourge of the boil, as well as his people, it did not soften nor humble his heart; and when he wilfully and obstinately turned away from the light, and shut his eyes against the luminous evidences vouchsafed to him of the supremacy of the God of the Hebrews, and had twice broken his promise when he was indulged with a respite, and dealt deceitfully, he became a just object of punishment; and God now began to increase the hardness or obduracy of his heart. And such is the usual and the righteous course of his providence: when nations or individuals despise the warnings of Heaven, abuse their best gifts, and resist the means of grace, God then "delivers them over to a reprobate" or undiscerning "mind, to work all uncleanness with greediness." Rom. i. 28.

In the tremendous plague of hail, the united elements of air, water, and fire were employed to terrify and punish the Egyptians by their principal divinities. This plague was formally announced to Pharaoh and his people: "I will at this season send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people, that thou mayest know that there is none like me in all the earth. For now I could stretch out my hand, and smite thee and thy people with pestilence," or destroy thee at once, like thy cattle with the murrain, "and thou shouldest be cut off from the earth; but, in truth, for this cause have I sustained thee, that I might manifest in thee my power, and that my name might be declared throughout the whole earth." Exod. ix. 13-16. This rendering of the passage is more conformable to the context, the Chaldee paraphrase, and to Philo, than the received translation, "For now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence;" for surely Pharaoh and his people were not smitten with pestilence; and "they were preserved," or kept from immediate destruction, according to the Septuagint, διατηρηθης, "to manifest the Divine power," by the number and variety of their plagues. Still, however, in the midst of judgment, God remembered mercy; he gave a gracious warning to the Egyptians, to avoid, if they chose, the threatened calamity: "Send, therefore, now, and gather thy cattle, and all that thou hast in the field: every man and beast that shall be found in the field, and shall not be brought home, the hail shall come down upon them, and they shall die." And this warning had some effect: "He that feared the word of the Lord among the servants of Pharaoh, made his servants and his cattle flee into the houses; and he that regarded not the word of the Lord, left his servants and his cattle in the field." Exod. ix. 17-21. But it may be asked, If all the cattle of the Egyptians were destroyed by the foregoing plague of murrain, as asserted Exod. ix. 6, how came there to be any cattle left? Surely the Egyptians might have recruited their stock from the land of Goshen, where "not one of the cattle of the Israelites died." And this justifies the supposition that there was some respite, or interval, between the several plagues, and confirms the conjecture of the duration of the whole, about a quarter of a year. And that the warning, in this case, was respected by many of the Egyptians, we may infer from the number of chariots and horsemen that went in pursuit of the Israelites afterward. This was foretold to be "a very grievous hail, such as had not been in Egypt since the foundation thereof: and the Lord sent thunder and hail, and the fire ran along the ground; and the hail smote throughout all the land of Egypt all that was in the field, both man and beast; and the hail smote every herb of the field, and brake every tree of the field. Only in the land of Goshen, where the children of Israel were, there was no hail." Pharaoh sent and called for Moses and Aaron, and said unto them, "I have sinned this time; the Lord is righteous, and I and my people are wicked: entreat the Lord," for it is enough, "that there might be no more mighty thunderings and hail; and I will let you go, and ye shall stay no longer." But when there was respite, Pharaoh "sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, he and his servants; neither would he let the people go." Exod. ix. 27-35. In this instance, there is a remarkable suspension of the judicial infatuation. Pharaoh had humbled himself, and acknowledged his own and his people's guilt, and the justice of the Divine plague: the Lord, therefore, forbore this time to harden his heart. But he abused the long-sufferance of God, and this additional respite: he sinned yet more, because he now sinned wilfully, after he had received information of the truth: he relapsed, and hardened his own heart a seventh time. He became, therefore, "a vessel of wrath, fitted to destruction." Heb. x. 26: Rom. ix. 22.

The design of the eighth and the ensuing plagues was to confirm the faith of the Israelites: "That thou mayest tell in the ears of thy son, and of thy son's son, what I have wrought in Egypt, and my signs which I have done among them; that ye may know how that I am the Lord." This plague of locusts, inflicted on the now devoted Egyptians and their king, completed the havoc begun by the hail; by this "the wheat and rye were destroyed, and every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left; and there remained not any verdure in the trees, nor in the herbs of the field, throughout the land of Egypt. Very grievous were they: before them were no such locusts as they, neither after them shall there be such." Exod. x. 3-15.

The awful plague of darkness over all the land of Egypt, for three days, "a thick darkness which might be felt," in the emphatic language of Scripture, was inflicted on the Egyptians, and their chief god, the sun; and was, indeed, a most significant sign of the Divine displeasure, and of that mental darkness under which they now labored. Their consternation thereat is strongly represented by their total inaction; neither rose any from his place for three days, petrified, as they were, with horror. They were also "scared with strange apparitions and visions, while a heavy night was spread over them, an image of that darkness which should afterward receive them. But yet, they were unto themselves more grievous than that darkness." Wisdom xvii. 3-21: Psalm lxxviii. 49. This terrific and horrible plague compelled Pharaoh to relax: he offered to let the men and their families go; but he wished to keep the flocks and herds as security for their return; but Moses peremptorily declared that not a hoof should be left behind. Again "the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let them go." Exod. x. 21-27. "And the Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you, that my wonders may be multiplied in the land of Egypt. And Moses and Aaron did all these wonders before Pharaoh; and the Lord" ultimately "hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go out of his land." Exod. xi. 9, 10. This passage forms the conclusion to the nine plagues, and should properly follow the preceding; for the result of the tenth and last plague was foretold, that Pharaoh should not only let them go, but surely thrust them out altogether. Exod. xi. 1.

The tenth plague was announced to Pharaoh with much solemnity: "Thus saith the Lord, About midnight will I go out into the midst of Egypt, and all the first-born in the land of Egypt shall die, from the first-born of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne, even to the first-born of the maid-servant that is behind the mill: and all the first-born of cattle. And there shall be a great cry throughout the land of Egypt, such as there was none like it, nor shall be any more. But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue, against man or beast; that ye may know how that the Lord doth put a difference between the Egyptians and Israel. And all these thy servants shall come down unto me, and bow themselves unto me, saying, Get thee out, and all the people that follow thee. And after that I will go out." Exod. xi. 4-8. Such a threat, delivered in so high a tone, both in the name of the God of Israel and of Moses, did not fail to exasperate the infatuated Pharaoh, and he said, "Get thee from me: take heed to thyself: see my face no more; for in the day thou seest my face thou shalt die. And Moses said, Be it so as thou hast spoken: I will see thy face again no more. And he went out from Pharaoh in great anger." Exod. x. 28, 29; xi. 8. "And at midnight the Lord smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt; and there was a great cry in Egypt, for there was not a house in which there was not one dead." Exod. xii. 1-30. This last tremendous judgment is described with much sublimity in the book of Wisdom, xviii. 14-18.

"For when all things were wrapped in still silence, And night, in her proper speed, holding her mid course, Thy all-powerful oracle leapt down from heaven Out of the royal throne, a fierce warrior, Into the midst of the land of destruction, Wielding a sharp sword, thine unfeigned command, And standing up, he filled the whole with death, He touched the heavens, indeed, but trod upon the earth!"

"And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he and all his servants, and all the Egyptians; and he called for," or sent to, "Moses and Aaron by night, and said, Get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel, and go, serve the Lord, as ye said; take also your flocks and your herds, and be gone; and bless me also. And the Egyptians also were urgent upon the people, to send them out of the land in haste; for they said, We shall all be dead." It is evident from the extreme urgency of the occasion, when all the Egyptians apprehended total destruction if the departure of the Israelites was delayed any longer, that Pharaoh had no personal interview with Moses and Aaron, which would have wasted time, and was quite unnecessary; he only sent them a peremptory mandate to be gone on their own terms. "And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they asked of the Egyptians jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and raiment. And the Lord gave the people favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they freely gave what they required, and they spoiled the Egyptians." Exod. xii. 31-36, as originally foretold to Abraham, Gen. xv. 14, and to Moses before the plagues began. This was an act of perfect retributive justice, to make the Egyptians pay for the long and laborious services of the Israelites, whom they had unjustly enslaved, in violation of their charter.

The Israelites were thrust out of Egypt on the fifteenth day of the first month, "about six hundred thousand men on foot, beside women and children. And a mixed multitude went up also with them; and flocks and herds, even very much cattle." Exod. xii. 37, 38: Num. xi. 4; xxxiii. 3.

"And they went out with a high hand; for the Lord went before them by day, in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light, to go by day and night. He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people." Exod. xiii. 22: Num. ix. 15-23. And the motion or rest of this Divine guide regulated their marches, and their stations or encampments, during the whole of their route. Num. x. 33-36. See RED SEA.

PLATONISTS. The Platonic philosophy is denominated from Plato, who was born about B. C. 426. He founded the old academy on the opinions of Heraclitus, Pythagoras, and Socrates; and by adding the information he had acquired to their discoveries, he established a sect of philosophers who were esteemed more perfect than any who had before appeared in the world. The outlines of Plato's philosophical system were as follows: That there is one God, eternal, immutable, and immaterial; perfect in wisdom and goodness, omniscient and omnipresent: that this all-perfect Being formed the universe out of a mass of eternally preëxisting matter, to which he gave form and arrangement: that there is in matter a necessary, but blind and refractory force, which resists the will of the supreme Artificer, so that he cannot perfectly execute his designs; and this is the cause of the mixture of good and evil which is found in the material world: that the soul of man was derived by emanation from God; but that this emanation was not immediate, but through the intervention of the soul of the world, which was itself debased by some material admixture: that the relation which the human soul, in its original constitution, bears to matter, is the source of moral evil: that when God formed the universe he separated from the soul of the world inferior souls, equal in number to the stars, and assigned to each its proper celestial abode: that these souls were sent down to earth to be imprisoned in mortal bodies; hence arose the depravity and misery to which human nature is liable: that the soul is immortal, and by disengaging itself from all animal passions, and rising above sensible objects to the contemplation of the world of intelligence, it may be prepared to return to its original habitation: that matter never suffers annihilation, but that the world will remain for ever; and that by the action of its animating principle it accomplishes certain periods, within which every thing returns to its ancient place and state. This periodical revolution of nature is called the Platonic or great year.

The Platonic system makes the perfection of morality to consist in living in conformity to the will of God, the only standard of truth, and teaches that our highest good consists in the contemplation and knowledge of the Supreme Being. In this Divine Being Plato admitted a sort of trinity of three hypostases. The first he considered as self-existent, calling him, by way of eminence, τὸ δυν, the Being, or τὸ ἐν, the One. The only attribute which he acknowledged in this person was goodness; and therefore he frequently styles him, τὸ ἀγαθόν, the good. The second he considered as, νοῦς, the mind, or, λόγος, the wisdom or reason of the former, and the δημιουργός, maker of the world.

The third he always speaks of as, ψυχὴ, the soul of the world. He taught that the second is a necessary emanation from the first, and the third from the second, or perhaps from both; comparing these emanations to those of light and heat from the sun. From the above use of Logos for the second person of the Platonic trinity, it has been thought that St. John borrowed the term from Plato; but it is not likely that this apostle was conversant with his writings, and therefore both Le Clerc and Dr. Campbell think it more probable that he took it from the Old Testament. The end of all knowledge or philosophy, according to Plato, was to make us resemble the Deity as much as is compatible with human nature. This likeness consists in the possession and practice of all the moral virtues. After the death of Plato, many of his disciples deviated from his doctrines. His school was then divided into the old, the middle, and the new academy. The old academy strictly adhered to his tenets: the middle academy partially receded from his system, without entirely deserting it: the new academy almost entirely relinquished the original doctrines of Plato, and verged toward the skeptical philosophy. An infusion of Platonism, though in a perverted form, is seen in the philosophy most prevalent in the times of the apostles. It was Judaized by the contemplative Hellenists, and through them their native Judaism was Platonized. The eclectic philosophy added other ingredients to the compound, from the oriental systems. All, however, issued in pride, and the domination of bewildering and monstrous imaginations.

PLOUGH. The Syrian plough, which was probably used in all the regions around, is a very simple frame, and commonly so light that a man of moderate strength might carry it in one hand. Volney states that in Syria it is often nothing else than the branch of a tree cut below a bifurcation, and used without wheels. It is drawn by asses and cows, seldom by oxen. And Dr. Russell informs us, the ploughing of Syria is performed often by a little cow, at most with two, and sometimes only by an ass. In Persia it is for the most part drawn by one ox only, and not unfrequently even by an ass, although it is more ponderous than in Palestine. With such an imperfect instrument, the Syrian husbandman can do little more than scratch the surface of his field, or clear away the stones or weeds that encumber it, and prevent the seed from reaching the soil. The ploughshare is a "piece of iron, broad, but not large, which tips the end of the shaft." So much does it resemble the short sword used by the ancient warriors, that it may with very little trouble be converted into that deadly weapon; and when the work of destruction is over, reduced again into its former shape, and applied to the purposes of agriculture. In allusion to the first operation, the prophet Joel summons the nations to leave their peaceful employments in the cultivated field, and buckle on their armor: "Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears." Joel iii. 10. This beautiful image the prophet Isaiah has reversed, and applied to the establishment of that profound and lasting peace which is to bless the Church of Christ in the latter days: "And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Isaiah ii. 4. The plough used in Syria is so light and simple in its construction, that the husbandman is under the necessity of guiding it with great care, bending over it, and loading it with his own weight, else the share would glide along the surface, without making any incision. His mind should be wholly intent on his work, at once to press the plough into the ground, and direct it in a straight line. "Let the ploughman," said Hesiod, "attend to his charge, and look before him; not turn aside to look on his associates, but make straight furrows, and have his mind attentive to his work." And Pliny: "Unless the ploughman stoop forward," to press his plough into the soil, and conduct it properly, "he will turn it aside." To such careful and incessant exertion our Lord alludes in that declaration, "No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." Luke ix. 62.

POETRY OF THE HEBREWS. Among the books of the Old Testament, says Bishop Lowth, there is such an apparent diversity in style, as sufficiently discovers which of them are to be considered as poetical, and which as prose. While the historical books and legislative writings of Moses are evidently prosaic compositions, the Book of Job, the Psalms of David, the Song of Solomon, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, a great part of the prophetic writings, and several passages scattered occasionally through the historical books, carry the most plain and distinguishing marks of poetical writing. There is not the least reason for doubting that originally these were written in verse, or some kind of measured numbers; though, as the ancient pronunciation of the Hebrew language is now lost, we are not able to ascertain the nature of the Hebrew verse, or at most can ascertain it but imperfectly. Let any person read the historical introduction to the book of Job, contained in the first and second chapters, and then go on to Job's speech in the beginning of the third chapter, and he cannot avoid being sensible that he passes all at once from the region of prose to that of poetry. From the earliest times music and poetry were cultivated among the Hebrews. In the days of the judges, mention is made of the schools or colleges of the prophets, where one part of the employment of the persons trained in such schools was to sing the praises of God, accompanied with various instruments. But in the days of King David music and poetry were carried to the greatest height. In 1 Chron. xxv., an account is given of David's institutions relating to the sacred music and poetry, which were certainly more costly, more splendid and magnificent, than ever obtained in the public service of any other nation. See PSALMS.

The general construction of the Hebrew poetry is of a singular nature, and peculiar to itself. It consists in dividing every period into correspondent, for the most part into equal, members, which answer to one another both in sense and sound. In the first member of the period a sentiment is expressed; and in the second member the same sentiment is amplified, or is repeated in different terms, or sometimes contrasted with its opposite; but in such a manner, that the same structure, and nearly the same number of words, is preserved. This is the general strain of all the Hebrew poetry. Instances of it occur everywhere on opening the Old Testament. Thus, in Psalm xvi. :

"Sing unto the Lord a new song.

Sing unto the Lord, all the earth.

Sing unto the Lord, and bless his name.

Show forth his salvation from day to day.

Declare his glory among the heathen,

His wonders among all the people.

For the Lord is great, and greatly to be praised.

He is to be feared above all the gods.

Honor and majesty are before him:

Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary."

It is owing in a great measure to this form of composition, that our version, though in prose, retains so much of a poetical cast; for, the version being strictly word for word after the original, the form and order of the original sentence are preserved; which, by this artificial structure, this regular alternation and correspondence of parts, makes the ear sensible of a departure from the common style and tone of prose. The origin of this form of poetical composition among the Hebrews is clearly to be deduced from the manner in which their sacred hymns were wont to be sung. They were accompanied with music, and they were performed by choirs or bands of singers and musicians, who answered alternately to each other. When, for instance, one band began the hymn thus: "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice," the chorus, or semi-chorus, took up the corresponding versicle, "Let the multitude of the isles be glad thereof," "Clouds and darkness are round about him," sang the one; the other replied, "Judgment and righteousness are the habitation of his throne." And in this manner their poetry, when set to music, naturally divided itself into a succession of strophes and antistrophes correspondent to each other; whence it is probable the antiphon, or responsory, in the public religious service of so many Christian churches, derived its origin. The twenty-fourth Psalm, in particular, which is thought to have been composed on the great and solemn occasion of the ark of the covenant being brought back to Mount Zion, must have had a noble effect when performed after this manner, as Dr. Lowth has illustrated it. The whole people are supposed to be attending the procession. The Levites and singers, divided into their several courses, and accompanied with all their musical instruments, led the way. After the introduction to the Psalm, in the first two verses, when the procession begins to ascend the sacred mount, the question is put, as by a semi-chorus, "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord, and who shall stand in his holy place?" The response is made by the full chorus with the greatest dignity: "He that hath clean hands and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul to vanity, nor sworn deceitfully." As the procession approaches to the doors of the tabernacle, the chorus, with all their instruments, join in this exclamation: "Lift up your heads, ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in." Here the semi-chorus plainly breaks in, as with a lower voice, "Who is this King of glory?" And at the moment when the ark is introduced into the tabernacle, the response is made by the burst of the whole chorus: "The Lord, strong and mighty; the Lord, mighty in battle."

The method of composition which has been explained, by correspondent versicles being universally introduced into the hymns or musical poetry of the Jews, easily spread itself through their other poetical writings, which were not designed to be sung in alternate portions, and which, therefore, did not so much require this mode of composition. But the mode became familiar to their ears, and carried with it a certain solemn majesty of style, particularly suited to sacred subjects. Hence, throughout the prophetic writings, we find it prevailing as much as in the Psalms of David. This form of writing is one of the great characteristics of the ancient Hebrew poetry; very different from, and even opposite to, the style of the Greek and Roman poets. Independently of this peculiar mode of construction, the sacred poetry is distinguished by the highest beauties of strong, concise, bold, and figurative expression. Conciseness and strength are two of its most remarkable characters. One might, indeed, imagine that the practice of the Hebrew poets, of always amplifying the same thought, by repetition or contrast, might tend to enfeeble their style. But they conduct themselves so as not to produce this effect. Their sentences are always short. Few superfluous words are used. The same thought is not dwelt upon long. To their conciseness and sobriety of expression their poetry is indebted for much of its sublimity; and all writers who attempt the sublime, might profit much by imitating, in this respect, the style of the Old Testament.

No writings whatever abound so much with the most bold and animated figures as the sacred books. In order to do justice to these, it is necessary that we transport ourselves as much as we can into the land of Judea, and place before our eyes that scenery and those objects with which the Hebrew writers were conversant. Natural objects are in some measure common to them with poets of all ages and countries. Light and darkness, trees and flowers, the forest and the cultivated field, suggest to them many beautiful figures. But, in order to relish their figures of this kind, we must take notice that several of them arise from the particular circumstances of the land of Judea. During the summer months, little or no rain falls throughout all that region. While the heats continued, the country was intolerably parched; want of water was a great distress; and a plentiful shower falling, or a rivulet breaking forth, altered the whole face of nature, and introduced much higher ideas of refreshment and pleasure than the like causes can suggest to us. Hence, to represent distress, such frequent allusions among them "to a dry and thirsty land where no water is;" and hence, to describe a change from distress to prosperity, their metaphors are founded on the falling of showers, and the bursting out of springs in the desert. Thus: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. For in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert; and the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water; in the habitation of dragons, where each lay, shall be grass, with reeds and rushes." Isaiah xxxv. 1, 6, 7. Images of this nature are very familiar to Isaiah, and occur in many parts of his book. Again: as Judea was a hilly country, it was, during the rainy months, exposed to frequent inundations by the rushing of torrents, which came down suddenly from the mountains, and carried every thing before them; and Jordan, their only great river, annually overflowed its banks. Hence the frequent allusions to "the noise, and to the rushings of many waters;" and hence great calamities so often compared to the overflowing torrent, which, in such a country, must have been images particularly striking: "Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts; all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me." Psalm xlii. 7. The two most remarkable mountains of the country were Lebanon and Carmel; the former noted for its height, and the woods of lofty cedars that covered it; the latter, for its beauty and fertility, the richness of its vines and olives. Hence, with the greatest propriety, Lebanon is employed as an image of whatever is great, strong, or magnificent; Carmel, of what is smiling and beautiful. "The glory of Lebanon shall be given to it, and the excellency of Carmel." Isaiah xxxv. 2. Lebanon is often put metaphorically for the whole state or people of Israel, for the temple, for the King of Assyria; Carmel, for the blessings of peace and prosperity. "His countenance is as Lebanon," says Solomon, speaking of the dignity of a man's appearance; but when he describes female beauty, "Thine head is like Mount Carmel." Cant. v. 15; vii. 5. It is further to be remarked under this head, that, in the images of the awful and terrible kind, with which the sacred poets abound, they plainly draw their descriptions from that violence of the elements, and those great concussions of nature, with which their climate rendered them acquainted. Earthquakes were not unfrequent; and the tempests of hail, thunder, and lightning, in Judea and Arabia, accompanied with whirlwinds and darkness, far exceed any thing of that sort which happens in more temperate regions. Isaiah, xxiv. 20, describes with great majesty the earth, "reeling to and fro like a drunkard, and removed like a cottage." And in those circumstances of terror, with which an appearance of the Almighty is described, in Psalm xviii., when his pavilion round about him was darkness; when hailstones and coals of fire were his voice; and when, at his rebuke, the channels of the waters are said to be seen, and the foundations of the hills discovered; though there may be some reference, as Dr. Lowth thinks, to the history of God's descent upon Mount Sinai, yet it seems more probable that the figures were taken directly from those commotions of nature with which the author was acquainted, and which suggested stronger and nobler images than those which now occur to us.

Beside the natural objects of their own country, we find the rites of their religion, and the arts and employments of their common life, frequently employed as grounds of imagery among the Hebrews. Hence flowed, of course, the many allusions to pastoral life, to the "green pastures and the still waters," and to the care and watchfulness of a shepherd over his flock, which carry to this day so much beauty and tenderness in them, in Psalm xxiii., and in many other passages of the poetical writings of Scripture. Hence all the images founded upon rural employments, upon the wine-press, the threshing-floor, the stubble and the chaff. To disrelish all such images is the effect of false delicacy. Homer is at least as frequent, and much more minute and particular, in his similes, founded on what we now call low life; but, in his management of them, far inferior to the sacred writers, who generally mix with their comparisons of this kind somewhat of dignity and grandeur to ennoble them. What inexpressible grandeur does the following rural image in Isaiah, for instance, receive from the intervention of the Deity!—"The nations shall rush like the rushings of many waters; but God shall rebuke them, and they shall fly far off; and they shall be chased as the chaff of the mountain before the wind, and like the down of the thistle before the whirlwind." Figurative allusions, too, we frequently find to the rites and ceremonies of their religion, to the legal distinctions of things clean and unclean, to the mode of their temple service, to the dress of their priests, and to the most noted incidents recorded in their sacred history; as, to the destruction of Sodom, the descent of God upon Mount Sinai, and the miraculous passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea. The religion of the Hebrews included the whole of their laws and civil constitution. It was full of splendid external rites, that occupied their senses; it was connected with every part of their national history and establishment; and hence, all ideas founded on religion possessed in this nation a dignity and importance peculiar to themselves, and were uncommonly suited to impress the imagination.

From all this it results that the imagery of the sacred poets is, in a high degree, expressive and natural; it is copied directly from real objects that were before their eyes; it has this advantage, of being more complete within itself, more entirely founded on national ideas and manners, than that of the most of other poets. In reading their works we find ourselves continually in the land of Judea. The palm trees, and the cedars of Lebanon, are ever rising in our view. The face of their territory, the circumstances of their climate, the manners of the people, and the august ceremonies of their religion, constantly pass, under different forms, before us. The comparisons employed by the sacred poets are generally short, touching on one point only of resemblance, rather than branching out into little episodes. In this respect they have an advantage over the Greek and Roman authors, whose comparisons, by the length to which they are extended, sometimes interrupt the narration too much, and carry too visible marks of study and labor; whereas, in the Hebrew poets, they appear more like the glowings of a lively fancy, just glancing aside to some resembling object, and presently returning to its track. Such is the following fine comparison, introduced to describe the happy influence of good government upon a people, in what are called the last words of David: "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God; and he shall be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain." 2 Sam. xxiii. 3. This is one of the most regular and formal comparisons in the sacred books.

Allegory, likewise, is a figure frequently found in them. But the poetical figure which, beyond all others, elevates the style of Scripture, and gives it a peculiar boldness and sublimity, is prosopopœia, or personification. No personifications employed by any poets are so magnificent and striking as those of the inspired writers. On great occasions they animate every part of nature, especially when any appearance or operation of the Almighty is concerned. "Before him went the pestilence." "The waters saw thee, O God, and were afraid." "The mountains saw thee, and they trembled." "The overflowing of the water passed by." "The deep uttered his voice, and lifted up his hands on high." When inquiry is made about the place of wisdom, Job introduces the deep, saying, "It is not in me; and the sea saith, It is not in me. Destruction and death say, We have heard the fame thereof with our ears." That noted sublime passage in the book of Isaiah, which describes the fall of the King of Assyria, is full of personified objects: the fir trees and cedars of Lebanon breaking forth into exultation on the fall of the tyrant; hell from beneath stirring up all the dead to meet him at his coming; and the dead kings introduced as speaking and joining in the triumph. In the same strain are those many lively and passionate apostrophes to cities and countries, to persons and things, with which the prophetic writings everywhere abound. "O thou sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? Put thyself up into the scabbard, rest, and be still. How can it be quiet," as the reply is instantly made, "seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against Ashkelon and the sea-shore? there hath he appointed it." Jer. xlvii. 6, 7. In general—for it would carry us too far to enlarge upon all the instances—the style of the poetical books of the Old Testament is, beyond the style of all other poetical works, fervid, bold, and animated. It is extremely different from that regular correct expression to which our ears are accustomed in modern poetry. It is the burst of inspiration. The scenes are not coolly described, but represented as passing before our eyes. Every object and every person is addressed and spoken to as if present. The transition is often abrupt; the connection often obscure; the persons are often changed; figures crowded, and heaped upon one another. Bold sublimity, not correct elegance, is its character. We see the spirit of the writer raised beyond himself, and laboring to find vent for ideas too mighty for his utterance.

The several kinds of poetical composition which we find in Scripture are chiefly the didactic, elegiac, pastoral, and lyric. Of the didactic species of poetry, the book of Proverbs is the principal instance. The first nine chapters of that book are highly poetical, adorned with many distinguished graces and figures of expression. The book of Ecclesiastes comes, likewise, under this head; and some of the Psalms, as the hundred and nineteenth in particular. Of elegiac poetry, many very beautiful specimens occur in Scripture, such as the lamentation of David over his friend Jonathan; several passages in the prophetic books; and several of David's Psalms, composed on occasions of distress and mourning. The forty-second Psalm, in particular, is, in the highest degree, tender and plaintive. But the most regular and perfect elegiac composition in the Scripture, perhaps in the whole world, is the Lamentations of Jeremiah. As the prophet mourns, in that book, over the destruction of the temple and the holy city, and the overthrow of the whole state, he assembles all the affecting images which a subject so melancholy could suggest. The Song of Solomon affords us a high exemplification of pastoral poetry. Considered with respect to its spiritual meaning, it is undoubtedly a mystical allegory; in its form it is a dramatic pastoral, or a perpetual dialogue between personages in the character of shepherds; and, suitably to that form, it is full of rural and pastoral images from beginning to end. Of lyric poetry, or that which is intended to be accompanied with music, the Old Testament is full. Beside a great number of hymns and songs which we find scattered in the historical and prophetic books, such as the song of Moses, the song of Deborah, and many others of like nature, the whole book of Psalms is to be considered as a collection of sacred odes. In these we find the ode exhibited in all the varieties of its form, and 1 supported with the highest spirit of lyric poetry: sometimes sprightly, cheerful, and triumphant; sometimes solemn and magnificent; sometimes tender and soft. From these instances it clearly appears that there are contained in the Holy Scriptures full exemplifications of several of the chief kinds of poetical writing.

POLLUX, a tutelary deity of mariners in ancient times, Acts xxviii. 11, whose image was placed either at the prow or stern of the ship. [Castor and Pollux were twin children of Jupiter by Leda; hence called the Dioscuri and Gemini. See CASTOR.]

POMEGRANATE, רִמּוֹן, Num. xiii. 23; xx. 5: 1 Sam. xiv. 2, etc.: a low tree growing very common in Palestine, and in other parts of the east. Its branches are very thick and bushy; some of them are armed with sharp thorns. They are garnished with narrow spear-shaped leaves. Its flowers are of an elegant red color, resembling a rose. It is chiefly valued for the fruit, which is as big as a large apple, is quite round, and has the general qualities of other summer fruits, allaying heat and quenching thirst. The high estimation in which it was held by the people of Israel may be inferred from its being one of the three kinds of fruit brought by the spies from Eshcol to Moses and the congregation in the wilderness, Num. xiii. 23; xx. 5; and from its being specified by that rebellious people as one of the greatest luxuries which they enjoyed in Egypt, the want of which they felt so severely in the sandy desert. The pomegranate, classed by Moses with wheat and barley, vines and figs, oil-olive and honey, was, in his account, one principal recommendation of the promised land. Deut. viii. 8. The form of this fruit was so beautiful as to be honored with a place at the bottom of the high-priest's robe, Exodus xxviii. 33: Eccles. xlv. 9; and was the principal ornament of the stately columns of Solomon's temple. The inside is full of small kernels, replenished with a generous liquor. In short, there is scarcely any part of the pomegranate which does not delight and recreate the senses.

[POOL. בְּרִיָּה. Κολλυμβήθρα. A reservoir, a fountain. The Hebrew word is also applied to "the deep that coucheth beneath," Gen. xlix. 26: Deut. xxxiii. 13; the root of the word meaning to couch, or lie down. Various pools are mentioned in Scripture. The Pool of Siloam, or Siloah, is mentioned, Isa. viii. 6: Neh. ii. 14: John ix. 7-11. Josephus says it was situated in the mouth of the Tyropæon, on the south-east part of Jerusalem. There it is still, just under the southern termination of Ophel, and opposite the highest point of the Mount of Offence, near the place where the Tyropæon joins the Valley of Jehoshaphat. The water flows out of a basin under the cliff, into a reservoir fifty-three feet long, eighteen broad, nineteen deep: a flight of steps leads to the bottom. It is faced with a wall of stone. Several columns stand out of the side walls, extending from the top into the cistern: they perhaps supported a roof. A beautiful engraving and description of it may be found in Bartlett's "Views of Jerusalem." The upper basin is the termination of a subterranean passage, through which the water flows from the "Fountain of the Virgin." Dr. Robinson passed through this channel, and found it seventeen hundred and fifty feet long, though the direct distance is but eleven hundred feet. The Fountain of the Virgin is situated a few steps from the bed of the Kidron, at the bottom of a deep artificial grotto, running in under the wall of the valley, and excavated out of the rock. After a descent of sixteen steps, there is a level place of ten feet, and then ten steps more lead to the water. The depth is about twenty-five feet, or fifteen feet below the actual bottom of the valley. The basin is some fifteen feet long, five or six wide, six or eight high. The water is clear, but has a peculiar taste, though Dr. Olin says it is not disagreeable. It is intermittent, being apparently supplied from a reservoir under the temple, by a syphon-like channel; that reservoir being supplied by a submontane conduit cut by Hezekiah, from a source, now concealed, on the north-west of the city. Compare 2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 4, 30. This hypothesis is explained and illustrated by diagrams in Kitto's "Modern Jerusalem." The Fountain of the Virgin has been identified with the Dragon Well, and with the King's Pool, Neh. ii. 13, 14, and with the Pool of Bethesda, John v. 2-7, which Dr. Robinson also identifies with the King's Pool and Solomon's Pool spoken of by Josephus. Its popular name is derived from a tradition that Mary washed the clothes of Jesus at this fountain. The Arabs call it 'Ain Um ed Dera', "Fountain Mother of Steps," from the long flight of steps by which it is reached. Travellers sometimes call it the "Upper Pool of Siloam." Dr. Olin thinks that it could not have been Bethesda, which is generally identified with a basin, now dry, situated near St. Stephen's Gate. See BETHESDA. About fifty rods below the Pool of Siloam is a fountain called the "Well of Job," and the "Well of Nehemiah," which is identified with EN-ROGEL, which see. The Pools of Gihon are west of the city. The Upper Pool is spoken of, 2 Kings xviii. 17: Isa. vii. 3; xxxvi. 2, and is supposed to be the same as the Old Pool, Isa. xxii. 11, and Robinson identifies it with the Dragon Well. It is situated at the head of the valley of Gihon: it is three hundred and sixteen feet long, two hundred broad, eighteen deep. The sides are built with hewn stone, with steps at the corners. It is supplied by rain, and is dry in summer. The Lower Pool, Isa. xxii. 9, is half a mile south-east of the Upper Pool, in the lower part of the Gihon valley, under the west side of Mount Zion. It is five hundred and ninety-two feet long, averages two hundred and fifty broad, and about forty deep. It was probably filled by rain and the superfluous waters of the Upper Pool. It is now broken and dry. It seems to have been used principally for watering cattle. The Pool of Hezekiah

is near the Jaffa gate, adjacent to the Coptic convent, and not far from a small reservoir, now dry, called, on the ground of a baseless tradition, the "Pool of Bathsheba." Hezekiah's Pool is two hundred and forty feet long, and one hundred and forty-four feet broad. It is not deep, and the water it contains has a whitish appearance. It supplies a bath, and is hence called Birket-el-Hummam. The water is brought by a channel from the Upper Gihon, which is identified with the conduit spoken of in 2 Kings xx. 20: 2 Chron. xxxii. 30: Isa. vii. 3. The pools spoken of Eccl. ii. 6, are identified with "The Pools of Solomon," supposed to be alluded to by Josephus, Ant., viii. 7. These are three reservoirs situated in a narrow sloping valley, about three miles south-west of Bethlehem, on the road to Hebron. They are described by Olin and Robinson: the latter measured them, and found the lower pool five hundred and eighty-two feet long, two hundred and seven broad at the east, and one hundred and forty-eight at the west end, fifty deep, with six of water; the middle pool two hundred and forty-eight above the lower, four hundred and twenty-three long, two hundred and fifty broad at the east, and one hundred and sixty at the west end, thirty-nine deep, with fourteen of water; the upper pool, one hundred and sixty feet above the middle, three hundred and eighty long, two hundred and thirty-six broad at the east, and two hundred and twenty-nine at the west end, twenty-five deep, with fifteen of water. They are called by the Arabs el-Burak. They are supplied with water from adjacent fountains, and send it off by an aqueduct which conveys it to Jerusalem. This aqueduct is supposed to be that spoken of in the Talmud, by which the reservoir under the temple was supplied. There are several reservoirs and fountains near Hebron, but which of them may be identified with the Pool of Hebron, spoken of 2 Sam. iv. 12, cannot be determined. See HEBRON and JERUSALEM.]

[POOR. The primitive Church, in imitation of the apostles—Acts xi. 29, 30: 1 Cor. xvi. 1-3: Gal. ii. 10—paid great attention to the poor. At the close of the service on Sunday, the list of beneficiaries was called, and donations ordered out of the funds of the Church. Sometimes contributions were made for the relief of Christians in distant places. Tertullian says, the people deposited their donations once a month in a charity-box.]

[POOR PILGRIMS. Vagrants from Italy, who appeared in Germany in the year 1500. They went forth two and two, barefooted and bareheaded, and fed all the week except Sunday on herbs and roots sprinkled with salt. They remained only twenty-four hours in one place. They performed this as a penance for three, five, or seven years.]

[POPE. This title, from πάππας, father, was originally given to bishops and presbyters, and is still in the Eastern Church; but in the Latin Church, since the seventh century, it has been appropriated to the Bishop of Rome. The pope was at first elected by the clergy, with the consent of the people; afterward by the clergy with the nomination, appointment, or confirmation of the king or emperor; but since the thirteenth century he has been elected by the conclave of cardinals. Sometimes the election takes place by inspiration; that is, when the principal cardinal nominates a man, and the nomination is instantly approved by two-thirds of the conclave. It is generally done by scrutiny: each cardinal depositing in a chalice a sealed ticket, containing the name of his candidate—he who gets two-thirds of the votes being elected. When the requisite number is not given, the choice is made by access, the cardinals being allowed to change their candidates, according to the choice of others to secure an election by another ballot. When the cardinals approach their candidates with a profound reverence, it is called an election by adoration—though it must still be confirmed by a scrutiny. When the differences cannot be adjusted in the conclave, the election is effected by compromise—that is, by a committee of three or five. An aged man, and one not related to the deceased pope, is generally chosen, so that personal and family aggrandizement might not be encouraged. The pontiff elect is inaugurated with most gorgeous ceremonies. His vestments are varied, superb, and symbolical. His tiara has three coronets, with two strings representing the mystical and literal modes of interpreting Scripture. He has two seals: one with the impression of Peter fishing, called "the fisherman's ring," used in sealing briefs; the other with the figures of Peter and Paul and the cross on one side, and on the other an effigy and name of the reigning pontiff, used for sealing bulls. These seals are broken at the death of the pope. When his Holiness goes in procession to St. Peter's, the cross is carried before him on a long pike, to represent his attachment to Christ crucified. Two grooms bear two fans on each side of his chair, to represent, according to Bonani, the seraphim covering the face of God with their wings! Besides the government of the Romish Church, the pope wields a temporal sovereignty, being monarch of what are called the States of the Church, having Rome for their capital. They comprehend a territory of seventeen thousand four hundred and ninety-four square miles, and a population of about three millions. The government is said to be the worst in Europe. See Bower's and Ranke's "History of the Popes;" Edgar's "Variations of Popery;" and authorities cited in Gieseler's "Ecclesiastical History," Part ii. §§ 20-23.]

PORTERS OF THE TEMPLE. The Levites discharged the office of porters of the temple both day and night, and had the care both of the treasure and offerings. The office of porter was in some sort military; properly speaking, they were the soldiers of the Lord, and the guards of his house, to whose charge the several gates of the courts of the sanctuary were appointed by lot. 1 Chron. xxvi. 1, 13, 19. "They waited at every gate, and were not permitted to depart from their service," 2 Chron. xxxv. 15; and they attended by turns in their courses, as the other Levites did. 2 Chron. viii. 14. Their proper business was to open and shut the gates, and to attend at them by day, as a sort of peace-officers, in order to prevent any tumult among the people; to keep strangers and the excommunicated and unclean persons from entering into the holy court; and, in short, to prevent whatever might be prejudicial to the safety, peace, and purity of the holy place and service. They also kept guard by night about the temple and its courts; and they are said to have been twenty-four, including three priests, who stood sentry at so many different places. There was a superior officer over the whole guard, called by Maimonides, "the man of the mountain of the house;" he walked the round as often as he pleased; when he passed a sentinel that was standing, he said, "Peace be unto you;" but if he found one asleep, he struck him, and he had liberty to set fire to his garment. This custom may, perhaps, be alluded to in the following passage: "Behold, I come as a thief;" that is, unawares: "blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments." Rev. xvi. 15. Psalm cxxxiv. seems to be addressed to these watchmen of the temple, "who by night stand in the house of the Lord;" in which they are exhorted to employ their waking hours in acts of praise and devotion.

POST, a messenger or regulated courier appointed to carry with expedition the dispatches of princes, or the letters of private persons in general. Job ix. 25: Jer. li. 31: 2 Chron. xxx. 6: Esther iii. 13, etc. It is thought that the use of posts is derived from the Persians. Diodorus Siculus observes, that the kings of Persia, in order to have intelligence of what was passed through all the provinces of their vast dominions, placed sentinels at eminences, at convenient distances, where towers were built. These sentinels gave notice of public occurrences from one to another, with a very loud and shrill voice, by which news was transmitted from one extremity of the kingdom to another, with great expedition. But as this could not be practiced except in the case of general news, which it was expedient that the whole nation should be acquainted with, Cyrus, as Xenophon relates, appointed couriers and places for post-horses, building on purpose on all the high roads houses for the reception of the couriers, where they were to deliver their packets to the next, and so on. This they did night and day, so that no inclemency of weather was to stop them; and they are represented as moving, with astonishing speed. In the judgment of many, they went faster than cranes could fly. Herodotus owns that nothing swifter was known for a journey by land. Xerxes, in his famous expedition against Greece, planted posts from the Ægean Sea to Shushan, or Susa, to send notice thither of what might happen to his army; he placed these messengers from station to station, to convey his packets, at such distances from each other as a horse might easily travel.

PRAYER has been well defined, the offering up of our desires unto God, for things agreeable to his will, in the name or through the mediation of Jesus Christ, by the help of the Holy Spirit, with a confession of our sins, and a thankful acknowledgment of his mercies. 1. Prayer is in itself a becoming acknowledgment of the all-sufficiency of God, and of our dependence upon him. It is his appointed means for the obtaining of both temporal and spiritual blessings. He could bless his creatures in another way; but he will be inquired of, to do for them those things of which they stand in need. Ezek. xxxvi. 37. It is the act of an indigent creature, seeking relief from the Fountain of mercy. A sense of want excites desire, and desire is the very essence of prayer. "One thing have I desired of the Lord," says David; "that will I seek after." Prayer without desire is like an altar without a sacrifice, or without the fire from heaven to consume it. When all our wants are supplied, prayer will be converted into praise; till then Christians must live by prayer, and dwell at the mercy-seat. God alone is able to hear and to supply their every want. The revelation which he has given of his goodness lays a foundation for our asking with confidence the blessings we need, and his ability encourages us to hope for their bestowment. "O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come." Psalm lxxv. 2. 2. Prayer is a spiritual exercise, and can only be performed acceptably by the assistance of the Holy Spirit. Rom. viii. 26. "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord, but the prayer of the upright is his delight." The Holy Spirit is the great agent in the world of grace, and without his special influence there is no acceptable prayer. Hence he is called the Spirit of grace and of supplication; for he it is that enables us to draw nigh unto God, filling our mouth with arguments, and teaching us to order our cause before him. Zech. xii. 10. 3. All acceptable prayer must be offered in faith, or a believing frame of mind. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering; for let not the wavering man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord." James i. 5-7. "He that cometh unto God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Heb. xi. 6. It must be offered in the name of Christ, believing in him as revealed in the word of God, placing in him all our hope of acceptance, and exercising unfeigned confidence in his atoning sacrifice and prevalent intercession. 4. Prayer is to be offered for "things agreeable to the will of God." So the apostle says: "This is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us; and if we know that he hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him." 1 John v. 14, 15. Our prayers must therefore be regulated by the revealed will of God, and come within the compass of the promises. These are to be the matter and the ground of our supplications. What God has not particularly promised he may nevertheless possibly bestow; but what he has promised he will assuredly perform. Of the good things promised to Israel of old not one failed, but all came to pass; and in due time the same shall be said of all the rest. 5. All this must be accompanied with confession of our sins, and thankful acknowledgment of God's mercies. These are two necessary ingredients in acceptable prayer. "I prayed," says the prophet Daniel, "and made confession." Sin is a burden, of which confession unloads the soul. "Father," said the returning prodigal, "I have sinned against Heaven and in thy sight." Thanksgiving is also as necessary as confession: by the one we take shame to ourselves; by the other, we give glory to God: by the one, we abase the creature; by the other, we exalt the Creator. In petitioning favors from God, we act like dependent creatures; in confession, like sinners; but in thanksgiving, like angels.

The reason on which this great and efficacious duty rests has been a subject of some debate. On this point, however, we have nothing stated in the Scriptures. From them we learn only, that God has appointed it; that he enjoins it to be offered in faith, that is, faith in Christ, whose atonement is the meritorious and procuring cause of all the blessings to which our desires can be directed; and that prayer so offered is an indispensable condition of our obtaining the blessings for which we ask. As a matter of inference, however, we may discover some glimpses of the reason in the Divine Mind on which its appointment rests. That reason has sometimes been said to be the moral preparation and state of fitness produced in the soul for the reception of the Divine mercies which the act and, more especially, the habit of prayer must induce. Against this stands the strong and, in a scriptural view, fatal objection, that an efficiency is thus ascribed to the mere act of a creature to produce those great and, in many respects, radical changes in the character of man, which we are taught, by inspired authority, to refer to the direct influences of the Holy Spirit. What is it that fits man for forgiveness, but simply repentance? Yet that is expressly said to be the "gift" of Christ, and supposes strong operations of the illuminating and convincing Spirit of truth, the Lord and giver of spiritual life; and if the mere acts and habit of prayer had efficiency enough to produce a scriptural repentance, then every formalist attending with ordinary seriousness to his devotions, must, in consequence, become a penitent. Again: if we pray for spiritual blessings aright, that is, with an earnestness of desire which arises from a due apprehension of their importance, and a preference of them to all earthly good, who does not see that this implies such a deliverance from the earthly and carnal disposition which characterizes our degenerate nature, that an agency far above our own, however we may employ it, must be supposed? or else, if our own prayers could be efficient up to this point, we might, by the continual application of this instrument, complete our regeneration, independent of that grace of God which, after all, this theory brings in. It may indeed be said that the grace of God operates by our prayers to produce in us a state of moral fitness to receive the blessings we ask. But this gives up the point contended for, the moral efficiency of prayer; and refers the efficiency to another agent working by our prayers as an instrument. Still, however, it may be affirmed, that the Scriptures nowhere represent prayer as an instrument for improving our moral state, in any other way than as the means of bringing into the soul new supplies of spiritual life and strength. It is therefore more properly to be considered as a condition of our obtaining that grace by which such effects are wrought, than as the instrument by which it effects them. In fact, all genuine acts of prayer depend upon a grace previously bestowed, and from which alone the disposition and the power to pray proceed. So it was said of Saul of Tarsus, "Behold, he prayeth!" He prayed in fact then for the first time; but that was in consequence of the illumination of his mind as to his spiritual danger, effected by the miracle on the way to Damascus, and the grace of God which accompanied the miracle. Nor does the miraculous character of the means by which conviction was produced in his mind, affect the relevancy of this to ordinary cases. By whatever means God may be pleased to fasten the conviction of our spiritual danger upon our minds, and to awaken us out of the long sleep of sin, that conviction must precede real prayer, and comes from the influence of his grace, rendering the means of conviction effectual. Thus it is not the prayer which produces the conviction, but the conviction which gives birth to the prayer; and if we pursue the matter into its subsequent stages, we shall come to the same result. We pray for what we feel we want; that is, for something not in our possession: we obtain this either by impartation from God, to whom we look up as the only Being able to bestow the good for which we ask him; or else we obtain it, according to this theory, by some moral efficiency being given to the exercise of prayer to work it in us. Now, the latter hypothesis is in many cases manifestly absurd. We ask for pardon of sin, for instance; but this is an act of God done for us, quite distinct from any moral change which prayer may be said to produce in us, whatever efficiency we may ascribe to it; for no such change in us can be pardon, since that must proceed from the party offended. We ask for increase of spiritual strength; and prayer is the expression of that want. But if it supply this want by its own moral efficiency, it must supply it in proportion to its intensity and earnestness; which intensity and earnestness can only be called forth by the degree in which the want is felt; so that the case supposed is contradictory and absurd, as it makes the sense of want to be in proportion to the supply which ought to abate or remove it. And if it be urged that prayer at least produces in us a fitness for the supply of spiritual strength, because it is excited by a sense of our wants, the answer is, that the fitness contended for consists in that sense of want itself which must be produced in us by the previous agency of grace, or we should never pray for supplies. There is, in fact, nothing in prayer simply which appears to have any adaptation, as an instrument, to effect a moral change in man, although it should be supposed to be made use of by the influence of the Holy Spirit. The word of God is properly an instrument, because it contains the doctrine which that Spirit explains and applies, and the motives to faith and obedience which he enforces upon the conscience and affections; and although prayer brings these truths and motives before us, prayer cannot properly be said to be an instrument of our regeneration, because that which is thus brought by prayer to bear upon our case is the word of God itself introduced into our prayers, which derive their sole influence in that respect from that circumstance. Prayer simply is the application of an insufficient to a sufficient Being for the good which the former cannot otherwise obtain, and which the latter only can supply; and as that supply is dependent upon prayer, and in the nature of the thing consequent, prayer can in no good sense be said to be the instrument of supplying our wants, or fitting us for their supply, except relatively, as a mere condition appointed by the Donor.

If we must inquire into the reason of the appointment of prayer—and it can scarcely be considered as a purely arbitrary institution—that reason seems to be, the preservation in the minds of men of a solemn and impressive sense of God's agency in the world, and the dependence of all creatures upon him. Perfectly pure and glorified beings, no longer in a state of probation, and therefore exposed to no temptations, may not need this institution; but men in their fallen state are constantly prone to forget God; to rest in the agency of second causes; and to build upon a sufficiency in themselves. This is at once a denial to God of the glory which he rightly claims, and a destructive delusion to creatures, who, in forsaking God as the object of their constant affiance, trust but in broken reeds, and attempt to drink from "broken cisterns which can hold no water." It is then equally in mercy to us, as in respect to his own honor and acknowledgment, that the Divine Being has suspended so many of his blessings, and those of the highest necessity to us, upon the exercise of prayer; an act which acknowledges his uncontrollable agency, and the dependence of all creatures upon him; our insufficiency, and his fulness; and lays the foundation of that habit of gratitude and thanksgiving which is at once so meliorating to our own feelings, and so conducive to a cheerful obedience to the will of God. And if this reason for the injunction of prayer is nowhere in the Scriptures stated in so many words, it is a principle uniformly supposed as the foundation of the whole scheme of religion which they have revealed.

To this duty objections have been sometimes offered, at which it may be well at least to glance. One has been grounded upon a supposed predestination of all things which come to pass; and the argument is, that as this established predetermination of all things cannot be altered, prayer, which supposes that God will depart from it, is vain and useless. The answer which a pious predestinarian would give to this objection is, that the argument drawn from the predetermination of God lies with the same force against every other human effort as against prayer; and that as God's predetermination to give food to man does not render the cultivation of the earth useless and impertinent, so neither does the predestination of things shut out the necessity and efficacy of prayer. It would also be urged, that God has ordained the means as well as the end; and although he is an unchangeable Being, it is a part of the unchangeable system which he has established, that prayer shall be heard and accepted. Those who have not these views of predestination will answer the objection differently; for if the premises of such a predestination as is assumed by the objection, and conceded in the answer, be allowed, the answer is unsatisfactory. The Scriptures represent God, for instance, as purposing to inflict a judgment upon an individual or a nation, which purpose is often changed by prayer. In this case either God's purpose must be denied, and then his threatenings are reduced to words without meaning; or the purpose must be allowed; in which case either prayer breaks in upon predestination, if understood absolutely, or it is vain and useless. To the objection so drawn out it is clear that no answer is given by saying that the means as well as the end are predestinated, since prayer in such cases is not a means to the end, but an instrument of thwarting it; or is a means to one end in opposition to another end, which, if equally predestinated with the same absoluteness, is a contradiction. The true answer is, that although God has absolutely pre-determined some things, there are others, which respect his government of free and accountable agents, which he has but conditionally pre-determined. The true immutability of God consists, not in his adherence to his purposes, but in his never changing the principles of his administration; and he may therefore, in perfect accordance with his preordination of things, and the immutability of his nature, purpose to do, under certain conditions dependent upon the free agency of man, what he will not do under others; and for this reason, that an immutable adherence to the principles of a wise, just, and gracious government requires it. Prayer is in Scripture made one of these conditions; and if God has established it as one of the principles of his moral government to accept prayer, in every case in which he has given us authority to ask, he has not, we may be assured, entangled his actual government of the world with the bonds of such an eternal predestination of particular events, as either to reduce prayer to a mere form of words, or not to be able himself, consistently with his decrees, to answer it, whenever it is encouraged by his express engagements.

A second objection is, that as God is infinitely wise and good, his wisdom and justice will lead him to bestow "whatever is fit for us without praying; and if any thing be not fit for us, we cannot obtain it by praying." To this Dr. Paley very well replies, "that it may be agreeable to perfect wisdom to grant that to our prayers which it would not have been agreeable to the same wisdom to have given us without praying for." This, independent of the question of the authority of the Scriptures, which explicitly enjoin prayer, is the best answer which can be given to the objection; and it is no small confirmation of it, that it is obvious to every reflecting man, that for God to withhold favors till asked for, "tends," as the same writer observes, "to encourage devotion among his rational creatures, and to keep up and circulate a knowledge and sense of their dependency upon him." But it is urged, "God will always do what is best from the moral perfection of his nature, whether we pray or not." This objection, however, supposes that there is but one mode of acting for the best, and that the Divine will is necessarily determined to that mode only; "both which positions," says Paley, "presume a knowledge of universal nature much beyond what we are capable of attaining." It is, indeed, a very unsatisfactory mode of speaking, to say, God will always do what is best; since we can conceive him capable in all cases of doing what is still better for the creature, and also that the creature is capable of receiving more and more from his infinite fullness for ever. All that can be rationally meant by such a phrase is, that, in the circumstances of the case, God will always do what is most consistent with his own wisdom, holiness, and goodness; but then the disposition to pray, and the act of praying, add a new circumstance to every case, and often bring many other new circumstances along with them. It supposes humility, contrition, and trust, on the part of the creature; and an acknowledgment of the power and compassion of God, and of the merit of the atonement of Christ: all which are manifestly new positions, so to speak, of the circumstances of the creature, which, upon the very principle of the objection, rationally understood, must be taken into consideration.

But if the efficacy of prayer as to ourselves be granted, its influence upon the case of others is said to be more difficult to conceive. This may be allowed without at all affecting the duty. Those who bow to the authority of the Scriptures will see that the duty of praying for ourselves and for others rests upon the same Divine appointment; and to those who ask for the reason of such intercession in behalf of others, it is sufficient to reply, that the efficacy of prayer being established in one case, there is the same reason to conclude that our prayers may benefit others, as any other effort we may use. It can only be by Divine appointment that one creature is made dependent upon another for any advantage, since it was doubtless in the power of the Creator to have rendered each independent of all but himself. Whatever reason, therefore, might lead him to connect and interweave the interests of one man with the benevolence of another, will be the leading reason for that kind of mutual dependence which is implied in the benefit of mutual prayer. Were it only that a previous sympathy, charity, and good will are implied in the duty, and must, indeed, be cultivated in order to it, and be strengthened by it, the wisdom and benevolence of the institution would, it is presumed, be apparent to every well-constituted mind. That all prayer for others must proceed upon a less perfect knowledge of them than we have of ourselves, is certain; that all our petitions must be, even in our own mind, more conditional than those which respect ourselves, though many of these must be subjected to the principles of a general administration, which we but partially apprehend; and that all spiritual influences upon others, when they are subject to our prayers, will be understood by us as liable to the control of their free agency, must also be conceded; and, therefore, when others are concerned, our prayers may often be partially or wholly fruitless. He who believes the Scriptures will, however, be encouraged by the declaration that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man," for his fellow-creatures, "availeth much;" and he who demands something beyond mere authoritative declaration, as he cannot deny that prayer is one of those instruments by which another may be benefited, must acknowledge that, like the giving of counsel, it may be of great utility in some cases, although it should fail in others; and that as no man can tell how much good counsel may influence another, or in many cases say whether it has ultimately failed or not, so it is with prayer. It is a part of the Divine plan, as revealed in his word, to give many blessings to man independent of his own prayers, leaving the subsequent improvement of them to himself. They are given in honor of the intercession of Christ, man's great "Advocate;" and they are given, subordinately, in acceptance of the prayers of Christ's Church, and of righteous individuals. And when many or few devout individuals become thus the instruments of good to communities, or to whole nations, there is no greater mystery in this than in the obvious fact, that the happiness or misery of large masses of mankind is often greatly affected by the wisdom or the errors, the skill or the incompetence, the good or the bad conduct, of a few persons, and often of one.

[PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD. See DEAD, PRAYERS FOR THE.]

PREACHING is the discoursing publicly on any religious subject. From the sacred records, says Robert Robinson, we learn that when men began to associate for the purpose of worshipping the Deity, Enoch prophesied. Jude 14, 15. We have a very short account of this prophet and his doctrine; enough, however, to convince us that he taught the principal truths of natural and revealed religion. Conviction of sin was in his doctrine, and communion with God was exemplified in his conduct. Gen. v. 24: Heb. xi. 5, 6. From the days of Enoch to the time of Moses, each patriarch worshipped God with his family: probably several assembled at new moons, and alternately instructed the whole company. "Noah," it is said, "was a preacher of righteousness." 1 Peter iii. 19, 20: 2 Peter ii. 5. Abraham commanded his household after him to keep the way of the Lord, and to do justice and judgment, Gen. xviii. 19; and Jacob, when his house lapsed to idolatry, remonstrated against it, and exhorted all them that were with him to put away the strange gods, and go up with him to Bethel. Gen. xxxv. 2, 3. Melchisedec, also, we may consider as the father, the priest, and the prince, of his people; publishing the glad tidings of peace and salvation. Gen. xiv.: Heb. vii.

Moses was a most eminent prophet and preacher, raised up by the authority of God, and by whom, it was said, came the law. John i. 17. This great man had much at heart the promulgation of his doctrine: he directed it to be inscribed on pillars, to be transcribed in books, and to be taught both in public and private by word of mouth. Deut. iv. 9; vi. 9; xvii. 18; xxvii. 8; xxxi. 19: Num. v. 23. He himself set the example of each; and how he and Aaron preached, we may see by several parts of his writings. The first discourse was heard with profound reverence and attention; the last was both uttered and received with raptures. Exod. iv. 31: Deut. xxxiii. 7, 8, etc. Public preaching does not appear under this economy to have been attached to the priesthood: priests were not officially preachers; and we have innumerable instances of discourses delivered in assemblies by men of other tribes beside that of Levi. Psalm lxxviii. 11. Joshua was an Ephraimite; but, being full of the spirit of wisdom, he gathered the tribes to Shechem, and harangued the people of God. Deut. xxxiv. 9: Joshua xxiv. Solomon was a prince of the house of Judah; Amos, a herdsman of Tekoa; yet both were preachers, and one at least was a prophet. 1 Kings ii.: Amos vii. 14, 15. When the ignorant notions of pagans, the vices of their practice, and the idolatry of their pretended worship, were in some sad periods incorporated into the Jewish religion by the princes of that nation, the prophets and all the seers protested against this apostasy; and they were persecuted for so doing. Shemaiah preached to Rehoboam, the princes, and all the people at Jerusalem, 2 Chron. xii. 5; Azariah and Hanani preached to Asa and his army, 2 Chron. xv. 1; xvi. 7; Micaiah, to Ahab. Some of them opened schools, or houses of instruction; and there to their disciples they taught the pure religion of Moses. At Naioth, in the suburbs of Ramah, there was one where Samuel dwelt; and there was one at Jericho, and a third at Bethel, to which Elijah and Elisha often resorted. Thither the people went on Sabbath days, and at new moons, and received public lessons of piety and morality. 1 Sam. xix. 18: 2 Kings ii. 2, 5; iv. 2, 3. Through all this period, however, there was a dismal confusion of the useful ordinance of public preaching. Sometimes they had no open vision, and the word of the Lord was precious, or scarce; the people only heard it now and then. At other times they were left without a teaching priest, and without law. And at other seasons, again, itinerants, both princes, priests, and Levites, were sent through all the country, to carry the book of the law, and to teach in the cities. In a word, preaching flourished when pure religion grew; and when the last decayed, the first was suppressed. Moses had not appropriated preaching to any order of men: persons, places, times, and manners, were all left open and discretionary. Many of the discourses were preached in camps and courts, in streets, schools, cities, villages; sometimes, with great composure and coolness; at other times, with vehement action and rapturous energy; sometimes, in a plain, blunt style; at other times, in all the magnificent pomp of eastern allegory. On some occasions, the preachers appeared in public with visible signs, with implements of war, with yokes of slavery, or something adapted to their subject. They gave lectures on these, held them up to view, girded them on, broke them in pieces, rent their garments, rolled in the dust, and endeavored, by all the methods they could devise, agreeably to the customs of their country, to impress the minds of their auditors with the nature and importance of their doctrines. These men were highly esteemed by the pious part of the nation; and princes thought proper to keep seers and others who were scribes, who read and expounded the law. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 29, 30; xxxv. 15. Hence, false prophets, bad men, who found their account in pretending to be good, crowded the courts of princes. Jezebel, an idolatress, had four hundred prophets of Baal; and Ahab, a pretended worshipper of Jehovah, had as many pretended prophets of his own profession. 2 Chron. xviii. 5.

When the Jews were carried captive into Babylon, the prophets who were with them inculcated the principles of religion, and endeavored to possess their minds with an aversion to idolatry; and, to the success of preaching, we may attribute the re-conversion of the Jews to the belief and worship of one God; a conversion that remains to this day. The Jews have since fallen into horrid crimes; but they have never since this period lapsed into gross idolatry. Hosea ii., iii.: Ezekiel ii., iii., xxxiv. There were not wanting, however, multitudes of false prophets among them, whose characters are strikingly delineated by the true prophets, and which the reader may see in Ezek. xiii.: Isa. lvi.: Jer. xxiii. When the seventy years of captivity were expired, the good prophets and preachers, Zerubbabel, Joshua, Haggai, and others, having confidence in the word of God, and being concerned to possess their natural, civil, and religious rights, endeavored, by all means, to extricate themselves and their countrymen from that mortifying state into which the crimes of their ancestors had brought them. They wept, fasted, prayed, preached, prophesied, and at length prevailed. The chief instruments were Nehemiah and Ezra: the former was governor, and reformed the civil state; the latter was a scribe of the law of the God of heaven, and applied himself to ecclesiastical matters, in which he rendered the noblest service to his country, and to all posterity. He collected and collated MSS. of the sacred writings, and arranged and published the books of the holy canon in their present form. To this he added a second work, as necessary as the former: he revised and new-modelled public teaching, and exemplified his plan in his own person. The Jews had almost lost, in the seventy years' captivity, their original language; that was now become dead; and they spoke a jargon made up of their own language and that of the Chaldeans and other nations with whom they had been mingled. Formerly, preachers had only explained subjects: now they were obliged to explain words; words which, in the sacred code, were become obsolete, equivocal, or dead. Houses were now opened, not for ceremonial worship, as sacrificing, for this was confined to the temple; but for moral and religious instruction, as praying, preaching, reading the law, Divine worship, and social duties. These houses were called synagogues: the people repaired thither for morning and evening prayer; and on Sabbaths and festivals, the law was read and expounded to them. We have a short but beautiful description of the manner of Ezra's first preaching, Neh. viii. Upward of fifty thousand people assembled in a street, or large square, near the water-gate. It was early in the morning of a Sabbath day. A pulpit of wood, in the fashion of a small tower, was placed there on purpose for the preacher; and this turret was supported by a scaffold, or temporary gallery, where, in a wing on the right hand of the pulpit, sat six of the principal preachers; and in another on the left, seven. Thirteen other principal teachers, and many Levites, were present also, on scaffolds erected for the purpose, alternately to officiate. When Ezra ascended the pulpit, he produced and opened the book of the law, and the whole congregation instantly rose up from their seats, and stood. Then he offered up prayer and praise to God; the people bowing their heads and worshipping the Lord with their faces to the ground; and at the close of the prayer, with uplifted hands, they solemnly pronounced, "Amen! Amen!" Then all standing, Ezra, assisted at times by the Levites, read the law distinctly, gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading. The sermons delivered so affected the hearers, that they wept excessively; and about noon the sorrow became so exuberant and immeasurable, that it was thought necessary by the governor, the preacher, and the Levites, to restrain it. "Go your way," said they, "eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions to them for whom nothing is prepared." The wise and benevolent sentiments of these noble souls were imbibed by the whole congregation, and fifty thousand troubled hearts were calmed in a moment. Home they returned, to eat, to drink, to send portions, and rejoice, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them. Plato was living at this time, teaching dull philosophy to cold academics; but what was he, and what was Xenophon, or Demosthenes, or any of the pagan orators, in comparison with these men? From this period to that of the appearance of Jesus Christ, public preaching was universal; synagogues were multiplied, vast numbers attended, and elders and rulers were appointed for the purpose of order and instruction.

The most celebrated preacher that arose before the appearance of Jesus Christ was John the Baptist. He was commissioned from Heaven to be the harbinger of the Messiah. His subjects were few, plain, and important. His style was vehement, his images bold, his deportment solemn, his action eager, and his morals strict. But this bright morning star gave way to the illustrious Sun of righteousness, who now arose on a benighted world. Jesus Christ certainly was the Prince of teachers. Who but can admire the simplicity and majesty of his style, the beauty of his images, the alternate softness and severity of his address, the choice of his subjects, the gracefulness of his deportment, and the indefatigableness of his zeal? Let the reader charm and solace himself in the study and contemplation of the character, excellency, and dignity of this Divine teacher, as he will find them delineated in the evangelists.

The apostles copied their Divine Master. They formed multitudes of religious societies, and were abundantly successful in their labors. They confined their attention to religion, and left the schools to dispute, and politicians to intrigue. The doctrines they preached they supported entirely by evidence; and neither had nor required such assistance as human laws or worldly policy, the eloquence of schools or the terror of arms, could afford them.

The apostles being dead, every thing came to pass as they had foretold: the whole Christian system, in time, underwent a miserable change; preaching shared the fate of other institutions, and the glory of the primitive Church gradually degenerated. Those writers whom we call the fathers, however, held up to view by some as models for imitation, do not deserve that indiscriminate praise ascribed to them. Christianity, it is true, is found in their writings; but how sadly incorporated with pagan philosophy and Jewish allegory! It must, indeed, be allowed, that, in general, the simplicity of Christianity was maintained, though under gradual decay, during the first three centuries. The next five centuries produced many pious and excellent preachers, both in the Latin and Greek Church, though the doctrine continued to degenerate. The Greek pulpit was adorned with some eloquent orators. Basil, Bishop of Cesarea, John Chrysostom, preacher at Antioch, and afterward patriarch, as he was called, of Constantinople, and Gregory Nazianzen, who all flourished in the fourth century, seem to have led the fashion of preaching in the Greek Church; Jerome and Augustin did the same in the Latin Church. The first preachers differed much in pulpit action; the greater part used very moderate and sober gestures. They delivered their sermons all extempore, while there were notaries who took down what they said. Sermons in those days were all in the vulgar tongue: the Greeks preached in Greek, the Latins in Latin. They did not preach by the clock, so to speak, but were short or long as they saw occasion; though an hour was about the usual time. Sermons were generally both preached and heard standing; but sometimes both speaker and auditors sat, especially the aged and the infirm. The fathers were fond of allegory; for Origen, that everlasting allegorizer, had set them the example. Before preaching, the preacher usually went into a vestry to pray, and afterward to speak to such as came to salute him. He prayed with his eyes shut in the pulpit. The first word the preacher uttered to the people when he ascended the pulpit was, "Peace be with you;" or, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all;" to which the assembly first added, "Amen," and in after times they answered, "And with thy spirit." Degenerate, however, as these days were, in comparison of those of the apostles, yet they were golden ages in comparison with the times that followed, when metaphysical reasoning, mystical divinity, yea, Aristotelian categories, and reading the lives of saints, were substituted in the place of sermons. The pulpit became a stage where ludicrous priests obtained the vulgar laugh by the lowest kind of wit, especially at the festivals of Christmas and Easter.

But the glorious Reformation was the offspring of preaching, by which mankind were reformed; there was a standard, and the religion of the times was put to the trial by it. The avidity of the common people to read the Scriptures, and to hear them expounded, was wonderful; and the Papists were so fully convinced of the benefits of frequent public instruction, that they, who were justly called unpreaching prelates, and whose pulpits, to use an expression of Latimer, had been "bells without clappers" for many a long year, were obliged for shame to set up regular preaching again. The Church of Rome has produced some great preachers since the Reformation, but none equal to the reformed preachers. And a question naturally arises here, which it would be unpardonable to pass over in silence, concerning the singular effect of the preaching of the reformed, which was general, national, universal reformation. In the dark times of Popery there had arisen now and then some famous popular preachers, who had zealously inveighed against the vices of the times, and whose sermons had produced sudden and amazing effects on their auditors; but all these effects had died away with the preachers who had produced them, and all things had gone back into their old state. Law, learning, commerce, society at large, had not been improved. Here a new scene opens: preachers arise less popular, perhaps less indefatigable and exemplary; their sermons produce less striking immediate effects; and yet their auditors go away and agree by whole nations to reform. Jerome Savonarola, Jerome Narni, Capistran, Connecte, and many others, had produced, by their sermons, great immediate effects. When Connecte preached, the ladies lowered their head-dresses, and committed quilled caps by hundreds to the flames. When Narni taught the people in Lent, from the pulpits of Rome, half the city went from his sermons crying along the streets, "Lord, have mercy upon us;" so that in only one passion-week, two thousand crowns' worth of rope were sold to make scourges with; and when he preached before the pope to the cardinals and bishops, and painted the sin of non-residence in its own colors, he frightened thirty or forty bishops, who heard him, home to their dioceses. In the pulpit of the University of Salamanca, he induced eight hundred students to quit all worldly prospects of honor, riches, and pleasure, and to become penitents in divers monasteries. We know the fate of Savonarola, and others might be added; but all lamented the momentary duration of the effects produced by their labors. Narni himself was so disgusted with his office, that he renounced preaching, and shut himself up in his cell to mourn over his irclaimable contemporaries; for bishops went back to the court, and rope-makers lay idle again.

Our reformers taught all the good doctrines which had been taught by these men, and they added two or three more, by which they laid the axe to the root of the apostasy, and produced general reformation. Instead of appealing to popes and canons, and founders and fathers, they only quoted them, and referred their auditors to the Holy Scriptures for law. Pope Leo X. did not know this when he told Prierio, who complained of Luther's heresy, "Friar Martin has a fine genius." They also taught the people what little they knew of Christian liberty; and so led them into a belief that they might follow their own ideas in religion, without the consent of a confessor, a diocesan, a pope, or a council. They went farther, and laid the stress of all religion on justifying faith.

Since the reformers, we have had multitudes who have entered into their views with disinterestedness and success; and in the present times, both in the Church and among other religious societies, names might be mentioned which would do honor to any nation; for though there are too many who do not fill up that important station with proportionate piety and talents, yet we have men who are conspicuous for their extent of knowledge, depth of experience, originality of thought, fervency of zeal, consistency of deportment, and great usefulness in the Christian Church.

The preceding sketch will show how mighty an agent preaching has been, in all ages, in raising and maintaining and reviving the spirit of religion. Wherever it has had this power, let it however be remarked, it has consisted in the declaration, the proclamation, of the truth of God as contained in his early revelations to man, and afterward embodied in the Holy Scriptures. The effect, too, has been produced by preachers living themselves under the influence of this truth, and filled "with faith and the Holy Ghost," depending wholly upon God's blessing for success, and going forth in his name, with ardent longing to "win souls," and to build up the Church in knowledge and holiness. For preaching is not a profession, but a work of Divine appointment, to be rightly discharged only by him who receives a commission from God, and fulfils it as under his eye, and in dependence upon his promise, "Lo, I am with you alway."

[So many works have been written on Homiletics, and many of them are so valuable, that it is difficult to particularize. The student is referred to Chrysostom on the Priesthood, Massillon's Charges, Burnet's Pastoral Care, Baxter's Reformed Pastor, Maury and Fénelon on Eloquence, Smith's Lectures on the Sacred Office, Ostervald's, Doddridge's, Campbell's, and Blair's Lectures, Bridge's Christian Ministry, Claude's Essay, Gregory on the Composition and Delivery of a Sermon, Reybaz on Preaching, Preacher's Manual by Drs. Clarke and Coke, Vinet's Homiletics and Pastoral Theology. It is equally difficult to designate models; indeed, no printed sermons are, in all respects, proper exemplars for the pulpit—not even those of Donne, Sanderson, South, Tillotson, Jeremy Taylor, Barrow, S. Clarke, Sherlock, Horsley, Massillon, Saurin, Wesley, Watson, Hall, Chalmers, though their Discourses, together with many by American divines, may be studied with great profit.]

[PRE-ADAMITES. Inhabitants of the earth, supposed to have lived before Adam. Isaac de la Pereyra published a book in 1655 in which he asserts that the Jews descended from Adam, and the Gentiles from a pre-Adamite race, referring to the Chaldeans and Egyptians for authority. Being roughly handled by the Inquisition, he appealed to Rome, whither he went and printed a recantation of his absurd opinions.]

[PREBENDARY. A member of the chapter of a cathedral, who enjoys a prebend, or maintenance, for officiating at stated times in the church.]

[PRECISIANS. A name given to the Puritans, because of their precise manners.]

[PREDESTINATIANS. A sect which arose in Gaul, shortly after the Pelagian controversy began. Their creed was supralapsarian. It was revived by Gotteschalvus in the ninth century, and by Calvinists after the Reformation.]

PREDESTINATION, according to some, is a judgment or decree of God, by which he has resolved, from all eternity, to save a certain number of persons, hence named elect. Others define it, a decree to give faith in Jesus Christ to a certain number of men, and to leave the rest to their own malice and hardness of heart. A third, more scripturally, God's eternal purpose to save all that "truly repent and unfeignedly believe his holy gospel:" according to the Apostle Paul, "Whom he did foreknow," as believers, "them he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son;" to his moral image here, and to the image of his glorified humanity in heaven. According to the Calvinistic scheme, the reason of God's predestinating some to everlasting life is not founded in a foresight of their faith and obedience; nevertheless it is also maintained, on this scheme, that the means are decreed as well as the end, and that God purposes to save none but such as by his grace he shall prepare for salvation by sanctification. The Remonstrants define predestination to be God's decree to save believers and condemn unbelievers. Some represent the election and predestination spoken of in Scripture as belonging only to nations, or at least bodies of men, and not to particular persons. The greatest difficulties with which the modern theology is clogged turn on predestination: both the Romish and Reformed Churches are divided about it; the Lutherans speak of it with horror; the Calvinists contend for it with the greatest zeal; the Molinists and Jesuits preach it down as a most dangerous doctrine; the Jansenists assert it as an article of faith; the Arminians, Remonstrants, and many others, are all avowed enemies of absolute predestination. Those strenuous patrons of Jansenism, the Port-royalists, taught that God predestinates those whom he foresees will coöperate with his grace to the end. Dupin adds, that men do not fall into sin because not predestinated to life, but they are not predestinated because God foresaw their sins. See CALVINISM.

This doctrine has already been treated of. We shall here therefore merely subjoin a sketch of its history previous to the Reformation. The apostolic fathers, men little accustomed to the intricacy of metaphysical disquisition, deeply impressed with the truth of the gospel, powerfully influenced by its spirit, and from their particular situation naturally dwelling much upon it as a system of direction and consolation, do not, in their writings, at all advert to the origin of evil, or to predestination, so closely allied to it. They press with much earnestness, upon those in whom they were interested, the vast importance of practical holiness, exhibit the motives which appeared to them calculated to secure it, and represent the blessedness which awaits good men, and the condemnation reserved for the wicked; but they do not once attempt to determine whether the sin which they were solicitous to remove could be accounted for in consistency with the essential holiness and the unbounded mercy of the Deity. In short, they just took that view of this subject which every man takes when he is not seeking to enter into philosophical disquisition: never for one moment doubting that whatever is wrong was ultimately to be referred to man, and that the economy of grace proceeding from God was the most convincing proof of the tenderness of his compassion for mankind.

When, however, the Church received within its communion those who had been educated in the schools of philosophy, and to whom the question as to the origin of evil must, while they frequented these schools, have become familiar, it was not to be supposed that, even although they were convinced that we should be chiefly solicitous about the formation of the Christian character, there would be no allusion to what had formerly interested them, or that they would refrain from delivering their sentiments upon it. Agreeably to this, we find in the works of Justin Martyr, Tatian, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen, sufficient intimations that they had directed their attention to the difficulty now under review; and that, whether upon adequate grounds or not, they had come to a decision as to the way in which it should be explained consistently with the Divine perfections. It is evident that they did not investigate the subject to the depth to which it is requisite for the full discussion of it to go; and that various questions which must be put before it can be brought completely before us, they either did not put, or hastily regarded as of very little moment; but it is enough to dwell upon the fact, that they did employ their thoughts upon it, and have so expressed themselves as to leave no doubt of the light in which it was contemplated by them. Justin, in his dialogue with Trypho, remarks, that "they who were foreknown as to become wicked, whether angels or men, did so, not from any fault of God, αὐτῶν τοῦ Θεοῦ, but from their own blame;" by which observation he shows it to have been his opinion that God foresaw in what manner his intelligent creatures would act; but that this did not affect their liberty, and did not diminish their guilt. A little after he says more fully, that "God created angels and men free to the practice of righteousness, having planted in them reason, through which they knew by whom they were created, and through whom they existed, when before they were not; and who prescribed to them a law by which they were to be judged if they acted contrary to right reason. Wherefore we, angels and men, are through ourselves convicted as being wicked, if we do not lay hold of repentance. But if the Logos of God foretells that some angels and men would go to be punished, he does so because he foreknew that they would certainly become wicked; by no means, however, because God made them such." Justin thus admits that man is wholly dependent upon God, deriving existence and every thing which he has from the Almighty; but he is persuaded that we were perfectly able to retain our integrity, and that, although it was foreseen that we should not do so, this did not abridge our moral power, or fix any imputation on the Deity in consequence of our transgression. Tatian, in his oration against the Greeks—an excellent work, which, although composed after the death of Justin, was written, in all probability, before its author had adopted the wild opinions which he defended toward the conclusion of his life—expresses very much the same sentiments avowed by Justin. He says, "Both men and angels were created free; so that man becoming wicked through his own fault, may be deservedly punished; while a good man, who, from the right exercise of his free will, does not transgress the law of God, is entitled to praise; that the power of the Divine Logos having in himself the knowledge of what was to happen, not through fate or unavoidable necessity, but from free choice, predicted future things, condemning the wicked, and praising the righteous."

Irenæus, in the third book of his work against heresies, has taken an opportunity to state his notions about the origin of evil. The seventy-first chapter of that book is entitled, "A proof that man is free, and has power to this extent, that of himself he can choose what is good, or the contrary." In illustration of this he remarks: "God gave to man the power of election as he did to the angels. They, therefore, who do not obey are justly not found with the good, and receive deserved punishment, because God having given them what was good, they did not keep it, but despised the riches of the Divine mercy." The next chapter is entitled, "A proof that some men are not good by nature, and others wicked; and that what is good is within the choice of man." In treating on this subject, Irenæus observes, that "if the reverse were the case, the good would not merit praise, nor the wicked blame; because, being merely what, without any will of theirs, they had been made, they could not be considered as voluntary agents. But," he adds, "since all have the same nature, and are able to retain and to do what is good, and may, on the other hand, lose it and not do it, some are, even in the sight of men, and much more in that of God, deservedly praised and others blamed." In support of this he introduces a great variety of passages from Scripture. It appears, however, that the real difficulty attending the subject had suggested itself to his mind; for he inquires in the seventy-third chapter, why God had not from the beginning made man perfect, all things being possible to him. He gives to this question a metaphysical and unsatisfactory answer, but which so far satisfied himself as to convince him that there could not, on this ground, be any imputation justly cast on the perfections of the Almighty, and that, consequently, a sufficient explanation of the origin of evil and of the justice of punishing it, was to be found in the nature of man as a free agent, or in the abuse of that liberty with which man had been endowed. Tertullian had also speculated upon the moral condition of man, and has recorded his sentiments with respect to it. He explicitly asserts the freedom of the will; lays down the position, that if this be denied, there can be neither reward nor punishment; and, in answer to an objection, that since free will has been productive of such melancholy consequences, it would have been better that it had not been bestowed, he enters into a formal vindication of this part of our constitution. In reply to another suggestion, that God might have interposed to prevent the choice which was to be productive of sin and misery, he maintains that this could not have been done without destroying that admirable constitution by which alone the interests of virtue can be really promoted. He thus thought that sin was to be imputed wholly to man, and that it was perfectly consistent with the attributes of God, or rather illustrated these attributes, that there should be a system under which sin was possible, because without this possibility there could have been no accountable agents.

From what has been stated on this subject, it seems unquestionable that the apostolic fathers did not at all enter upon the subject of the origin of evil; that the writers by whom they were succeeded were satisfied that, in the sense in which the term is now most commonly used, there was no such thing as predestination; that they uniformly represented the destiny of man as regulated by the use or abuse of his free will; that, with the exception of Irenæus, they did not attempt to explain why such a creature as man, who was to fall into sin, was created by a Being of infinite goodness; that the sole objection to their doctrine seemed to them to be, that predestination was incompatible with liberty; and that, when they answered this, they considered that nothing more was requisite for receiving, without hesitation, the view of man, upon which they often and fondly dwelt, as a free and accountable agent, who might have held fast his integrity, and whose fall from that integrity was to be ascribed solely to himself, as it did not at all result from any appointment of the Supreme Being.

Although opinions respecting original sin directly tending to a very different view of the subject than had been previously taken, had been stated by Cyprian, yet a thorough investigation of it, and the sentiments which afterward were widely received in the Christian Church, took their rise from the discussions to which the Pelagian controversy gave occasion. Previous to the part which Augustin took in that controversy, he seems to have been very much of the same sentiments with Origen and the other early fathers. But, either from what he considered as a more deliberate and complete examination of Scripture, or from perceiving the necessity imposed on him, in consequence of some of the positions which he had laid down in his writings against Pelagius, he soon changed his opinion, and advanced a notion more in harmony with these positions. Having to show the absolute necessity of Divine grace, he inculcated that, in consequence of original sin, man was infallibly determined to evil, and was therefore in a state of condemnation; and he thus took away the foundation upon which the prevailing tenets rested; because it was impossible that men could be predestined to life, or the reverse, from pre-science of their actions, when, without the special grace of God, they were absolutely incapacitated for obedience to the Divine law. To get rid of this difficulty, Augustin, in some degree, transferred the search for the origin of sin from the state of man to the purposes of God; asserting, that from all eternity the Almighty had determined to choose from the mass of mankind, lost in guilt and corruption, a certain number to be transformed to holiness, and to be admitted after this life to eternal happiness; that he did this to promote his own glory; and that, by the operation of his Spirit, granted of his own free and undeserved mercy, he produced in the elect, or chosen, the fruits of righteousness, and qualified them for the enjoyment of heaven. The whole of the remainder of the human race were, according to this system, left in their condition by nature, or, in other words, were given up to endless misery. There immediately arose out of this view of the subject the formidable and heart-rending objection, that God was really the author of sin; that, having so created mankind that of themselves they could not be holy, there was on the part of those delivered no virtue, as there was on the other part no blame; the case being quite different from what it would have been had God interposed with respect to creatures who had not received from himself their physical and moral constitution. Accordingly, it has been asserted that a sect did arise which, carrying out, as the members of it affirmed, the principles of Augustin, maintained that God not only predestinated the wicked to eternal punishment, but also to the guilt and transgression for which they were punished; that the human race was thus wholly passive, the good and bad actions of men, or what were commonly termed such, being determined from all eternity by a Divine decree, or fixed by hopeless, irresistible necessity. These opinions it is said that the venerable and enlightened Bishop of Hippo zealously opposed, laboring to show that they were not fairly deduced from what he had taught—making a distinction probably between his account of free will, and the necessity here confounded with it, and perhaps reluctant to push his tenets so far as apparently they might be carried. The fact is, that although the doctrine of absolute predestination is occasionally clearly taught by Augustin, and obviously follows from his other principles, yet he does not always write consistently with regard to it; or, at least, there is sometimes so much vagueness in his assertions and illustrations, that his authority has been claimed in support of their peculiar tenets both by the Jansenists and the Jesuits, opposite to each other as the sentiments of these two orders are upon the subject of which we are treating. Still, it is beyond a question that this celebrated theologian did fix the attention of the Church upon that subject much more closely than before his age had been the case, and gave rise to those discussions in relation to it which have so often agitated Christians, and tended much more to destroy the mild and tolerant spirit of the gospel, than to throw light upon its momentous truths. The subject of predestination, however, was long regarded as one which it was not esteemed requisite absolutely to define, and which might be very much left open to speculation; for although in different countries decrees were passed, guarding against what were viewed as errors resulting from it, it is plain, from what took place upon the revival of the controversy in an after-age, that there had not been formed any standard to which ecclesiastical authority required that all who were esteemed orthodox should strictly conform. See AUGUSTIN.

In the ninth century, Godeschalchus, a man of illustrious birth, who had, contrary to his inclinations, been devoted by his parents to a monastic life, and who had, with unwearied diligence, studied the science of theology, inflamed by an unhappy desire to unravel all the difficulties with which that science abounds, occupied his mind with the consideration of the question of predestination, and finally adopted, with regard to it, the doctrine of Augustin. Not satisfied with having convinced himself, he conceived it to be his duty to labor for the conviction of others; and he accordingly openly and zealously inculcated that the elect were predestinated to life, and the rest of mankind to everlasting misery. Rabanus, Archbishop of Mentz, who had for some reason before this been inspired with enmity to Godeschalchus, having been informed of the tenets which he was publishing, and, as has too often been the case, veiling private antipathy under the cloak of anxiety for the purity of Divine truth, opposed him with the utmost vehemence; and, having assembled a council in his own metropolitan city, procured the condemnation of the views which he reprobated. The matter was afterward taken up by Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, who was the zealous friend of Rabanus; and he also having procured the meeting of a council, confirmed the sentence, that had been already passed. Not satisfied with this, he degraded Godeschalchus from the priesthood, and, with an inhumanity infinitely more detestable than heresy, he put the unfortunate monk to the torture. The fortitude of Godeschalchus was for a moment overpowered, and he consented to commit to the flames a justification of his opinions which he had presented to his execrable tormentors. It was not to be supposed that by atrocious violence like this, sincere conviction could be produced in the person against whom it was directed, or that others would be disposed universally to submit to it. The controversy, accordingly, soon was renewed: writers on both sides of the question contended with the utmost warmth, and eagerly displayed the extent of their erudition. New councils were summoned, by which the decrees of former councils were reversed, and the tenets of Godeschalchus were confirmed; and the whole agitation terminated by leaving the subject in the same undefined state, on the part of the Church, in which it had been before it was thus intemperately and cruelly discussed.

To the schoolmen, who delighted much more in losing themselves amidst inextricable difficulties and endless distinctions, than in opening the sources of knowledge and removing the difficulties with which these were surrounded, this subject, from its intricate or inexplicable nature, was admirably adapted; and they did not fail to exercise upon it their diligence and their ingenuity. Thomas Aquinas, who flourished during the thirteenth century, was a man who in more enlightened times would have really merited the high reputation which he enjoyed, and which procured for him from his contemporaries the appellation of the Angelic Doctor. He was capable of vast mental exertion, and, amidst all his avocations, produced works so voluminous that, in modern days, even students would shrink from the perusal of them as an overwhelming task. He wrote largely upon the nature of grace, and predestination, so intimately connected with it. His opinions upon these subjects were nearly the same with those of Augustin; and so much, indeed, was he conceived to resemble in genius and understanding that distinguished prelate, that it was asserted the soul of Augustin had been sent into the body of Aquinas. He taught that God had, from all eternity, and without any regard to their works, predestinated a certain number to life and happiness; but he found great delight in endeavoring to reconcile this position with the freedom of the human will. His celebrated antagonist, John Duns Scotus, an inhabitant of Britain, surnamed, from the acuteness and bent of his mind, the Subtile Doctor, also directed his attention, in the subsequent century, to the same thorny speculations, taking a different view of them from Aquinas; and we find in the works of these two brilliant lights of the schoolmen all that the most learned in the dark ages thought upon them.

It is unnecessary to trace the various shades of opinion which existed in the Church as to predestination from this era till the Reformation: it is enough to remark, that after all which had been written upon it, it does not appear that any peculiar sentiments with respect to it were, by the reformers, judged essential to orthodoxy. It was more wisely considered that, upon a point involved in impenetrable difficulties, and raised far above human comprehension, men might be allowed to differ, while their attachment to the best interests of pure religion could not be called in question. See CALVINISM and LUTHERANS.

The seventeenth article of the Church of England is often adduced by Calvinists as favorable to their peculiar views of absolute predestination; but such a representation of it is rendered plausible only by adding to its various clauses qualifying expressions to suit that purpose. Under the articles CHURCH OF ENGLAND, CONFESSIONS, and CALVINISM, have been exhibited the just and liberal views of Cranmer and the principal English reformers on this subject; the sources from which they drew the articles of religion and the public formularies of devotion; and some of the futile attempts of the high predestinarians in the Church to inoculate the public creed with their dogmas. Cartwright and his followers, in their second "Admonition to the Parliament" in 1572, complained that the articles speak dangerously of "falling from grace;" and in 1587 they preferred a similar complaint. The labors of the Westminster Assembly at a subsequent period, and their abortive result, in relation to this subject, are well known. Long before Arminius had turned his thoughts to the consideration of general redemption, a great number of the English clergy had publicly taught and defended the same doctrine. It was about 1571 when Dr. Peter Baroe, "a zealous Anti-Calvinian," as one of our Church historians observes, was made Margaret Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge; and "he went on teaching in his lectures, preaching in his sermons, determining in the schools, and printing in several books, divers points contrary to Calvinism. And this he did for several years, without any manner of disturbance or interruption. The heads of the university, in a letter to the Lord Burleigh, dated March 8, 1595, say he had done it for fourteen or fifteen years preceding, and they might have said twenty; for he printed some of his lectures in 1574, and the prosecution he was at last under, which will be considered hereafter, was not till 1595. In 1584, Mr. Harsnet, afterward Archbishop of York, preached against absolute reprobation at St. Paul's Cross, the greatest audience then in the kingdom; as did the judicious Mr. Hooker at the Temple in the year following. In the year 1594, Mr. Barret preached at St. Mary's in Cambridge against Calvinism, with very smart reflections upon Calvin himself, Beza, Zanchy, and several others of the most noted writers in that scheme. In the same year, Dr. Baroe preached at the same place to the same purpose. By this time Calvinism had gained considerable ground, being much promoted by the learned Whitaker and Mr. Perkins; and several of the heads of the university being in that scheme, they complained of the two sermons above mentioned to the Lord Burleigh, their chancellor. Their heads endeavored to bring Barret to a retraction, to which whether he ever submitted according to the form they drew up, may reasonably be doubted. At length the matter was laid before Archbishop Whitgift, who was offended at their proceedings, and writes to the Lord Burleigh, that some of the points which the heads had enjoined Barret to retract were such as the most learned Protestants, then living, varied in judgment upon; and that the most ancient and best divines in the land were in the chiefest points in opinion against the heads and their resolutions. Another letter he sent to the heads themselves, telling them that they had enjoined Barret to affirm that which was contrary to the doctrine holden and expressed by many sound and learned divines in the Church of England, and in other Churches likewise men of best account; and that which for his own part he thought to be false and contrary to the Scriptures; for the Scriptures are plain, that God by his absolute will did not hate and reject any man. There might be impiety in believing the one, there could be none in believing the other; neither was it contrary to any article of religion established by authority in this Church of England, but rather agreeable thereto. This testimony of the archbishop is very remarkable; and though he afterward countenanced the Lambeth articles, that is of little or no weight in the case. The question is not about any man's private opinion, but about the doctrine of the Church; and supposing the archbishop to be a Calvinist, as he seems to have been at least in some points, this only adds the greater weight to his testimony, that our Church has nowhere declared in favor of that scheme. The archbishop descended to the particulars charged against Barret, asking the heads what article of the Church was contradicted by this or that notion of his; and Whitaker in his reply does not appeal to one of the articles, as against Barret, but forms his plea upon the doctrines which then generally obtained in pulpits. His words are, 'We are fully persuaded that Mr. Barret hath taught untruth, if not against the articles, yet against the religion, of our Church, publicly received, and always held in her Majesty's reign, and maintained in all sermons, disputations, and lectures.' And even this pretence of his, weak as it would have been though true, is utterly false, directly contrary, not only to what has been already shown to be the facts of the case, but also to what the archbishop affirmed, and that, too, as must be supposed, upon his own knowledge. As to Dr. Baroe, he met with many friends, who espoused his cause. Mr. Strype particularly mentions four, Mr. Overal, Dr. Clayton, Mr. Harsnet, Dr. Andrews; all of them great and learned men, men of renown, and famous in their generation. How many more there were, nobody can tell. The heads in their letter to the Lord Burleigh do not pretend that the preaching against Calvinism gave a general offence, but that it offended many; which implies that there were many others on the opposite side; and they expressly say there were divers in the Anti-Calvinian scheme, whom they represent as maintaining it with great boldness. But what put a stop to this prosecution against Baroe was, a reprimand from their chancellor, the Lord Burleigh, who wrote to the heads, that as good and as ancient were of another judgment, and that they might punish him, but it would be for well-doing."

But Dr. Whitaker, Regius Professor of Divinity in Cambridge, could not endure the further prevalence of the doctrines of general redemption in that university; he therefore, in 1595, drew up nine affirmations, elucidatory of his views of predestination, and obtained for them the sanction of several Calvinian heads of houses, with whom he repaired to Archbishop Whitgift. Having heard their ex parte statement, his Grace summoned Bishops Flecher and Vaughan, and Dr. Tyndal, Dean of Ely, to meet Dr. Whitaker and the Cambridge deputation at his palace in Lambeth, on the tenth of November, 1595; where, after much polishing and altering, they produced Whitaker's affirmation in the following form, called the "Lambeth Articles," from the place in which their secret sittings had been held:—"1. God from eternity hath predestinated certain men unto life; certain men he hath reprobated. 2. The moving or efficient cause of predestination unto life is not the foresight of faith or of perseverance, or of good works, or of any thing that is in the person predestinated; but it is only the good will and pleasure of God. 3. A certain number of the predestinate is pre-determined, which can neither be augmented nor diminished. 4. Those who are not predestinated to salvation shall be necessarily damned for their sins. 5. A true, living, and justifying faith, and the Spirit of God justifying, is not extinguished, doth not fall off, or vanish away, in the elect, either totally or finally. 6. A man who is a true believer, that is, one who is endued with a justifying faith, is assured with a plerophory, or firm persuasion, of faith concerning the remission of his sins, and his eternal salvation through Christ. 7. Saving grace is neither given, communicated, nor granted to all men, by which they can be saved if they will. 8. No one is able to come unto Christ unless it shall be given unto him, and unless the Father shall draw him; and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come unto the Son. 9. It is not placed in the choice, will, or capacity of every one to be saved." Dr. Whitaker died a few days after his return from Lambeth, with the nine articles to which he had procured the patronage of the primate. After his demise, two competitors appeared for the vacant King's Professorship—Dr. Wotton, of King's College, a professed Calvinian, and Dr. Overal, of Trinity College, "almost as far," says Heylin, "from the Calvinian doctrine in the main platform of predestination as Baroe, Harsnet, or Barret are conceived to be. But when it came to the vote of the university, the place was carried for Overal by the major part; which plainly shows, that though the doctrines of Calvin were so hotly stickled here by most of the heads, yet the greater part of the learned body entertained them not." "The Lambeth articles," it is well observed, "are no part of the doctrine of the Church of England, having never had any the least sanction either from the parliament or the convocation. They were drawn up by Professor Whitaker; and though they were afterward approved by Archbishop Whitgift, and six or eight of the inferior clergy, in a meeting they had at Lambeth, yet this meeting was only in a private manner, and without any authority from the queen; who was so far from approving of their proceedings, that she not only ordered the articles to be suppressed, but was resolutely bent for some time to bring the archbishop and his associates under a premunire, for presuming to make them without any warrant or legal authority." Such, in brief, was the origin and such the fate of the Lambeth articles, without the countenance of which the defenders of Calvinism in the Church of England could find no semblance of support for their manifold affirmations on predestination and its kindred topics. These articles afford another instructive instance of the extreme ignorance of the real sentiments of their opponents which often betrays itself in the conduct of many eminent men, when they rashly begin to fence off the reputed heterodoxy of their brethren from the sacred precincts of their own orthodoxy. Two of the ablest and most consistent Arminians of the old English school, Baroe and Plaifere, have lucidly shown how every one of these nine assertions may, without difficulty, be interpreted in accordance with their individual belief. Baroe's clever dissertation on this subject will be found in Strype's "Life of Whitgift;" and that of Plaifere, in his own unanswerable "Apello Evangelium."

PRE-EXISTENCE-OF JESUS CHRIST is his existence before he was born of the Virgin Mary. That he really did exist, is plain from John iii. 13; vi. 50, etc.; viii. 58; xvii. 5, 24: 1 John i. 2; but there are various opinions respecting this existence. Some, acknowledging, with the orthodox, that in Jesus Christ there is a Divine nature, a rational soul, and a human body, go into an opinion peculiar to themselves. His body was formed in the virgin's womb; but his human soul, they suppose, was the first and most excellent of all the works of God; was brought into existence before the creation of the world, and subsisted in happy union in heaven with the second person of the Godhead, till his incarnation. These divines differ from those called Arians, for the latter ascribe to Christ only a created deity, whereas the former hold his true and proper divinity. They differ from the Socinians, who believe no existence of Jesus Christ before his incarnation; they differ from the Sabellians, who only own a trinity of names: they differ also from the generally received opinion, which is, that Christ's human soul began to exist in the womb of his mother, in exact conformity to that likeness unto his brethren of which St. Paul speaks, Heb. ii. 17. The writers in favor of the preëxistence of Christ's human soul recommend their opinion by these arguments: 1. Christ is represented as his Father's messenger, or angel, being distinct from his Father, sent by his Father, long before his incarnation, to perform actions which seem to be too low for the dignity of pure Godhead. The appearances of Christ to the patriarchs are described like the appearance of an angel, or man really distinct from God; yet one in whom God, or Jehovah, had a peculiar indwelling, or with whom the Divine nature had a personal union. 2. Christ, when he came into the world, is said, in several passages of Scripture, to have divested himself of some glory which he had before his incarnation. Now if there had existed before this time nothing but his Divine nature, this Divine nature, it is argued, could not properly have divested itself of any glory. John xvii. 4, 5: 2 Cor. viii. 9. It cannot be said of God that he became poor: he is infinitely self-sufficient; he is necessarily and eternally rich in perfections and glories. Nor can it be said of Christ, as man, that he was rich, if he were never in a richer state before than while he was on earth. 3. It seems needful, say those who embrace this opinion, that the soul of Jesus Christ should preëxist, that it might have an opportunity to give its previous actual consent to the great and painful undertaking of making atonement for our sins. On the other side it is affirmed that the doctrine of the preëxistence of the human soul of Christ weakens and subverts that of his Divine personality. 1. A pure intelligent spirit, the first, the most ancient, and the most excellent of creatures, created before the foundation of the world, so exactly resembles the second person of the Arian trinity, that it is impossible to show the least difference except in name. 2. This preëxistent intelligence, supposed in this doctrine, is so confounded with those other intelligences called angels, that there is great danger of mistaking this human soul for an angel, and so of making the person of Christ to consist of three natures. 3. If Jesus Christ had nothing in common with the rest of mankind except a body, how could this semi-conformity make him a real man? 4. The passages quoted in proof of the preëxistence of the human soul of Jesus Christ, are of the same sort with those which others allege in proof of the preëxistence of all human souls. 5. This opinion, by ascribing the dignity of the work of redemption to this sublime human soul, detracts from the deity of Christ, and renders the last as passive as the first is active. 6. This notion is contrary to the Scripture. St. Paul says, "In all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren," Heb. ii. 17: he partook of all our infirmities, except sin. St. Luke says, "He increased in stature and wisdom." Luke ii. 52. Upon the whole, this scheme, adopted to relieve the difficulties which must always surround mysteries so great, only creates new ones. This is the usual fate of similar speculations, and shows the wisdom of resting in the plain interpretation of the word of God.

[PRELATE. In the Church of England, a bishop: in the Church of Rome, a bishop or abbot.]

[PREMONSTRANTS. An order of canons, instituted in 1120, by Norbert; hence called Norbertines. He built his first monastery in the Isle of France, and called it Premontre. The canons followed the rule of Augustin, with some variations. They wore a white habit, with a scapulary before the cassock—a white hat out of doors—within, a little camail. They went to England in 1146, built a monastery in Lincolnshire, and dedicated it to St. Martial.]

[PRESBYTERA. This word in its various forms means either the wife of a presbyter, or a kind of deaconess, whose duties included catechetical instruction, and a kind of superintendence or government. Some identify the πρεσβυτιδες, with the "widows" in 1 Tim. v., and "the aged women" in Titus ii. 3, 4. See DEACON and EPISCOPÆ.]

[PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. This is one of the oldest ecclesiastical organizations in this country. In 1699, some Dissenters in London sent over two ministers, Francis McKemie, of the north of Ireland, and John Hampton, of Scotland, who settled on the eastern shore of Virginia. In 1703, the first Presbyterian church in the colonies, having a house of worship, was organized in Philadelphia; and in 1705, the first presbytery, composed of seven ministers, and representing about the same number of churches, was organized in that city. In 1716, the presbyteries of Newcastle, Snow Hill, and Long Island, were organized, making four presbyteries, which met together as a synod. In 1729, the synod adopted the Westminster Confession and Catechisms. In the great revival which took place under Mr. Whitefield and others, a party was formed called "New Lights," who organized, in 1745, a new synod, called "The Synod of New York." The secession was not unlike that which took place in Kentucky and Tennessee, in the early part of the present century, though it did not proceed so far or become so permanent as the latter. (See CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS.) In 1758, the new synod united with the old synod, under the title of "The Synod of New York and Philadelphia." In 1787, it was divided into four synods, viz.: those of New York and New Jersey, Philadelphia, Virginia, and that of the Carolinas; and measures were adopted for the organization of the General Assembly. The synod of 1729, in adopting the Westminster Confession, expressly excepted those clauses which recognize the magistrate's controlling power over synods, and the right of persecution; and in 1787 it appointed a committee to revise the Confession, and to expunge the offensive passages. In 1789, the General Assembly held its first session in Philadelphia, Dr. Rodgers being the moderator. In 1801, the Assembly, and the General Association of Connecticut, adopted "The Plan of Union between Presbyterians and Congregationalists in the new settlements." In process of time controversies arose concerning the best means of carrying on the educational, missionary, and other interests of the Church; those who sympathized most with the Congregationalists being in favor of voluntary societies, and the rest preferring ecclesiastical boards. Some of the former party, too, began to broach certain points of doctrine which the "Old School" stigmatized as Arminian and Pelagian: Arminian they certainly are not, whatever affinity they might have with Pelagianism. The differences and alienations became so great, that in 1837 the General Assembly abolished "The Plan of Union," and declared that no Congregational church should be represented in any Presbyterian judicatory, and no presbytery or synod composed of Presbyterians and Congregationalists should be considered a constituent portion of the Presbyterian Church. Upon this, the "New School" men held a convention at Auburn, New York, and resolved to abide by the Union despite the action of the Assembly. In 1838, their delegates attended the Assembly, but as their claim to seats "was not immediately granted, though it was not refused," they rose, nominated a moderator, declared themselves the true General Assembly, and left the house. They then brought a suit before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania to decide which was the true Assembly. The decision was in their favor; but when the cause was taken before the "court in banc," that decision was reversed, and the Old School Assembly has continued to retain the succession. The New School Assembly was for a while held triennially, but it now meets annually, like the Old School. Many of the New School also prefer ecclesiastical boards to voluntary societies. Both branches are zealous in the cause of missions and education, in the promotion of which they are second to no other ecclesiastical body in the United States. Though the division did not take place on sectional grounds, yet the Old School is more numerous than the New School in the Southern States. The former is much larger than the latter, numbering, in 1856, 3146 churches, 2320 ministers, 233,755 members; whereas the New School numbered only 1602 churches, 1527 ministers, 138,760 members. See "Religion in America," by Dr. R. Baird; and "Constitution of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, containing the Confession of Faith," etc.]

PRESBYTERIANS are those that affirm there is no order in the Church, as established by Christ and his apostles, superior to that of presbyters; that all ministers, being ambassadors, are equal by their commission; and that elder, or presbyter, and bishop, are the same in name and office, and the terms synonymous. Their arguments against the Episcopalians are as follows:—With respect to the successors of the apostles, they seem to have been placed on a footing of perfect equality, the διάκονοι, or deacons, not being included among the teachers. They were inferior officers, whose province it originally was to care for the poor, and to discharge those secular duties arising out of the formation of Christian communities, which could not be discharged by the ministers without interfering with the much higher duties which they had to perform. These ministers are sometimes in the New Testament styled πρεσβύτεροι, or presbyters, at other times ἐπίσκοποι, or bishops; but the two appellations were indiscriminately applied to all the pastors who were the instructors of the different churches. Of this various examples may be given from the sacred writings. The Apostle Paul, upon a very affecting occasion, when he was convinced that he could never again have an opportunity of addressing them, sent for the elders or presbyters of Ephesus, the persons to whom the ministry in that church had been committed; and after mentioning all that he had done, and intimating to them the sufferings which awaited him, he addressed to them what may be considered as his dying advice, and as comprehending in it all that he judged it most essential for them to do: "Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops, or overseers, to feed the Church of God." Acts xx. 17, 28. Here they whose duty it was to feed the Church of God, as having been set apart through the Holy Spirit for that interesting work, are termed by the apostle presbyters and bishops, and there is not the slightest allusion to the existence of any other ἐπίσκοπος, or bishop, superior to those ἐπίσκοποι, or bishops, to whom he gives the moving charge now recorded. In his Epistle to Titus, St. Paul thus writes: "For this purpose I left thee in Crete," where, as yet, it is probable that no teachers had been appointed, "that thou shouldest ordain elders, or presbyters, in every city." He then points out the class of men from which the presbyters were to be selected, adding, as the reason of this, "For a bishop must be blameless as the steward of God." Titus i. 5, 7. It is quite plain that the epithet bishop is here applicable to the same persons who were a little before styled elders, and both are declared to be the stewards of God, the guardians and instructors of his Church. The Apostle Peter, in his first Epistle addressed to the Jewish converts, has these words: "The elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, ὁ συνπρεσβύτερος, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ: feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight of it, ἐπισκοποῦντες, being bishops of it, not by constraint, but willingly." 1 Peter v. 1, 2. This passage is a very strong one. The apostle speaks of himself in his extraordinary capacity, a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and in his ordinary capacity as a teacher; showing, by the use of a very significant term, that as to it he was on a footing of equality with the other pastors or presbyters. He gives it in charge to them to feed the flock of God; the charge which, under most particular and affecting circumstances, he had received from the Lord after the resurrection, and which includes in it the performance of every thing requisite for the comfort and the edification of Christians; and he accordingly expresses this by the word ἐπισκοποῦντες, being bishops over them. It cannot, with any shadow of reason, be supposed that the apostle would exhort the elders or presbyters to take to themselves the office, and to perform the duties, of a bishop, if that term really marked out a distinct and higher order; or that he would have considered the presbyters as fitted for the discharge of the whole ministerial office, if there were parts of that office which he knew that it was not lawful for them to exercise.

It seems, by the passages that have been quoted, to be placed beyond a doubt, that, in what the apostles said respecting the ministers of Christ's religion, they taught that the ἐπίσκοποι and the πρεσβύτεροι were the same class of instructors; and that there were, in fact, only two orders pointed out by them, bishops or presbyters, and deacons. This being the case, even although it should appear that there were bishops, in the common sense of that term, recognized in the apostolic age, all that could be deduced from the fact would be, that the equality at first instituted among the teachers had, for prudential reasons, or under peculiar circumstances, been interrupted; but it would not follow either that the positive and general declarations on the subject by the inspired writers were not true, or that it was incumbent at all times, and upon all Christians, to disregard them. It has been strenuously contended that there were such bishops in the infancy of the Church, and that allusion is made to them in Scripture; but without directly opposing the assertion, this much must be admitted, that the proof of it is less clear than that bishops and presbyters were represented as the same in rank and in authority. Indeed, there does not appear to have been any occasion for this higher order. To presbyters was actually committed the most important charge of feeding the Church of God, that is, of promoting the spiritual improvement of mankind; and it is remarkable that their privilege of separating from the people by ordination the ministers of religion, is explicitly acknowledged in the case of Timothy, whom the apostle admonishes not to neglect the gift that was in him, and which had been given by prophecy, and by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery; by which can be meant only the laying on of the hands of those who were denominated presbyters or bishops. But although all the parts of the ministerial duty had been intrusted to presbyters, it is still contended that the New Testament indicates the existence of bishops as a higher order. There has, however, been much diversity of opinion in relation to this point by those who contend for the Divine institution of episcopacy. Some of them maintain that the apostles, while they lived, were the bishops of the Christian Church; but this, and upon irrefragable grounds, is denied by others. Some urge that Timothy and Titus were, in what they call the true sense of the term, bishops; but many deny that, founding their denial upon these evangelists not having resided within the bounds or been limited to the administration of any one church, being sent wherever it was resolved to bring men to the knowledge of Divine truth. Many conceive that the question is settled by the epistles in the book of Revelation being addressed to the angels of the respective churches named by the apostle. But it is far from being obvious what is implied under the appellation angel; there has been much dispute about this point, and it is certainly a deviation from all the usual rules by which we are guided in interpreting Scripture, to bring an obscure and doubtful passage in illustration of one about the import of which, if we attend to the language used, there can be no doubt. It may, therefore, be safely affirmed that there is nothing clear and specific in the writings of the New Testament which qualifies the positive declarations that bishops and presbyters were the same officers; that the ground upon which the distinction between them is placed is, at least, far from obviously supporting it; and that there is not the slightest intimation that the observance of such a distinction is at all important, much less absolutely essential to a true Christian Church, inasmuch that, where it is disregarded, the ordinances of Divine appointment cannot be properly dispensed. If, therefore, it be established—and some of the most learned and zealous advocates for the hierarchy which afterward arose have been compelled to admit it—that Scripture has not recognized any difference of rank or order between the ordinary teachers of the gospel, all other means of maintaining this difference should be with Protestants of no force. It may be shown that the admission of the distinction is not incompatible with the great ends for which a ministry was appointed, and even in particular cases may tend to promote them; but still it is merely a matter of human regulation, not binding upon Christians, and not in any way connected with the vital influence of the gospel dispensation. The whole of the writers of antiquity may be urged in support of it, if that could be done; and, after all, every private Christian would be entitled to judge for himself, and to be directed by his own judgment, unless it be maintained that where Scripture has affirmed the existence of equality, this is to be counteracted and set at naught by the testimonies and assertions of a set of writers who, although honored with the name of fathers, are very far indeed from being infallible, and who have, in fact, often delivered sentiments which even they who, upon a particular emergency, cling to them, must confess to be directly at variance with all that is sound in reason, or venerable and sublime in religion. It also follows, from the scriptural identity of bishops and presbyters, that no Church in which this identity is preserved can on that account be considered as having departed from the apostolic model, or its ministers be viewed, at least with any good reason, as having less ground to hope for the blessing of God upon their spiritual labors; because, if we admit the contrary, we must also admit that the inspired writers, instead of properly regulating the Church, betrayed it into error, by omitting to make a distinction closely allied with the essence of religion. What is this but to say that it is safer to follow the erring direction of frail mortals, than to follow the admonitions of those who, it is universally allowed, were inspired by the Holy Spirit, or commissioned by him to be the instructors of the world?

It is to be observed, however, that, although bishops and presbyters were the same when the Epistles of the New Testament were written, it would be going too far to contend that no departure from this should ever take place; because, to justify such a position, it would be requisite that a positive injunction should have been given that equality must at all times be carefully preserved. There is, however, no such injunction. Unlike the Old Testament, which specified every thing, even the most minute, in relation to the priesthood, the New only alludes in general terms, and very seldom, to the ministry; and the reason probably is, that, being intended for all nations, it left Christians at liberty to make such modifications in the ecclesiastical constitution as in their peculiar situation appeared best adapted for religious edification. The simple test to be applied to the varying or varied forms of Church government is that indicated by our Lord himself: "By their fruits ye shall know them." Wherever the regulations respecting the ministry are such as to divert it from the purposes for which it was destined, to separate those who form it from the flock of Christ, to relax their diligence in teaching, and to destroy the connection between them and their people, so as to render their exertions of little or of no use, there we find a Church not apostolical. But wherever the blessed fruits of gospel teaching are in abundance produced, where the people and the ministers are cordially united, and where every regulation is calculated to give efficacy to the labors of those who have entered into the vineyard, we have an apostolical Church, or, to speak more properly, a Church of Christ, built upon a rock, because devoted to the beneficent objects for which our Saviour came into the world.

The form of Church government among the Scotch Presbyterians is as follows:—The kirk session, consisting of the minister and lay elders of the congregation, is the lowest ecclesiastical judicature. The next is the presbytery, which consists of all the pastors within a certain district, and one ruling elder from each parish. The provincial synods, of which there are fifteen, meet twice in the year, and are composed of the members of the several presbyteries within the respective provinces. From the kirk sessions appeal lies to the presbyteries, from these to the synods, and from them to the General Assembly, which meets annually, and is the highest ecclesiastical authority in the kingdom. This is composed of delegates from each presbytery, from every royal borough, and from each of the Scotch universities, and the king presides by a commission of his own appointment. The Scotch ordain by the “laying on of the hands of the presbytery,” before which persons may be licensed to preach as probationers, but cannot administer the sacraments. The clergy are maintained by the state, and nominated to livings by patrons, as in other establishments. Those properly called the English Presbyterians have no connection with the Scotch kirk. They are now, indeed, broken into separate Churches, and follow the same form of Church government as the Congregationalists or Independents. The name Presbyterian, therefore, is now inapplicable to them, although retained. So Dr. Doddridge: “Those who hold every pastor to be so a bishop or overseer of his own congregation, as that no other person or body of men have, by Divine institution, a power to exercise any superior or pastoral office in it, may, properly speaking, be called, so far at least, Congregational; and it is by a vulgar mistake that any such are called Presbyterians.” See EPISCOPALIANS.

[There have been several secessions from the Scotch kirk, a notice of which will be found under the words CAMERONIANS, COVENANTERS, REFORMED PRESBYTERIANS, RELIEF SYNOD, SCOTLAND, FREE CHURCH OF, SECEDERS, and UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. There are some half a million of Presbyterians in Ireland, principally in Ulster and Leinster. In England the National Kirk of Scotland has three presbyteries: London, with five congregations; Liverpool and Manchester, with three; North of England, with eight: the United Presbyterian Church has five presbyteries, with sixty-two congregations; and seven presbyteries, with eighty-three congregations, formerly in union with the established kirk, are now distinct, like the Free Church of Scotland. The Westminster Assembly, convened in the reign of Charles I., declared in favor of the Presbyterian system, which accordingly held the ascendancy in England until the Restoration, when Episcopacy was reestablished. Being no longer supported by the state, Presbyterianism declined. In their revulsion from Calvinism, many of the Presbyterian churches became Arian and Socinian, which they continue to be to the present day; and some of them have embraced the peculiar views of the Baptists. Those churches on the continent of Europe called Reformed, in contradistinction to the Popish and Lutheran, are Presbyterian in their faith and polity, agreeably to the Helvetic, Gallic, Belgic, Heidelberg, and other confessions. Almost every type of European Presbyterianism has been reproduced in the United States, and also in Canada and other colonies. See PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, REFORMED CHURCH, DUTCH AND GERMAN, and the articles previously specified.]

[PRESBYTERY. Πρεσβυτέριον. A council of elders, whether Jewish, the Sanhedrim, Luke xxii. 66, Acts xxii. 5, or Christian, 1 Tim. iv. 14.]

PRESCIENCE, or foreknowledge, an attribute of God. (See OMNISCIENCE.) On this subject three leading theories have been resorted to, in order to evade the difficulties which are supposed to be involved in the opinion commonly received. The Chevalier Ramsay, among his other speculations, holds it a matter of choice in God to think of finite ideas; and similar opinions, though variously worded, have been occasionally adopted. In substance these opinions are, that though the knowledge of God be infinite as his power is infinite, there is no more reason to conclude that his knowledge should be always exerted to the full extent of its capacity, than that his power should be employed to the extent of his omnipotence; and that if we suppose him to choose not to know some contingencies, the infiniteness of his knowledge is not thereby impugned. To this it may be answered, that the infinite power of God is in Scripture represented, as in the nature of things it must be, as an infinite capacity. and not as infinite in act; but that the knowledge of God is, on the contrary, never represented there to us as a capacity to acquire knowledge, but as actually comprehending all things that are, and all things that can be. 2. That the notion of God's choosing to know some things, and not to know others, supposes a reason why he refuses to know any class of things or events, which reason, it would seem, can only arise out of their nature and circumstances, and therefore supposes at least a partial knowledge of them, from which the reason for his not choosing to know them arises. The doctrine is, therefore, somewhat contradictory. But, 3. It is fatal to this opinion, that it does not at all meet the difficulty arising out of the question of the consistency of Divine prescience, and the free actions of men; since some contingent actions, for which men have been made accountable, we are sure have been foreknown by God, because by his Spirit in the prophets they were foretold; and if the freedom of man can in these cases be reconciled to the prescience of God, there is no greater difficulty in any other case which can possibly occur.

A second theory is, that the foreknowledge of contingent events being in its own nature impossible, because it implies a contradiction, it does no dishonor to the Divine Being to affirm, that of such events he has, and can have, no prescience whatever; and thus the prescience of God as to moral actions being wholly denied, the difficulty in question is got rid of. To this the same answer must be given as to the former. It does not meet the case so long as the Scriptures are allowed to contain prophecies of rewardable and punishable actions. The great fallacy in the argument, that the certain prescience of a moral action destroys its contingent nature, lies in supposing that contingency and certainty are the opposites of each other. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that a word which is of figurative etymology, and which consequently can only have an ideal application to such subjects, should have grown into common use in this discussion; because it is more liable, on that account, to present itself to different minds under different shades of meaning. If, however, the term contingent in this controversy has any definite meaning at all, as applied to the moral actions of men, it must mean their freedom, and stands opposed, not to certainty, but to necessity. A free action is a voluntary one; and an action which results from the choice of the agent, is distinguished from a necessary one in this, that it might not have been or have been otherwise, according to the self-determining power of the agent. It is with reference to this specific quality of a free action that the term contingency is used: it might have been otherwise; in other words, it was not necessitated. Contingency in moral actions is, therefore, their freedom; and is opposed, not to certainty, but to constraint. The very nature of this controversy fixes this as the precise meaning of the term. The question is not, in point of fact, about the certainty of moral actions, that is, whether they will happen or not; but about the nature of them, whether free or constrained, whether they must happen or not. Those who advocate this theory care not about the certainty of actions, simply considered—that is, whether they will take place or not; the reason why they object to a certain prescience of moral actions is this: they conclude that such a prescience renders them necessary. It is the quality of the action for which they contend, not whether it will happen or not. If contingency meant uncertainty, the sense in which such theorists take it, the dispute would be at an end. But though an uncertain action cannot be foreseen as certain, a free, unnecessitated action may; for there is nothing in the knowledge of the action, in the least, to affect its nature. Simple knowledge is, in no sense, a cause of action; nor can it be conceived to be causal, unconnected with exerted power: for mere knowledge, therefore, an action remains free or necessitated as the case may be. A necessitated action is not made a voluntary one by its being foreknown; a free action is not made a necessary one. Free actions foreknown will not, therefore, cease to be contingent. But how stands the case as to their certainty? Precisely on the same ground. The certainty of a necessary action foreknown, does not result from the knowledge of the action, but from the operation of the necessitating cause; and, in like manner, the certainty of a free action does not result from the knowledge of it, which is no cause at all, but from the voluntary cause, that is, the determination of the will. It alters not the case in the least to say that the voluntary action might have been otherwise. Had it been otherwise, the knowledge of it would have been otherwise; but as the will which gives birth to the action is not dependent upon the previous knowledge of God, but the knowledge of the action upon foresight of the choice of the will, neither the will nor the act is controlled by the knowledge; and the action, though foreseen, is still free or contingent. The foreknowledge of God has then no influence upon either the freedom or the certainty of actions, for this plain reason, that it is knowledge, and not influence; and actions may be certainly foreknown without their being rendered necessary by that foreknowledge. But here it is said, "If the result of an absolute contingency be certainly foreknown, it can have no other result, it cannot happen otherwise." This is not the true inference. It will not happen otherwise. But it may be asked, Why can it not happen otherwise? Can is an expression of potentiality; it denotes power or possibility. The objection is, that it is not possible that the action should otherwise happen. But why not? What deprives it of that power? If a necessary action were in question, it could not otherwise happen than as the necessitating cause shall compel; but then that would arise from the necessitating cause solely, and not from the prescience of the action, which is not causal. But if the action be free, and it enter into the very nature of a voluntary action to be unconstrained, then it might have happened in a thousand other ways, or not have happened at all; the foreknowledge of it no more affects its nature in this case than in the other. All its potentiality, so to speak, still remains, independent of foreknowledge, which neither adds to its power of happening otherwise, nor diminishes it. But then we are told, that "the prescience of it, in that case, must be uncertain." Not unless any person can prove that the Divine prescience is unable to dart through all the workings of the human mind, all its comparison of things in the judgment, all the influences of motives on the affections, all the hesitations and haltings of the will, to its final choice. "Such knowledge is too wonderful for us," but it is the knowledge of Him "who understandeth the thoughts of man afar off." "But if a contingency will have a given result, to that result it must be determined." Not in the least. We have seen that it cannot be determined to a given result by mere precognition; for we have evidence in our own minds that mere knowledge is not causal to the actions of another. It is determined to its result by the will of the agent; but even in that case, it cannot be said that it must be determined to that result, because it is of the nature of freedom to be unconstrained: so that here we have an instance in the case of a free agent that he will act in some particular manner; but it by no means follows from what will be, whether foreseen or not, that it must be.

The third theory amounts, in brief, to this, that the foreknowledge of God must be supposed to differ so much from any thing of the kind which we perceive in ourselves, and from any ideas which we can possibly form of that property of the Divine nature, that no argument respecting it can be grounded upon our imperfect notions; and that all controversy on subjects connected with it is idle and fruitless. But though foreknowledge in God should be admitted to be something of a "very different nature" to the same quality in man, yet, as it is represented as something equivalent to foreknowledge, whatever that something may be, since, in consequence of it, prophecies have actually been uttered and fulfilled, and of such a kind, too, as relate to actions for which men have in fact been held accountable; all the original difficulty of reconciling contingent events to this something, of which human foreknowledge is a "kind of shadow," as "a map of China is to China itself," remains in full force. The difficulty is shifted, but not removed. It may, therefore, be certainly concluded, if at least the Holy Scriptures are to be our guide, that the omniscience of God comprehends his certain prescience of all events, however contingent; and if any thing more were necessary to strengthen the argument above given, it might be drawn from the irrational, and, above all, the unscriptural consequences which would follow from the denial of this doctrine. These are forcibly stated by President Edwards:—"It would follow from this notion, (namely, that the Almighty doth not foreknow what will be the result of future contingencies,) that as God is liable to be continually repenting what he has done, so he must be exposed to be constantly changing his mind and intentions as to his future conduct—altering his measures, relinquishing his old designs, and forming new schemes and projections. For his purposes, even as to the main parts of the scheme, namely, such as belong to the state of his moral kingdom, must be always liable to be broken, through want of foresight; and he must be continually putting his system to rights, as it gets out of order, through the contingency of the actions of moral agents; he must be a Being who, instead of being absolutely immutable, must necessarily be the subject of infinitely the most numerous acts of repentance, and changes of intention, of any being whatsoever; for this plain reason, that his vastly extensive charge comprehends an infinitely greater number of those things which are to him contingent and uncertain. In such a situation he must have little else to do but to mend broken links as well as he can, and be rectifying his disjointed frame and disordered movements, in the best manner the case will allow. The supreme Lord of all things must needs be under great and miserable disadvantages in governing the world which he has made and has the care of, through his being utterly unable to find out things of chief importance, which hereafter shall befall his system; which, if he did but know, he might make seasonable provision for. In many cases, there may be very great necessity that he should make provisions, in the manner of his ordering and disposing things, for some great events which are to happen, of vast and extensive influence, and endless consequence to the universe; which he may see afterward, when it is too late, and may wish in vain that he had known beforehand, that he might have ordered his affairs accordingly. And it is in the power of man, on these principles, by his devices, purposes, and actions, thus to disappoint God, break his measures, make him continually to change his mind, subject him to vexation, and bring him into confusion."

Socinus and his early followers would not allow that God possesses any knowledge of future contingencies. The schoolmen, in reference to this species of knowledge in God, invented that called scientia media, and which they "define as that by which God knows sub conditione what men or angels will do according to the liberty which they have, when they are placed in these or those circumstances, or in this or in that order of things." When Gomar, the opponent of Arminius, found that his opinion concerning the object of reprobation was clogged with this absurdity—that it made God to be the author of Adam's sin—he very astutely took refuge in this conditionate foreknowledge, and, in his corrected theses on predestination, published after the death of Arminius, he describes it as "that by which God, through the infinite light of his own knowledge, foreknows some future things, not absolutely, but as placed under a certain condition." Waleus, the celebrated antagonist of Episcopius, had recourse to the same expedient. This distinction has been adopted by very few of those who espouse the doctrines of general redemption; and who believe that every event, how contingent soever to the creature, is, with respect to God, certainly foreknown. An old English divine thinks, that "in the Sacred Scriptures certain not obscure vestiges are apparent of this kind of knowledge, of things that will happen thus or otherwise, on the supposition of the occurrence of this or that circumstance. Omitting the well-known example of David in Keilah, 1 Sam. xxii. 12, and of Chorazin and Bethsaida, Matt. xi. 21, Luke x. 13, consult, among other sayings of the same description, the answer of our Saviour to the chief priests and scribes, who had asked, 'Art thou the Christ? Tell us.' And he said unto them, 'If I tell you, ye will not believe.' In the subsequent verse he adds, 'If I also ask you, ye will not answer me, nor let me go.' Luke xxii. 67, 68. You have here three events specified, which yet will not occur even on the supposition of Christ our Lord himself." This kind of knowledge might very well be included in that of scientia visionis, because the latter ought to include, not what God will do, and what his creatures will do under his appointment, but what they will do by his permission as free agents, and what he will do, as a consequence of this, in his character of Governor and Lord. But since the predestinarians had confounded scientia visionis with a predestinating decree, the scientia media well expressed what they had left quite unaccounted for, and which they had assumed did not really exist—the actions of creatures endowed with free will, and the acts of Deity which from eternity were consequent upon them. If such actions do not take place, then men are not free; and if the rectoral acts of God are not consequent upon the actions of the creature in the order of the Divine intention, and the conduct of the creature is consequent upon the foreordained rectoral acts of God, then we reach a necessitating eternal decree, which, in fact, the predestinarian contends for; but it unfortunately brings after it consequences which no subtleties have ever been able to shake off—that the only actor in the universe is God himself; and that the only distinction among events is, that one class is brought to pass by God directly, and the other indirectly, not by the agency, but by the mere instrumentality, of his creatures.

[PRICKS. Acts xxvi. 14. Kéntra means goads used in driving cattle. To kick against the goads is to hurt one's self by impotent rage, like an unruly ox. Moses, Deut. xxxii. 15; Æschylus, Agam. 1620, Terence, Phormio, Act i., and other ancient writers, use the same figure.]

PRIEST, a general name for the minister of religion. The priest under the law was, among the Hebrews, a person consecrated and ordained of God to offer up sacrifices for his own sins and those of the people. Lev. iv. 5, 6. The priesthood was not annexed to a certain family till after the promulgation of the law of Moses. Before that time the first-born of every family, the fathers, the princes, the kings were priests. Cain and Abel, Noah, Abraham, Job, Abimelech and Laban, Isaac and Jacob, offered themselves their own sacrifices. In the solemnity of the covenant that the Lord made with his people at the foot of Mount Sinai, Moses performed the office of mediator, Exod. xxiv. 5, 6; and young men were chosen from among the children of Israel to perform the office of priests. But after the Lord had chosen the tribe of Levi to serve him in his tabernacle, and the priesthood was annexed to the family of Aaron, then the right of offering sacrifices to God was reserved to the priests alone of this family. The Lord ordained, Num. xvi. 40, that no stranger, which was not of the seed of Aaron, should come near to offer incense unto the Lord, that he might not be as Korah and his company. The punishment of Uzziah is well known, 2 Chron. xxvi. 19, who, having presumed to offer incense to the Lord, was suddenly smitten with a leprosy, put out of his palace, and excluded from the administration of affairs to the day of his death. However, it seems that, on certain occasions, the judges and the kings of the Hebrews offered sacrifices unto the Lord, especially before a constant place of worship was fixed at Jerusalem; for in 1 Sam. vii. 8, we are told that Samuel, who was no priest, offered a lamb for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord; and in 1 Sam. ix. 18, it is said that this prophet was to bless the offering of the people, which should seem to be a function appropriated to the priests; lastly, 1 Sam. xvi. 5, he goes to Bethlehem, where he offers a sacrifice at the inauguration or anointing of David. Saul himself offered a burnt-offering to the Lord, perhaps as being king of Israel. 1 Sam. xiii. 9, 10. Elijah also offered a burnt-offering upon Mount Carmel. 1 Kings xviii. 33. David himself sacrificed, (at least, the text expresses it so,) at the ceremony of bringing the ark to Jerusalem, and at the floor of Araunah. 2 Sam. vi. 13. Solomon went up to the brazen altar that was at Gibeon, and there offered sacrifices. 2 Chron. i. 5. It is true that the above passages are commonly explained by supposing that these princes offered their sacrifices by the hands of the priests; but the sacred text will by no means favor such explanations; and it is very natural to imagine, that in the quality of kings and heads of the people, they had the privilege of performing some sacerdotal functions, upon some extraordinary occasions: thus we see David clothed with the priestly ephod, and consulting the Lord; and upon another occasion we find David and Solomon pronounce solemn benedictions on the people. 2 Sam. vi. 18: 1 Kings viii. 55. God having reserved to himself the first-born of all Israel, because he had preserved them from the hand of the destroying angel in Egypt, by way of exchange or compensation accepted of the tribe of Levi for the service of the tabernacle. Num. iii. 41. Of the three sons of Levi, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, the Lord chose the family of Kohath, and out of this the house of Aaron, to exercise the functions of the priesthood. All the rest of the family of Kohath, even the children of Moses and their descendants, remained of the order of mere Levites. See LEVITES.

The posterity of the sons of Aaron, namely, Eleazar and Ithamar—Lev. x. 1-5: 1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 2—had so increased in number in the time of David, that they were divided into twenty-four classes, which officiated a week at a time alternately. Sixteen classes were of the family of Eleazar, and eight of the family of Ithamar. Each class obeyed its own prefect or ruler. The class Jofarib was the first in order, and the class Abia was the eighth. 1 Macc. ii. 1: Luke i. 5: 1 Chron. xxiv. 3-19. This division of the priesthood was continued as a permanent arrangement after the time of David. 2 Chron. viii. 14; xxxi. 2; xxxv. 4, 5. Indeed, although only four classes returned from the captivity, the distinction between them, and also the ancient names, were still retained. Ezra ii. 36-39: Neh. vii. 39-42; xii. 1.

Aaron, the high-priest, was set apart to his office by the same ceremonies with which his sons the priests were, with this exception, that the former was clothed in his robes, and the sacred oil was poured upon his head. Exod. xxix. 5-9: Lev. viii. 2. The other ceremonies were as follows: The priests, all of them with their bodies washed, and clad in their appropriate dress, assembled before the altar, where a bullock, two rams, unleavened bread, and wafers of two kinds in baskets, were in readiness. When they had placed their hands upon the head of the bullock, he was slain by Moses as a sin-offering. He touched the horns of the altar with the blood, poured the remainder of it round its base, and placed the parts which were to compose the sacrifice on its top. The remaining parts of the animal were all burned without the camp. Exod. xxix. 10-14: Lev. viii. 2, 3, 14-17. They in like manner placed their hands on the head of one of the rams, which was also slain by Moses for a whole burnt-offering, the blood was sprinkled around the altar, and the parts of the ram were separated and burned upon it. Exod. xxix. 15-18: Lev. viii. 18-21. The other ram, when the priests had laid their hands upon him, was likewise slain by Moses for the sacrifice of consecration. He touched with the blood the tip of the right ear of the priests, the thumb of the right hand, and the great toe of the right foot. The rest of the blood he sprinkled in part upon the bottom of the altar, and a part he mingled with the consecrated oil, and sprinkled on the priests and their garments. He anointed the high-priest by pouring a profusion of oil upon his head; whence he is called the anointed. Lev. v. 3, 5, 16; vi. 15: Psalm cxxiii. 2. Certain parts of the sacrifice, namely, the fat, the kidneys, the haunches, the caul above the liver, and the right shoulder, also one cake of unleavened bread, a cake of oiled bread, and a wafer, were placed by Moses upon the hands of the priests, that they might offer them to God. This ceremony was called "filling the hands"—expressions which, accordingly, in a number of passages, mean the same as consecrating. Exod. xxxii. 29: Levit. xvi. 32: 1 Chron. xxix. 5. All the parts which have been mentioned as being placed in the hands of the priests, were at last burned upon the altar. This ceremony, which continued for eight days, for ever separated the priests from all the other Israelites, not excepting the Levites; so that there was subsequently no need of any further consecration, neither for themselves nor their posterity. Exod. xxix. 35-37: Lev. x. 7: Rom. i. 1: Eph. iii. 3: Acts xiii. 2, 3. That the ceremonies of inauguration or consecration, however, were practiced at every new accession of a high-priest to his office, seems to be hinted in the following passages: Exod. xxix. 29: Lev. xvi. 32; xxi. 10: Num. xx. 26-28; xxxv. 25.

It was not customary for the priests to wear the sacerdotal dress except when performing their official duties. Exod. xxviii. 4, 43: Ezek. xlii. 14; xlv. 19. The description of the dress of the priests which is given in Exodus xxviii. is by some thought defective, as many things are passed in silence, apparently for the reason that they were at that time sufficiently well known, without being expressly stated. Some additional information is communicated to us by Josephus; but the dress of the priests, as he describes it, may have been in some respects of recent origin. It was as follows: 1. A sort of hose, made of cotton or linen, which was fastened round the loins, and extended down so as to cover the thighs. Lev. vi. 10: Ezek. xlv. 18. 2. A tunic of cotton which extended, in the days of Josephus, down to the ankles. It was furnished with sleeves, and was fabricated all of one piece without being sewed. Exod. xxviii. 39, 41; xxix. 5: John xix. 23. 3. The girdle. According to Josephus, it was a hand's-breadth in width, woven in such a manner as to exhibit the appearance of scales, and ornamented with embroidered flowers in purple, dark-blue, scarlet, and white. It was worn a little below the breast, encircled the body twice, and was tied in a knot before. The extremities of the girdle hung down nearly to the ankle. The priest, when engaged in his sacred functions, in order to prevent his being impeded by them, threw them over his left shoulder. Exod. xxxix. 27-29. 4. The mitre or turban was originally acuminate in its shape, was lofty, and was bound upon the head. Exod. xxviii. 8, 40; xxix.

9: Lev. viii. 13. In the time of Josephus the shape of the mitre had become somewhat altered; it was circular, was covered with a piece of fine linen, and sat so closely on the upper part of the head, (for it did not cover the whole of the head,) that it would not fall off when the body was bent down. The Hebrew priests, like those of Egypt and other nations, performed their sacred duties with naked feet; a symbol of reverence and veneration. Exod. iii. 5: Josh. v. 15.

The ordinary priests served immediately at the altar, offered sacrifices, killed and flayed them, and poured the blood at the foot of the altar. 2 Chron. xxix. 34; xxxv. 11. They kept a perpetual fire burning upon the altar of burnt-sacrifices, and in the lamps of the golden candlestick that was in the sanctuary; they prepared the loaves of show-bread, baked them, and changed them every Sabbath day. Every day, night and morning, a priest, appointed by casting lots at the beginning of the week, brought into the sanctuary a smoking censer, and set it upon the golden table, otherwise called the altar of perfumes. Luke i. 9. The priests were not suffered to offer incense to the Lord with strange fire, Lev. x. 1, 2; that is, with any other fire than what should be taken from the altar of burnt-sacrifices. It is well known with what severity God chastised Nadab and Abihu for having failed in this. Those that would dedicate themselves to perpetual service in the temple were well received, and were maintained by the constant and daily offerings. Deut. xviii. 6-8. The Lord had given no lands of inheritance to the tribe of Levi in the distribution of the land of promise. He designed that they should be supported by the tithes, the first-fruits, the offerings that were made in the temple, by their share of the sin-offerings and thanksgiving-offerings that were sacrificed in the temple, of which certain parts were appropriated to the priests. They had also a share in the wool when the sheep were shorn. All the first-born, both of man and beast, belonged to the Lord, that is, to his priests. The men were redeemed for the sum of five shekels. Num. xviii. 15, 16. The first-born of impure animals were redeemed or exchanged, but the clean animals were not redeemed; they were sacrificed to the Lord; their blood was sprinkled about the altar, and all the rest belonged to the priest. Num. xviii. 17-19. The first-fruits of trees, Lev. xix. 23, 24, that is, those that came on the fourth year, belonged also to the priest. They gave also to the priests and Levites an allowance out of the dough that they kneaded. They had the tithe of all the fruits of the land, and of all animals which were fed under the shepherd's crook. Lev. xxvii. 31, 32. God also provided them with houses and accommodations, by appointing them forty-eight cities for their habitations. Num. xxxv. 1-3. In the precincts of these cities they possessed as far as a thousand cubits beyond the walls. Of these forty-eight cities six were appointed to be cities of refuge, for the sake of those who should commit any casual or involuntary manslaughter; the priests had thirteen of these for their share, and all the others belonged to the Levites. Josh. xxi. 19. One of the chief employments of the priests, next to attending upon the sacrifices and the service of the tabernacle or temple, was the instruction of the people, and deciding controversies, distinguishing the several sorts of leprosy, the causes of divorce, the waters of jealousy, vows, all causes relating to the law, the uncleanness that were contracted several ways; all these things were brought before the priests. Hos. iv. 6: Mal. ii. 7, etc.: Lev. xiii. 14: Num. v. 14, 15. They publicly blessed the people in the name of the Lord. In time of war their business was to carry the ark of the covenant, to consult the Lord, to sound the holy trumpets, and encourage and harangue the army.

The term priest is most properly given to Christ, of whom the high-priests under the law were types and figures, he being the high-priest especially ordained of God, who, by the sacrifice of himself, and by his intercession, opens the way to reconciliation with God. Heb. viii. 17; ix. 11-25. The word is also applied to every true believer who is enabled to offer up himself "a spiritual sacrifice acceptable to God through Christ." 1 Pet. ii. 5: Rev. i. 6. But it is likewise improperly applied to Christian ministers, who have no sacrifices to offer; unless, indeed, when it is considered as contracted from presbyter, which signifies an elder, and is the name given in the New Testament to those who were appointed to the office of teaching and ruling in the Church of God. See AARON, [and Stratten's "Book of the Priesthood."]

[PRIMA. The first of the canonical hours—the matutina, or morning service.]

[PRIMATE. A metropolitan, archbishop, or ἡγάρχος. See METROPOLITAN.]

[PRIMER, KING'S. A book drawn up by Cuthbert Marshall, Archdeacon of Nottingham, and published by order of Henry VIII. It contained expositions of the Decalogue, Creed, and Lord's Prayer, with forms of devotion, and a caveat against the practice of offering latria to the saints. In the last edition, 1545, the Romish mode of uniting the first and second commandments and omitting the greater part of the second, was restored: in previous editions they were printed as in the Bible.]

[PRIOR. A conventual prior is an abbot: a claustral prior is the superior of a convent under an abbot. The alien priories in England belonged to foreign monasteries. Henry VI. endowed his foundations of Eton and Cambridge with some of their lands.]

PRISCILLA, a Christian woman, well known in the Acts, and in St. Paul's Epistles; sometimes placed before her husband Aquila. From Ephesus this pious pair went to Rome, where they were when St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, A. D. 58. He salutes them the first of all, with great commendations. Rom. xvi. 3. They returned into Asia some time afterward; and St. Paul, writing to Timothy, desires him to salute them on his behalf, 2 Tim. iv. 19, A. D. 65.

[PRISCILLIANISTS. Followers of Priscillian, a Spaniard of the fourth century, who is said to have promulgated a system compounded of Gnostic and Manichean errors. He and some of his adherents were put to death, and others were banished to Scilly. The sect, however, continued to exist till the sixth century.]

[PROCESSION. Processio anciently meant church-going. Afterward it designated the solemn train, or march, at a funeral, marriage, or celebration of the sacraments, or on some set occasion either of humiliation or thanksgiving. The first processions of this sort were at Constantinople. The Arians being forced to hold their meetings out of the city, repaired to them singing anthems. To prevent their perverting the Catholics, Chrysostom adopted counter-processions, in which the clergy and people marched by night, carrying crosses and torches. Processions have been kept up from that time, particularly in the Romish Church; and services, vestments, etc., have been appointed for them, according to their nature and design.]

[PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST. See FILOQUE and HOLY GHOST.]

[PROCLIANISTS. Followers of Proclus, a Phrygian philosopher, who, A. D. 194, propagated Montanism in Phrygia and at Rome.]

[PROCTOR. A contraction of procurator. In the English convocation, a clergyman who represents the clergy of a diocese. In the university, the proctors, as representatives of the Masters of Arts, maintain discipline: they are chosen out of the several colleges by turn. The pro-proctors are their deputies.]

[PRODICIANS. Followers of Prodicus, of the second century, who taught that neither the Sabbath nor any external worship was necessary for them, but only for those who were under the power of the Demiurge. They called themselves Adamites, professing to be perfect like our first parents before the fall. See ADAMITES.]

PROFANE, an epithet applied to those who abuse and condemn holy things. The Scripture calls Esau profane, because he sold his birthright, which was considered a holy thing, not only because the priesthood was annexed to it, but also because it was a privilege relating to Christ, and a type of the title of believers to the heavenly inheritance. Heb. xii. 16. The priests of the race of Aaron were enjoined to distinguish between sacred and profane, between pure and polluted. Lev. x. 10; xix. 7, 8. Hence they were prohibited the use of wine during their attendance on the temple service, that their spirits might not be discomposed by excitement. To profane the temple, to profane the Sabbath, to profane the altar, are common expressions to denote the violation of the rest of the Sabbath, the entering of foreigners into the temple, or the want of reverence in those that entered it, and the impious sacrifices that were offered on the altar of the Lord.

PROMISE, an assurance given by God, in his word, of bestowing blessings upon his people. 2 Pet. i. 4. The word in the New Testament is usually taken for the promises that God heretofore made to Abraham, and the other patriarchs, of sending the Messiah, and conferring his Holy Spirit and eternal life on those that should believe on him. It is in this sense that the Apostle Paul commonly uses the word promise. Rom. iv. 13, 14: Gal. iii. 14, 17, 18, 21, 22, 29. The promises of the new covenant are called better than those of the old, Heb. viii. 6, because they are more spiritual, clear, comprehensive, and universal than those of the Mosaic covenant. The time of the promise, Acts vii. 17, is the time of fulfilling the promise. The "children of the promise" are, 1. The Israelites descended from Isaac, in opposition to the Ishmaelites descended from Ishmael and Hagar. 2. The Jews converted to Christianity, in opposition to the obstinate Jews, who would not believe in Christ. 3. All true believers, who are born again by the supernatural power of God, and who by faith lay hold on the promise of salvation in Jesus Christ.

[PROPAGANDA. A society founded at Rome in 1622 by Pope Gregory XV. In 1627, Urban VIII. connected with it a seminary for the education of missionaries—other seminaries in various parts of the world have since been added. The Propaganda is well endowed; it has a printing-office which prints in nearly all languages, and a large library. It is governed by a Congregation of eighteen cardinals, and papal ministers and officers of the college. It is sustained by princely contributions and penny subscriptions, and its emissaries are very active, especially in Protestant countries.]

PROPHECY, the prediction of future events; it is especially understood of those predictions which are contained in the Holy Scriptures; all of which claim Divine inspiration, and by their wonderful fulfilment are proved to have proceeded from God, who only with certainty can know the future. Prophecy is one great branch of the external evidence of the truth of the Scriptures; and the nature and force of this kind of evidence may here be properly pointed out. No argument à priori against the possibility of prophecy can be attempted by any one who believes in the existence and infinitely perfect nature of God. The infidel author of "The Moral Philosopher," indeed, rather insinuates than attempts fully to establish a dilemma with which to perplex those who regard prophecy as one of the proofs of a Divine revelation. He thinks that either prophecy must respect events necessary, as depending upon necessary causes, which might be certainly foreknown and predicted; or that, if human actions are free, and effects contingent, the possibility of prophecy must be given up, as it implies foreknowledge, which, if granted, would render them necessary. The first part of this objection might be allowed, were there no predictions to be adduced in favor of a professed revelation, except such as related to events which human experience has taught to be dependent upon some cause, the existence and necessary operation of which are within the compass of human knowledge. But to foretell such events would not be to prophesy, any more than to say that it will be light to-morrow at noon, or that on a certain day and hour next year there will occur an eclipse of the sun or moon, when that event had been previously ascertained by astronomical calculation. If, however, it were allowed that all events depended upon a chain of necessary causes, yet, in a variety of instances, the argument from prophecy would not be at all effected; for the foretelling of necessary results in certain circumstances is beyond human intelligence, because they can only be known to Him by whose power those necessary causes on which they depend have been arranged, and who has prescribed the times of their operation. To borrow a case, for the sake of illustration, from the Scriptures, though the claims of their predictions are not now in question: let us allow that such a prophecy as that of Isaiah respecting the taking of Babylon by Cyrus was uttered, as it purports to be, more than a century before Cyrus was born, and that all the actions of Cyrus and his army, and those of the Babylonian monarch and his people, were necessitated; is it to be maintained that the chain of necessitating causes running through more than a century could be traced by a human mind, so as to describe the precise manner in which that fatality would unfold itself, even to the turning of the river, the drunken carousal of the inhabitants, and the neglect of shutting the gates of the city? This being by uniform and universal experience known to be above all human apprehension, would therefore prove that the prediction was made in consequence of a communication from a superior and Divine Intelligence. Were events, therefore, subjected to invincible fate and necessity, there might nevertheless be prophecy.

The other branch of the dilemma is founded on the notion that if we allow the moral freedom of human actions, prophecy is impossible, because certain foreknowledge is contrary to that freedom, and fixes and renders the event necessary. To this the reply is, that the objection is founded on a false assumption, the Divine foreknowledge having no more influence in effectuating or making certain any event than human foreknowledge in the degree in which it may exist, there being no moral causality at all in knowledge. This lies in the will, which is the determining, acting principle in every agent; or, as Dr. Samuel Clarke has expressed it, in answer to another kind of objector: "God's infallible judgment concerning contingent truths does no more alter the nature of the things, and cause them to be necessary, than our judging right at any time concerning a contingent truth makes it cease to be contingent; or than our science of a present truth is any cause of its being either true or present. Here, therefore, lies the fallacy of our author's argument. Because, from God's foreknowing the existence of things depending upon a chain of necessary causes, it follows that the existence of the things must needs be necessary, therefore, from God's judging infallibly concerning things which depend not on necessary but free causes he concludes that these things also depend not upon free but necessary causes. Contrary, I say, to the supposition in the argument; for it must not be first supposed that things are in their own nature necessary; but from the power of judging infallibly concerning free events, it must be proved that things, otherwise supposed free, will thereby unavoidably become necessary." The whole question lies in this: Is the simple knowledge of an action a necessitating cause of the action? And the answer must be in the negative, as every man's consciousness will assure him. If the causality of influence, either immediate, or by the arrangement of compelling events, be mixed up with this, the ground is shifted; and it is no longer a question which respects simple prescience. (See PRESCIENCE.) This metaphysical objection having no foundation in truth, the force of the evidence arising from predictions of events, distant, and beyond the power of human sagacity to anticipate, and uttered as authentications of a Divine commission, is apparent. "Such predictions, whether in the form of declaration, description, or representation of things future," as Mr. Boyle justly observes, "are supernatural things, and may properly be ranked among miracles." For when, for instance, the events are distant many years or ages from the uttering of the prediction itself, depending on causes not so much as existing when the prophecy was spoken and recorded, and likewise upon various circumstances and a long arbitrary series of things, and the fluctuating uncertainties of human volitions, and especially when they depend not at all upon any external circumstances nor upon any created being, but arise merely from the counsels and appointment of God himself—such events can be foreknown only by that Being, one of whose attributes is omniscience, and can be foretold by him only to whom the "Father of lights" shall reveal them; so that whoever is manifestly endowed with that predictive power must, in that instance, speak and act by Divine inspiration, and what he pronounces of that kind must be received as the word of God; nothing more being necessary to assure us of this than credible testimony that such predictions were uttered before the event, or conclusive evidence that the records which contain them are of the antiquity to which they pretend.

The distinction between the prophecies of Scripture and the oracles of heathenism is marked and essential. In the heathen oracles we cannot discern any clear and unequivocal tokens of genuine prophecy. They were destitute of dignity and importance, had no connection with each other, tended to no object of general concern, and never looked into times remote from their own. We read only of some few predictions and prognostications, scattered among the writings of poets and philosophers, most of which, besides being very weakly authenticated, appear to have been answers to questions of merely local, personal, and temporary concern, relating to the issue of affairs then actually in hand, and to events speedily to be determined. Far from attempting to form any chain of prophecies respecting things far distant as to time or place, or matters contrary to human probability, and requiring supernatural agency to effect them, the heathen priests and soothsayers did not even pretend to a systematic and connected plan. They hardly dared, indeed, to assume the prophetic character in its full force, but stood trembling, as it were, on the brink of futurity, conscious of their inability to venture beyond the depths of human conjecture. Hence their predictions became so fleeting, so futile, so uninteresting, that, though they were collected together as worthy of preservation, they soon fell into disrepute and almost total oblivion. (See ORACLES.) The Scripture prophecies, on the other hand, constitute a series of Divine predictions, relating principally to one grand object, of universal importance, the work of man's redemption, and carried on in regular progression through the Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian dispensations, with a harmony and uniformity of design, clearly indicating one and the same Divine Author. They speak of the agents to be employed in it, and especially of the great agent, the Redeemer himself; and of those mighty and awful proceedings of Providence as to the nations of the earth, by which judgment and mercy are exercised with reference both to the ordinary principles of moral government, and especially to this restoring economy, to its struggles, its oppositions, and its triumphs. They all meet in Christ, as in their proper centre, and in him only; however many of the single lines, when considered apart, may be imagined to have another direction, and though they may pass through intermediate events. If we look, says Bishop Hurd, into the prophetic writings, we find that prophecy is of a prodigious extent; that it commenced from the fall of man, and reaches to the consummation of all things; that for many ages it was delivered darkly to a few persons, and with large intervals from the date of one prophecy to that of another; but, at length, became more clear, more frequent, and was uniformly carried on in the line of one people, separated from the rest of the world—among other reasons assigned, for this principally, to be the repository of the Divine oracles; that, with some intermission, the spirit of prophecy subsisted among that people to the coming of Christ; that he himself and his apostles exercised this power in the most conspicuous manner, and left behind them many predictions, recorded in the books of the New Testament, which profess to respect very distant events, and even run out to the end of time, or, in St. John's expression, to that period "when the mystery of God shall be perfected." Further, besides the extent of this prophetic scheme, the dignity of the Person whom it concerns deserves our consideration. He is described in terms which excite the most august and magnificent ideas. He is spoken of, indeed, sometimes as being "the seed of the woman," and as "the Son of man;" yet so as being at the same time of more than mortal extraction. He is even represented to us as being superior to men and angels; as far above all principality and power; above all that is accounted great, whether in heaven or in earth; as the Word and Wisdom of God; as the eternal Son of the Father; as the Heir of all things, by whom he made the worlds; as the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person. We have no words to denote greater ideas than these; the mind of man cannot elevate itself to nobler conceptions. Of such transcendent worth and excellence is that Jesus said to be, to whom all the prophets bear witness! Lastly, the declared purpose for which the Messiah, prefigured by so long a train of prophecy, came into the world, corresponds to all the rest of the representation. It was not to deliver an oppressed nation from civil tyranny, or to erect a great civil empire, that is, to achieve one of those acts which history accounts most heroic. No: it was not a mighty state, a victor people, that was worthy to enter into the contemplation of this Divine Person. It was another and far sublimer purpose which he came to accomplish; a purpose in comparison of which all our policies are poor and little, and all the performances of man as nothing. It was to deliver a world from ruin; to abolish sin and death; to purify and immortalize human nature; and thus, in the most exalted sense of the words, to be the Saviour of men and the blessing of all nations. There is no exaggeration in this account: a spirit of prophecy pervading all time, characterizing one Person of the highest dignity, and proclaiming the accomplishment of one purpose, the most beneficent, the most divine, the imagination itself can project. Such is the scriptural delineation of that economy which we call prophetic.

Non res Romanæ perituraque regna,

[Not the empire of Rome and kingdoms about to perish,]

The advantage of this species of evidence belongs then exclusively to our revelation. Heathenism never made any clear and well-founded pretensions to it. Mohammedanism, though it stands itself as a proof of the truth of Scripture prophecy, is unsupported by a single prediction of its own.

The objection which has been raised to Scripture prophecy, from its supposed obscurity, has no solid foundation. There is, it is true, a prophetic language of symbol and emblem; but it is a language which is definite and not equivocal in its meaning, and as easily mastered as the language of poetry, by attentive persons. This, however, is not always used. The style of the prophecies of Scripture very often differs in nothing from the ordinary style of the Hebrew poets; and, in not a few cases, and those too on which the Christian builds most in the argument, it sinks into the plainness of historical narrative. Some degree of obscurity is essential to prophecy; for the end of it was not to gratify human curiosity, by a detail of future events and circumstances; and too great clearness and speciality might have led to many artful attempts to fulfil the predictions, and so far the evidence of their accomplishment would have been weakened. The two great ends of prophecy are, to excite expectation before the event, and then to confirm the truth by a striking and unequivocal fulfilment; and it is a sufficient answer to the allegation of the obscurity of the prophecies of Scripture, that they have abundantly accomplished those objects, among the most intelligent and investigating, as well as among the simple and unlearned, in all ages. It cannot be denied, for instance, leaving out particular cases which might be given, that by means of these predictions the expectation of the incarnation and appearance of a Divine Restorer was kept up among the people to whom they were given, and spread even to the neighboring nations; that, as these prophecies multiplied, the hope became more intense; and that at the time of our Lord's coming, the expectation of the birth of a very extraordinary person prevailed, not only among the Jews, but among other nations. This purpose was then sufficiently answered, and an answer is given to the objection. In like manner, prophecy serves as the basis of our hope in things yet to come: in the final triumph of truth and righteousness on earth, the universal establishment of the kingdom of our Lord, and the rewards of eternal life to be bestowed at his second appearing. In these all true Christians agree; and their hope could not have been so uniformly supported in all ages and under all circumstances, had not the prophecies and predictive promises conveyed with sufficient clearness the general knowledge of the good for which they looked, though many of its particulars be unrevealed. The second end of prophecy is to confirm the truth by the subsequent event. Here the question of the actual fulfilment of Scripture prophecy is involved; and it is no argument against the unequivocal fulfilment of several prophecies, that many have doubted or denied what the believers in revelation have on this subject so strenuously contended for. How few of mankind have read the Scriptures with serious attention, or been at the pains to compare their prophecies with the statements in history! How few, especially of the objectors to the Bible, have read it in this manner! How many of them have confessed unblushingly their unacquaintance with its contents, or have proved what they have not confessed by the mistakes and misrepresentations into which they have fallen! As for the Jews, the evident dominion of their prejudices, their general averseness to discussion, and the extravagant principles of interpretation they have adopted for many ages, which set all sober criticism at defiance, render nugatory any authority which might be ascribed to their denial of the fulfilment of certain prophecies in the sense adopted by Christians. We may add to this, that among Christian critics themselves there may be much disagreement. Eccentricities and absurdities are found among the learned in every department of knowledge, and much of this waywardness and affectation of singularity has infected interpreters of Scripture. But, after all, there is a truth and reason in every subject, which the understandings of the generality of men will apprehend and acknowledge whenever it is fully understood and impartially considered; to this in all such cases the appeal can only be made, and here it may be made with confidence. Instances of the signal fulfilment of numerous prophecies are scattered through various articles in this volume; so that it is not necessary to repeat them here. A few words on the double sense of prophecy may, however, be added.

For want of a right apprehension of the true meaning of this somewhat unfortunate term which has obtained in theology, an objection of another kind has been raised, as though no definite meaning could be assigned to the prophecies of Scripture. Nothing can be more unfounded. The double sense of many prophecies in the Old Testament, says an able writer, has been made a pretext by ill-disposed men for representing them as of uncertain meaning, and resembling the ambiguity of the pagan oracles. But whoever considers the subject with due attention, will perceive how little ground there is for such an accusation. The equivocations of the heathen oracles manifestly arose from their ignorance of future events, and from their endeavors to conceal that ignorance by such indefinite expressions as might be equally applicable to two or more events of a contrary description. But the double sense of the Scripture prophecies, far from originating in any doubt or uncertainty as to the fulfilment of them in either sense, springs from a foreknowledge of their accomplishment in both; whence the prediction is purposely so framed as to include both events, which, so far from being contrary to each other, are typical the one of the other, and are thus connected together by a mutual dependency or relation. This has often been satisfactorily proved, with respect to those prophecies which referred, in their primary sense, to the events of the Old Testament, and, in their further and more complex signification, to those of the New; and on this double accomplishment of some prophecies is grounded our firm expectation of the completion of others, which remain yet unfulfilled in their secondary sense, but which we justly consider as equally uncertain in their issue as those which are already past. So far, then, from any valid objection lying against the credibility of the Scripture prophecies, from these seeming ambiguities of meaning, we may urge them as additional proofs of their coming from God. For who but the Being that is infinite in knowledge and in counsel, could so construct predictions as to give them a twofold application, to events distant from, and, to human foresight, unconnected with each other? What power less than Divine could so frame them as to make the accomplishment of them in one instance a solemn pledge and assurance of their completion in another instance, of still higher and more universal importance? Where will the scoffer find any thing like this in the artifices of heathen oracles to conceal their ignorance, and to impose on the credulity of mankind? See ORACLES.

On this subject it may be observed, by way of general illustration, that the remarkable personages under the old dispensation were sometimes in the description of their characters, and in the events of their lives, the representatives of the future dispensers of evangelical blessings, as Moses and David were unquestionably types of Christ. Ezek. xxxiv. 23; Matt. xi. 14; Heb. vi. 20; vii. 1-3. Persons likewise were sometimes descriptive of things, as Sarah and Hagar were allegorical figures of the two covenants. Gal. iv. 22-31; Rom. ix. 8-13. And, on the other hand, things were used to symbolize persons, as the brazen serpent and the paschal lamb were signs of our healing and spotless Redeemer. Exodus xii. 46; John iii. 14; xix. 36. And so, lastly, ceremonial appointments and legal circumstances were preordained as significant of gospel institutions. 1 Cor. x. 1-11; Heb. viii. 5; ix.; x.: 1 Pet. iii. 20, 22. Hence it was that many of the descriptions of the prophets had a twofold character; bearing often an immediate reference to present circumstances, and yet being in their nature predictive of future occurrences. What they reported of the type was often in a more signal manner applicable to the thing typified; Psalm xxi. 4-6; xl. 1, 6-10; xli. 9; John xiii. 18; Lam. iii. 1-30; Dan. xi. 36, 37; what they spoke literally of present, was figuratively descriptive of future particulars; and what was applied in a figurative sense to existing persons, was often actually characteristic of their distant archetypes. Psalm xxii. 16-18, etc. Many passages, then, in the Old Testament which in their first aspect appear to be historical, are in fact prophetic, and they are so cited in the New Testament, not by way of ordinary accommodation, or casual coincidence, but as intentionally predictive, as having a double sense, a literal and a mystical interpretation. Hosea xi. 1: Matt. ii. 15.

Besides these historical passages, of which the covert allusions were explained by the interpretation of the Gospel writers, who were enlightened by the Spirit to unfold the mysteries of Scripture, the prophets often uttered positive predictions which, in consequence of the correspondence established between the two dispensations, were descriptive of a double event, however they might be themselves ignorant of the full extent of those prophecies which they delivered. For instance, their promises of present success and deliverances were often significant of distant benefits, and secular consolations conveyed assurances of evangelical blessings. 2 Sam. vii. 13, 14; Heb. i. 5. Thus their prophecies received completion in a first and secondary view. As being in part signs to excite confidence, they had an immediate accomplishment, but were afterward fulfilled in a more illustrious sense; 1 Kings xiii. 2, 3; Isaiah vii. 14; Matt. i. 22; Dan. ix. 27; xii. 7; 1 Macc. i. 54; Matt. xxiv. 15; the prophets being inspired, by the suggestions of the Spirit, to use expressions magnificent enough to include the substance in the description of the figure. That many of the prophecies in the Old Testament were direct, and singly and exclusively applicable to, and accomplished in, our Saviour, is certain. Gen. xlix. 10; Psalms xxii., xlv.: Isaiah lii.; liii.: Daniel vii. 13, 14; Micah v. 2; Zech. ix. 9; Mal. iii. 1.

It requires much attention to comprehend the full import and extent of this typical dispensation, and the chief obscurities which prevail in the sacred writings are to be attributed to the double character of prophecy. To unravel this is, however, an interesting and instructive study; though an admiration of the spiritual meaning should never lead us to disregard or undervalue the first and evident signification; for many great men have been so dazzled by their discoveries in this mode of explication, as to be hurried into wild and extravagant excess; as it is evident from the writings of Origen and Jerome; as also from the Commentaries of Austin, who acknowledges that he had too far indulged in the fancies of an exuberant imagination, declaring that the other parts of Scripture are the best commentaries. The apostles and the evangelists are, indeed, the best expositors; and where those infallible guides have led the way, we need not hesitate to follow their steps by the light of clear reason and just analogy.

It is this double character of prophecy which occasions those unexpected transitions and sudden interchanges of circumstance so observable in the prophetic books. Hence different predictions are sometimes blended and mixed together; temporal and spiritual deliverances are foretold in one prophecy; and greater and smaller events are combined in one point of view. Hence, likewise, one chain of connected design runs through the whole scheme of prophecy, and a continuation of events successively fulfilling, and successively branching out into new predictions, continued to confirm the faith and to keep alive the expectations of the Jews. Hence was it the character of the prophetic spirit to be rapid in its description, and regardless of the order of history; to pass with quick and unexpected celerity from subject to subject, and from period to period. "And we must allow," says Lord Bacon, "for that latitude that is agreeable and familiar to prophecy, which is of the nature of its Author, with whom a thousand years are but as one day." The whole of the great scheme must have been at once present to the Divine Mind; but God described its parts in detail to mankind, in such measures and in such proportions, that the connection of every link was obvious, and its relations apparent in every point of view, till the harmony and entire consistency of the plan were displayed to those who witnessed its perfection in the advent of Christ.

[PROPHECYINGS. Religious exercises which obtained in the reign of Elizabeth. They consisted of expositions of Scripture by the ministers of a diocese, met together for the purpose. Archbishop Parker partially effected their suppression in 1574, and completely in 1577. Elizabeth sequestered Archbishop Grindal for refusing to act in their suppression. Neale, in his History of the Puritans, says that she put them down lest the laity should know too much to remain peaceable subjects.]

PROPHETS. A prophet, in the strict and proper sense, was one to whom the knowledge of secret things was revealed, that he might declare them to others, whether they were things past, or present, or to come. The woman of Samaria perceived our Saviour was a prophet, by his telling her the secrets of her past life. John iv. 19. The prophet Elisha had the present conduct of his servant Gehazi revealed to him. 2 Kings v. 26. And most of the prophets had revelations concerning future events; above all, concerning the coming and kingdom of the Messiah: "He has raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David, as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began." Luke i. 69, 70. Nevertheless, in a more lax or analogical sense, the title prophet is sometimes given to persons who had no such revelation, nor were properly inspired. Thus Aaron is said to be Moses's prophet: "The Lord said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a God to Pharaoh, and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet," Exod. vii. 1; because Aaron received the Divine messages, which he carried immediately from Moses; whereas other prophets received their messages immediately from God himself. In this respect, as Moses stood in the place of God to Pharaoh, so Aaron acted in the character of his prophet. The title of prophets is given also to the sacred musicians, who sang the praises of God, or who accompanied the song with musical instruments. Thus "the sons of Asaph, and of Heman, and of Jeduthun," are said to "prophecy with harps, with psalteries, and with cymbals," 1 Chron. xxv. 1; and they prophesied, it is said, "according to the order of the King." Perhaps Miriam, the sister of Aaron, may be called a prophetess only on this account, that she led the concert of the women, who sang the song of Moses with timbrels and with dances. Exodus xv. 20, 21. Thus the heathen poets, who sang or composed verses in praise of their gods, were called by the Romans vates, or prophets; which is of the same import with the Greek προφήτης, a title which St. Paul gives to Epimenides, a Cretan poet. Titus i. 12.

Godwin observes, that, for the propagation of learning, colleges and schools were in divers places erected for the prophets. The first intimation we have in Scripture of these schools is in 1 Sam. x. 5, where we read of "a company of prophets coming down from the high place with a psaltery, a tabret, a pipe, and a harp before them, and they did prophecy." They are supposed to be the students in a college of prophets at Beber, or "the hill," as we render it, "of God." Our translators elsewhere retain the same Hebrew word, as supposing it to be the proper name of a place: "Jonathan smote the garrison of the Philistines that was in Geba." 1 Sam. xiii. 8. Some persons have imagined that the ark, or at least a synagogue, or some place of public worship, was at this time at Geba, and that this is the reason of its being styled in the former passage בית ה' ההל, the hill of God. We read afterward of such another company of prophets at Naioth in Ramah, "prophesying, and Samuel standing as appointed over them." 1 Sam. xix. 19, 20. The students in these colleges were called sons of the prophets, who are frequently mentioned in after ages, even in the most degenerate times. Thus we read of the sons of the prophets that were at Bethel; and of another school at Jericho; and of the sons of the prophets at Gilgal. 2 Kings ii. 3, 5; iv. 38. It should seem, that these sons of the prophets were very numerous; for of this sort were probably the prophets of the Lord, whom Jezebel cut off; "but Obadiah took a hundred of them, and hid them by fifty in a cave." 1 Kings xviii. 4. In these schools young men were educated under a proper master, who was commonly, if not always, an inspired prophet, in the knowledge of religion, and in sacred music—1 Sam. x. 5; xix. 20—and were thereby qualified to be public preachers, which seems to have been part of the business of the prophets on the Sabbath days and festivals. 2 Kings iv. 23. It should seem that God generally chose the prophets, whom he inspired, out of these schools. Amos, therefore, speaks of it as an extraordinary case, that though he was not one of the sons of the prophets, but a herdsman, "yet the Lord took him as he followed the flock, and said unto him, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel." Amos vii. 14, 15. That it was usual for some of these schools, or at least for their tutors, to be endowed with a prophetic spirit, appears from the relation of the prophecies concerning the ascent of Elijah, delivered to Elisha by the sons of the prophets, both at Jericho and at Bethel. 2 Kings ii. 3, 5.

The Hebrew prophets present a succession of men at once the most singular and the most venerable that ever appeared, in so long a line of time, in the world. They had special communion with God; they laid open the scenes of the future; they were ministers of the promised Christ. They upheld religion and piety in the worst times, and at the greatest risks; and their disinterestedness was only equalled by their patriotism. The houses in which they lived were generally mean, and of their own building. 2 Kings vi. 2-4. Their food was chiefly pottage of herbs, unless when the people sent them some better provision, as bread, parched corn, honey, dried fruits, and the like. 1 Kings xiv. 3: 2 Kings iv. 38, 39, 42. Their dress was plain and coarse, tied about with a leathern girdle. Zech. xiii. 4: 2 Kings i. 8. Riches were no temptation to them; therefore Elisha not only refused Naaman's presents, but punished his servant Gehazi very severely for clandestinely obtaining a small share of them. 2 Kings v. 15, etc. To succeeding ages they have left a character consecrated by holiness, and "visions of the Holy One," which still unveil to the Church his most glorious attributes and his deepest designs. "Prophecy," says the Apostle Peter, "came not of old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." 2 Pet. i. 21. They flourished in a continued succession during a period of more than a thousand years, reckoning from Moses to Malachi, all coöperating in the same designs, uniting in one spirit to deliver the same doctrines and to predict the same blessings to mankind. Their claims to a Divine commission were demonstrated by the intrinsic excellency of their doctrine; by the disinterested zeal and undaunted courage with which they prosecuted their ministry and persevered in their great design, and by the unimpeachable integrity of their conduct. But even those credentials of a Divine mission were still further confirmed by the exercise of miraculous powers, and by the completion of many less important predictions which they uttered. Deut. xiii. 1-3; xviii. 22: Joshua x. 18: 1 Sam. xii. 8: 2 Kings i. 10: Isa. xxxviii. 8; xlii. 9: 1 Sam ix. 6: 1 Kings xiii. 3: Jer. xxviii. 9: Ezek. xxxiii. 33. When not immediately employed in the discharge of their sacred office, they lived sequestered from the world, in religious communities, or wandered "in deserts, in mountains, and in caves of the earth;" distinguished by their apparel, and by the general simplicity of their style of life. 2 Kings i. 8; iv. 10, 38; vi. 1: Isa. xx. 2: Matt. iii. 4: Heb. xi. 38: Rev. xi. 3. They were the established oracles of their country, and consulted upon all occasions when it was necessary to collect the Divine will on any civil or religious question. These illustrious personages were likewise as well the types as the harbingers of that greater Prophet whom they foretold; and in the general outline of their character, as well as in particular events of their lives, they prefigured to the Jews the future Teacher of mankind. Like him, also, they labored by every exertion to instruct and reclaim; reproving and threatening the sinful, however exalted in rank or encircled by power, with such fearless confidence and sincerity as often excited respect. The most intemperate princes were sometimes compelled unwillingly to hear and to obey their directions—1 Kings xii. 21-24; xiii. 2-6; xx. 42, 43; xxi. 27: 2 Chron. xxviii. 9-14—though often so incensed by their rebuke as to resent it by the severest persecutions. Then it was that the prophets exhibited the integrity of their characters, by zealously encountering oppression, hatred, and death, in the cause of religion. Then it was that they firmly supported "trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover, of bonds and imprisonment. They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about, destitute, afflicted, tormented," evil-entreated for those virtues of which the memorial should flourish to posterity, and martyred for righteousness, which, whenever resentment should subside, it would be deemed honorable to reverence. Matt. xxiii. 27-29.

The manner in which the prophets published their predictions, was either by uttering them aloud in some public place, or by affixing them on the gates of the temple—Jer. vii. 2: Ezek. iii. 10—where they might be generally seen and read. Upon some important occasions, when it was necessary to rouse the fears of a disobedient people, and to recall them to repentance, the prophets, as objects of universal attention, appear to have walked about publicly in sackcloth, and with every external mark of humiliation and sorrow. They then adopted extraordinary modes of expressing their convictions of impending wrath, and endeavored to awaken the apprehensions of their country, by the most striking illustration of threatened punishment. Thus Jeremiah made bonds and yokes, and put them upon his neck—Jer. xxvii.—strongly to intimate the subjection that God would bring on the nation whom Nebuchadnezzar should subdue. Isaiah likewise walked naked, that is, without the rough garment of the prophet, and barefoot, as a sign of the distress that awaited the Egyptians. Isa. xx. So Jeremiah broke the potter's vessel, Jer. xix.; and Ezekiel publicly removed his household goods from the city, 2 Kings xxv. 4, 5: Ezek. xii. 7; more forcibly to represent by these actions some correspondent calamities ready to fall on nations obnoxious to God's wrath; this mode of expressing important circumstances by action being customary and familiar among all eastern nations. The great object of prophecy was, as has been before observed, a description of the Messiah, and of his kingdom. Matt. xxvi. 56: Luke i. 70; xviii. 31; xxiv. 44: John i. 45: Acts iii. 18, 24; x. 43; xiii. 29; xv. 15; xxviii. 23: 1 Peter i. 10-12. These were gradually unfolded by successive prophets in predictions more and more distinct. They were at first held forth in general promises; they were afterward described by figures, and shadowed out under types and allusive institutions, and finally foretold in the full lustre of descriptive prophecy. The Hebrew prophets were chosen of God to testify beforehand of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. See PROPHECY.

PROPTIATION. To propitiate is to appease, to atone, to turn away the wrath of an offended person. In the case before us, the wrath turned away is the wrath of God; the person making the propitiation is Christ; the propitiating offering or sacrifice is his blood. All this is expressed in most explicit terms in the following passages: "And he is the propitiation for our sins." 1 John ii. 2. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." 1 John iv. 10. "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood." Rom. iii. 25. The word used in the two former passages is ἱλασμός; in the last ἱλαστήριον. Both are from the verb ἱλάσκω, so often used by Greek writers to express the action of a person who, in some appointed way, turned away the wrath of a deity; and therefore cannot bear the sense which Socinus would put upon it—the destruction of sin. This is not supported by a single example. With all Greek authorities, whether poets, historians, or others, the word means to propitiate, and is, for the most part, construed with an accusative case, designating the person whose displeasure is averted. As this could not be denied, Crellius comes to the aid of Socinus, and contends that the sense of this word was not to be taken from its common use in the Greek tongue, but from the Hellenistic use of it in the Greek of the New Testament, the LXX., and the Apocrypha. But this will not serve him; for both by the LXX. and in the Apocrypha it is used in the same sense as in the Greek classic writers. "He shall offer his ἱλασμὸν, sin-offering, saith the Lord God." Ezek. xlv. 27. "And the priest shall take the blood of the ἐξίλασμοῦ, sin-offering." Ezek. xlv. 19. Κρίδος τοῦ ἱλασμοῦ, "The ram of the atonement." Num. v. 8. To which may be added, out of the Apocrypha, "Now as the high-priest was making ἱλασμὸν, an atonement." 2 Macc. iii. 33.

The propitiatory sense of the word ἱλασμός being thus fixed, the modern Socinians have conceded, in their note on 1 John ii. 2, in their Improved Version, that it means the "pacifying of an offended party;" but they subjoin, that Christ is a propitiation, because by his gospel he brings sinners to repentance, and thus averts the Divine displeasure. The concession is important; and the comment cannot weaken it, because of its absurdity; for, in that interpretation of propitiation, Moses, or any of the apostles, or any minister of the gospel now who succeeds in bringing sinners to repentance, is as truly a propitiation for sin as Christ himself. On Rom. iii. 25, however, the authors of the Improved Version continue to follow their master Socinus, and translate the passage, "whom God hath set forth a propitiation, through faith in his blood," "whom God hath set forth as a mercy-seat in his own blood," and lay great stress upon this rendering, as removing that countenance to the doctrine of atonement by vicarious sufferings which the common translation affords. The word ἱλαστήριον is used in the Septuagint version, and in the Epistle to the Hebrews, to express the mercy-seat or covering of the ark. But so little is to be gained by taking it in this sense in this passage, that this rendering is adopted by several orthodox commentators as expressing, by a figure—or rather by emphatically supplying a type to the antitype—the doctrine of our Lord's atonement. The mercy-seat was so called because, under the Old Testament, it was the place where the high-priest, on the feast of expiation, sprinkled the blood of the sin-offerings, in order to make an atonement for himself and the whole congregation; and, since God accepted the offering which was then made, it was, for this reason, accounted the medium through which God showed himself propitious to the people. With reference to this, Jesus Christ may be called a mercy-seat, as being the person in or through whom God shows himself propitious to mankind. And as, under the law, God was propitious to those who came to him by appearing before his mercy-seat with the blood of their sin-offerings; so, under the gospel dispensation, he is propitious to those who come unto him by Jesus Christ, through faith in that blood which is elsewhere called "the blood of sprinkling," and which he shed for the remission of sins. Some able critics have, however, argued, from the force of the context, that the word ought to be taken actively, and not merely declaratively; not as a "propitiatory," but as "a propitiation," which, says Grotius, is shown by the mention which is afterward made of blood, to which the power of propitiation is ascribed. Others supply θύμα or ιερείου, and render it expiatory sacrifice. But whichever of these renderings be adopted, the same doctrine is held forth to us. The covering of the ark was rendered a propitiatory only by the blood of the victims sprinkled before and upon it; and when the apostle says that God hath set forth Jesus Christ to be a propitiatory, he immediately adds, having the ceremonies of the temple in his view, "through faith in his blood." The text, therefore, contains no exhibition of any means of obtaining mercy but through the blood of sacrifice, according to the rule laid down in the Epistle to the Hebrews, "Without shedding of blood is no remission;" and is in strict accordance with Ephesians i. 7, "We have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins." It is only by his blood that Christ reconciles us to God.

Unable as they who deny the vicarious nature of the sufferings of Christ are to evade the testimony of the above passages which speak of our Lord as "a propitiation," their next resource often is to deny the existence of wrath in God, in the hope of proving that propitiation, in a proper sense, cannot be the doctrine of Scripture, whatever may be the force of the mere terms which the sacred writers employ. In order to give plausibility to their statement, they pervert the opinion of the orthodox, and argue as though it formed a part of the doctrine of Christ's propitiation and oblation for sin to represent God as naturally an implacable and vengeful being, and only made placable and disposed to show mercy by satisfaction being made to his displeasure through our Lord's sufferings and death. This is as contrary to Scripture as it is to the opinions of all sober persons who hold the doctrine of Christ's atonement. God is love; but it is not necessary, in order to support this truth, to assume that he is nothing else. He has other attributes, which harmonize with this and with each other; though, assuredly, that harmony cannot be established by any who deny the propitiation for sin made by the death of Christ. It sufficiently proves that there is not only no implacability in God, but a most tender and placable affection toward the sinning human race itself, and that the Son of God, by whom the propitiation was made, was the free gift of the Father to us. This is the most eminent proof of his love, that, for our sakes, and that mercy might be extended to us, "He spared not his own Son; but delivered him up for us all." Thus he is the fountain and first moving cause of that scheme of recovery and salvation which the incarnation and death of our Lord brought into full and efficient operation. The true questions are, indeed, not whether God is love, or whether he is of a placable nature; but whether God is holy and just; whether we, his creatures, are under law or not; whether this law has any penalty, and whether God, in his rectoral character, is bound to execute and uphold that law. As the justice of God is punitive, (and if it is not punitive, his laws are a dead letter,) then is there wrath in God; then is God angry with the wicked; then is man, as a sinner, obnoxious to this anger; and so a propitiation becomes necessary to turn it away from him. Nor are these terms unscriptural; they are used in the New Testament as emphatically as in the Old; though the former is, in a special sense, a revelation of the mercy of God to man. John declares that if any man believeth not on the Son of God, "the wrath of God abideth upon him;" and St. Paul affirms that "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." The day of judgment is, with reference to the ungodly, said to be "the day of wrath;" God is called "a consuming fire;" and, as such, is the object of "reverence and godly fear." Nor is this his displeasure light, and the consequences of it a trifling and temporary inconvenience. When we only regard the consequences which have followed sin in society, from the earliest ages, and in every part of the world, and add to these the many direct and fearful inflictions of punishment which have proceeded from the "Judge of all the earth," then, to use the language of Scripture, "our flesh may well tremble because of his judgments." But when we look at the future state of the wicked as represented in Scripture, though it is expressed generally, and surrounded with the mystery of a place and a condition of being unknown to us in the present state, all evils which history has crowded into the lot of man appear insignificant in comparison of banishment from God, separation from good men, public condemnation, torment of spirit, "weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth," "everlasting destruction," "everlasting fire." Let men talk ever so much or eloquently of the pure benevolence of God, they cannot abolish the facts recorded in the history of human suffering in this world as the effects of transgression; nor can they discharge these fearful comminations from the pages of the book of God. These cannot be criticised away; and if it is "Jesus who saves us from the wrath to come," that is, from those effects of the wrath of God which are to come, then, but for him, we should have been liable to them. That principle in God from which such effects follow, the Scriptures call wrath; and they who deny the existence of wrath in God, deny, therefore, the Scriptures.

It by no means follows, however, that this wrath is a passion in God; or that, though we contend that the awful attribute of his justice requires satisfaction in order to the forgiveness of the guilty, we afford reason to any to charge us with attributing vengeful affections to the Divine Being. "Our adversaries," says Bishop Stillingfleet, "first make opinions for us, and then show that they are unreasonable. They first suppose that anger in God is to be considered as a passion, and that passion a desire of revenge; and then tell us, that if we do not prove that this desire of revenge can be satisfied by the sufferings of Christ, then we can never prove the doctrine of satisfaction to be true; whereas, we do not mean by God's anger any such passion, but the just declaration of God's will to punish, upon our provocation of him by our sins; we do not make the design of the satisfaction to be that God may please himself in revenging the sins of the guilty upon the most innocent person, because we make the design of punishment not to be the satisfaction of anger as a desire of revenge, but to be the vindication of the honor and rights of the offended person by such a way as he himself shall judge satisfactory to the ends of his government." See ATONEMENT AND EXPIATION.

PROPI TIATORY, among the Jews, was the cover or lid of the ark of the covenant, which was lined both within and without with plates of gold, insomuch that there was no wood to be seen. Some even take it to have been one piece of massive gold. The cherubim spread their wings over the propitiatory. This propitiatory was a type or figure of Christ. See PROPITIATION.

[PROPOPASCHITÆ. A sect of Quartodecimans who kept Easter at the same time with the Jews; they were also Azymites, using unleavened bread in the eucharist.]

PROSELYTE, Προσηλυτος, signifies a stranger, a foreigner; the Hebrew word גֵּר, or גֵּרָא, also denotes a stranger, one who comes from abroad, or from another place. In the language of the Jews, those were called by this name who came to dwell in their country, or who embraced their religion, being not Jews by birth. In the New Testament they are called sometimes proselytes, and sometimes Gentiles, fearing God: Acts ii. 5; x. 2, 22; xiii. 16, 50. The Jews distinguish two kinds of proselytes: the first, proselytes of the gate; the others, proselytes of justice or righteousness. The first dwelt in the land of Israel, or even out of that country; and, without obliging themselves to circumcision, or to any other ceremony of the law, feared and worshipped the true God, observing the rules imposed on Noah. These were, according to the rabbins, 1. To abstain from idolatry; 2. From blasphemy; 3. From murder; 4. From adultery; 5. From theft; 6. To appoint just and upright judges; 7. Not to eat the flesh of any animal cut off while it was alive. Maimonides says, that the first six of these precepts were given to Adam, and the seventh to Noah. The privileges of proselytes of the gate were, first, that through holiness they might have hope of eternal life. Secondly, they could dwell in the land of Israel, and share in the outward prosperities of it. It is said they did not dwell in the cities, but only in the suburbs and the villages; but it is certain that the Jews often admitted into their cities not only proselytes of habitation, but also Gentiles and idolaters, as appears by the reproaches on this account throughout the Scriptures.

Proselytes of justice or of righteousness were those converted to Judaism, who had engaged themselves to receive circumcision, and to observe the whole law of Moses. Thus were they admitted to all the prerogatives of the people of the Lord. The rabbins inform us, that before circumcision was administered to them, and before they were admitted into the religion of the Hebrews, they were examined about the motives of their conversion: whether the change was voluntary, or whether it proceeded from interest, fear, ambition, etc. When the proselyte was well proved and instructed, they gave him circumcision; and when the wound of his circumcision healed, they gave him baptism, by plunging his whole body into a cistern of water by only one immersion. Boys under twelve years of age, and girls under thirteen, could not become proselytes till they had obtained the consent of their parents, or, in case of refusal, the concurrence of the officers of justice. Baptism in respect of girls had the same effect as circumcision in respect of boys. Each of them, by means of this, received, as it were, a new birth; so that those who were their parents before were no longer regarded as such after this ceremony, and those who before were slaves now became free.

Many, however, are of opinion that there appears to be no ground whatever in Scripture for this distinction of proselytes of the gate, and proselytes of righteousness. "According to my idea," says Dr. Tomline, "proselytes were those, and those only, who took upon themselves the obligation of the whole Mosaic law, but retained that name till they were admitted into the congregation of the Lord as adopted children. Gentiles were allowed to worship and offer sacrifices to the God of Israel in the outer court of the temple; and some of them, persuaded of the sole and universal sovereignty of the Lord Jehovah, might renounce idolatry without embracing the Mosaic law; but such persons appear to me never to be called proselytes in Scripture, or in any ancient Christian writer." He also observes, that "the term, proselytes of the gate, is derived from an expression frequent in the Old Testament, namely, 'the stranger that is within thy gates;' but I think it evident that the strangers were those Gentiles who were permitted to live among the Jews under certain restrictions, and whom the Jews were forbidden 'to vex or oppress,' so long as they live in a peaceable manner." Dr. Lardner says, "I do not believe that the notion of two sorts of Jewish proselytes can be found in any Christian writer before the fourteenth century or later." Dr. Jennings also observes, that "there does not appear to be sufficient evidence in the Scripture history of the existence of such proselytes of the gate as the rabbins mention; nor, indeed, of any who with propriety can be styled proselytes, except such as fully embraced the Jewish religion."

PROSEUCHÆ. That the Jews had houses or places for prayer, called προσευχαι, appears from a variety of passages in Philo; and particularly in his oration against Flaccus he complains that their προσευχαι were pulled down, and there was no place left in which they might worship God and pray for Cæsar. Among those who make the synagogues and proseuchæ to be different places, are the learned Mr. Joseph Mede and Dr. Prideaux; and they think the difference consists partly in the form of the edifice; a synagogue, they say, being roofed like our houses or churches; and a proseucha being only encompassed with a wall, or some other mound or enclosure, and open at the top, like our courts. They make them to differ in situation; synagogues being in towns and cities, proseuchæ in the fields, and frequently by the river-side. Dr. Prideaux mentions another distinction in respect to the service performed in them. In synagogues, he says, the prayers were offered up in public forms in common for the whole congregation; but in the proseuchæ they prayed, as in the temple, every one apart for himself. And thus our Saviour prayed in the proseucha into which he entered. Yet, after all, the proof in favor of this notion is not so strong but that it still remains a question with some, whether the synagogues and the proseuchæ were any thing more than two different names for the same place; the one taken from the people's assembling in them, the other from the service to which they were more immediately appropriated, namely, prayer. Nevertheless, the name proseuchæ will not prove that they were appropriated only to prayer, and therefore were different from synagogues, in which the Scriptures were also read and expounded; since the temple, in which sacrifices were offered and all the parts of Divine service were performed, is called οικος προσευχης, a house of prayer, Matt. xxi. 13.

PROTESTANT. The Emperor Charles V. called a diet at Spire, in 1529, to request aid from the German princes against the Turks, and to devise the most effectual means for allaying the religious disputes which then raged in consequence of Luther's opposition to the established religion. In this diet it was decreed by Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria, and other popish princes, that in the countries which had embraced the new religion it should be lawful to continue in it till the meeting of a council; but that no Roman Catholic should be allowed to turn Lutheran, and that the reformers should deliver nothing in their sermons contrary to the received doctrine of the Church. Against this decree six Lutheran princes, namely, John and George, the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, Ernest and Francis, the two dukes of Luneburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Prince of Anhalt, with the deputies of fourteen imperial towns, namely, Strasburg, Ulm, Nuremberg, Constance, Reutlingen, Isny, Windsheim, Memmingen, Nordlingen, Lindau, Kempten, Hailbrun, Weissenburg, and St. Gall, formally and solemnly protested, and declared that they appealed to a general council; and hence the name of Protestants, by which the followers of Luther have ever since been known. Nor was it confined to them; for it soon after included the Calvinists, and has now of a long time been applied generally to the Christian sects, of whatever denomination, and in whatever country they may be found, which have separated from the see of Rome. [See REFORMED.]

Mr. Chillingworth, addressing himself to a writer in favor of the Church of Rome, speaks of the religion of the Protestants in the following excellent terms: "Know, then, sir, that when I say the religion of Protestants is in prudence to be preferred before yours, on the one side I do not understand by your religion the doctrine of Bellarmine, or Baronius, or any other private man among you, nor the doctrine of the Sorbonne, of the Jesuits, or of the Dominicans, or of any other particular company among you, but that wherein you all agree, or profess to agree, the doctrine of the Council of Trent; so, accordingly, on the other side, by the religion of Protestants, I do not understand the doctrine of Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon, nor the Confession of Augsburg, or Geneva, nor the Catechism of Heidelberg, nor the Articles of the Church of England; no, nor the Harmony of Protestant Confessions; but that in which they all agree, and which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a perfect rule of faith and action—that is, the Bible. The Bible, I say, the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants. Whatsoever else they believe beside it, and the plain, irrefragable, indubitable consequences of it, well may they hold it as a matter of opinion; but as a matter of faith and religion, neither can they with coherence to their own grounds believe it themselves, nor require belief of it of others, without most high and most schismatical presumption. I, for my part, after a long, and, as I verily believe and hope, impartial search of the true way to eternal happiness, do profess plainly, that I cannot find any rest for the sole of my foot but upon this rock only. I see plainly, and with my own eyes, that there are popes against popes, and councils against councils; some fathers against other fathers, the same fathers against themselves; a consent of fathers of one age against a consent of fathers of another age; traditive interpretations of Scripture are pretended, but there are few or none to be found; no tradition but that of Scripture can derive itself from the fountain, but may be plainly proved either to have been brought in in such an age after Christ, or that in such an age it was not in. In a word, there is no sufficient certainty but of Scripture only for any considering man to build upon. This, therefore, and this only, I have reason to believe. This I will profess; according to this I will live; and for this, if there be occasion, I will not only willingly, but even gladly, lose my life; though I should be sorry that Christians should take it from me. Propose me any thing out of this book, and require whether I believe or no, and, seem it never so incomprehensible to human reason, I will subscribe it with hand and heart, as knowing no demonstration can be stronger than this—God hath said so, therefore it is true. In other things, I will take no man's liberty of judging from him; neither shall any man take mine from me."

Under such views the Bible is held as the only sure foundation upon which all true Protestants build every article of the faith which they profess, and every point of doctrine which they teach; and all other foundations, whether they be the decisions of councils, the confessions of churches, the prescripts of popes, or the expositions of private men, are considered by them as sandy and unsafe, or as in nowise to be ultimately relied on. Yet, on the other hand, they by no means fastidiously reject them, as of no use; for while they admit the Bible, or the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, to be the only infallible rule by which we must measure the truth or falsehood of every religious opinion, they are sensible that all men are not equally fitted to understand or to apply this rule; and that the wisest men want, on many occasions, all the helps afforded by the learning and research of others to enable them to understand its precise nature, and to define its certain extent. These helps are great and numerous, having been supplied, in every age of the Church, by the united labors of learned men in every country, and by none in greater abundance than by those in Protestant communions.

[PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. This is an offshoot of the Church of England, the first Protestant Church planted on the American continent. It was established by law, during the colonial era, in New York, and the colonies south of New York, except Pennsylvania; and was attached to the diocese of the Bishop of London. At the time of the American Revolution, its legal establishment, of course, ceased, and the Church was left in a disintegrated condition. To provide for those Episcopalians in the United States who were connected with the Methodist Societies, Mr. Wesley revised the Liturgy, Articles, and Ordinal of the Church of England, and under his auspices an Episcopal Church was organized in 1784. See METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Such a measure as this, and other plans that were suggested, not being satisfactory to the clergy and many of the laity, they held a Convention at Philadelphia, in the following year, in which they formed an ecclesiastical constitution, and appointed a committee to correspond with the English prelates in regard to the consecration of bishops for their communion. After some delay, an act of Parliament authorized the consecration, and William White, D. D., of Philadelphia, and Samuel Provoost, D. D., of New York, were accordingly consecrated by the Archbishop of Canterbury. A short time before their consecration, viz., November 14, 1784, Samuel Seabury, D. D., had been consecrated by the non-juring bishops of Scotland, and had become Bishop of Connecticut. At the first triennial Convention, held in Philadelphia, July, 1789, the Constitution of the Church was adopted; and it was proposed to consecrate another bishop; but as the presence of three prelates is necessary to that act, and as Bishop White had some doubts in regard to the canonical regularity of Bishop Seabury's consecration, James Madison, D. D., of Virginia, was sent to England and consecrated by the Archbishop of Canterbury. At the Convention of 1792, Bishops White, Provoost, Madison, and Seabury, consecrated Thomas John Claggett, D. D., Bishop of Maryland. Since that time all the bishops of this Church have been consecrated in this country. At the Convention in 1789, canons were adopted for the government of the Church, which have been variously modified by succeeding conventions. By the forty-fifth canon every minister is bound to "use the Book of Common Prayer as the same is or may be established by the authority of the General Convention of this Church; and in performing said service, no other prayers shall be used than those prescribed by the said book." This Liturgy is the same as that of the Church of England, with some changes; e. g.: a shorter form of absolution is allowed, though the other is retained, but the form in the Visitation of the Sick is expunged, as are several portions of the marriage and funeral services, and also the Athanasian Creed. Some other verbal changes are made, as in the prayers for rulers, etc. The Thirty-nine Articles are also adopted, with the exception of the twenty-first, "Of the Authority of General Councils," and modifications of the thirty-fifth, "Of Homilies," the thirty-sixth, "Of Consecration of Bishops and Ministers," and the thirty-seventh, "Of the Power of the Civil Magistrates," to adapt them to the American Church. The Articles were "established" in Convention, September 12, 1801. The Ordinal was "established" September, 1792. By the seventh article of the Constitution, candidates for ordination are required to subscribe this declaration: "I do believe the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, and to contain all things necessary to salvation; and I do solemnly engage to conform to the doctrines and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States." A classical and theological training is also made a prerequisite to ordination, but may be dispensed with at the discretion of the bishop. The age of twenty-one is required for deacon's orders, twenty-four for priest's, and thirty for bishop's. A Collection of Hymns from Watts, Wesley, Newton, Montgomery, and other authors, was set forth by the Conventions of 1789, 1808, and 1826, and a selection from Brady and Tate's Version of the Psalms by the Convention of 1832. The General Convention, which meets trienni-

ally, is composed of two houses: the House of Deputies, which is constituted of representatives of the clergy and laity, of each diocese, consisting "of one or more deputies, not exceeding four of each order, chosen by the convention of the diocese;" and the House of Bishops, which has "a right to originate and propose acts for the concurrence of the House of Deputies, and a negative on any proposed act which may have passed that house." All acts must be authenticated by both Houses. The whole Church is governed by the canons of this Convention. The Diocesan Convention, which meets annually, is composed of the clergy and lay delegates from the various parishes of the diocese, the bishop presiding. A concurrent vote of both orders, when voting separately, is necessary to authenticate any act. The churches choose their own ministers, but their induction requires the consent of the bishop. The temporal affairs of each church are regulated by church-wardens, chosen by the communicants, and a vestry, chosen by the members of the parish generally. The Protestant Episcopal Church is zealously engaged in the work of missions, Sunday-schools, the circulation of books and tracts, and the education of youth. It has three theological seminaries; and some two hundred candidates for the ministry. The leaven of Puseyism has been at work among the clergy, to some extent, but very little, it is thought, among the laity. The Church Almanac for 1857 reports 31 dioceses, 39 bishops, 1903 parishes, 1827 priests and deacons, 116,735 communicants. See "Journal of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, with the Constitution and Canons," "The Book of Common Prayer," etc., Bishop White's "Memoirs of the Episcopal Church," and the article EPISCOPALIANS.]

PROVERBS, short aphorisms, and sententious moral and prudential maxims, usually expressed in numbers, or rhythm, or antithesis, as being more easily remembered, and of more use, than abstruse and methodical discourses. This method of instruction appears to be peculiarly suited to the disposition and genius of the Asiatics, among whom it has prevailed from the earliest ages. The Gymnosophists of India delivered their philosophy in brief enigmatical sentences; a practice adopted and carried to a great extent by the ancient Egyptians. The mode of conveying instruction by compendious maxims obtained among the Jews, from the first dawn of their literature to its final extinction in the east through the power of the Mohammedan arms; and it was familiar to the inhabitants of Syria and Palestine, as we learn from the testimony of St. Jerome. The eloquence of Arabia was mostly exhibited in detached and unconnected sentences, which, like so many loose gems, attracted attention by the fulness of the periods, the elegance of the phraseology, and the acuteness of proverbial sayings. Nor do the Asiatics at present differ in this respect from their ancestors, as numerous amthâl, or moral sentences, are in circulation throughout the regions of the east, some of which have been published by Hottinger, Erpenius, the younger Schultens, and others who have distinguished themselves by the pursuit of oriental learning. "The moralists of the east," says Sir William Jones, "have, in general, chosen to deliver their precepts in short sententious maxims, to illustrate them by sprightly comparisons, or to inculcate them in the very ancient forms of agreeable apologues: there are, indeed, both in Arabic and Persian, philosophical tracts on ethics, written with sound ratiocination and elegant perspicuity; but in every part of the eastern world, from Pekin to Damascus, the popular teachers of moral wisdom have immemorably been poets; and there would be no end of enumerating their works, which are still extant in the five principal languages of Asia." The ingenious but ever disputing and loquacious Greeks were indebted to the same means for their earliest instruction in wisdom. The sayings of the seven wise men, the golden verses of Pythagoras, the remains of Theognis and Phocylides, if genuine, and the gnomai of the older poets, testify the prevalence of aphorisms in ancient Greece. Had no specimens remained of Hellenic proverbs, we might have concluded this to have been the case; for the Greeks borrowed the rudiments if not the principal part of their knowledge from those whom they arrogantly termed barbarians; and it is only through the medium of compendious maxims and brief sentences that traditional knowledge can be preserved. This mode of communicating moral and practical wisdom accorded with the sedate and deliberative character of the Romans; and, in truth, from its influence over the mind, and its fitness for popular instruction, proverbial expressions exist in all ages and in all languages.

Proverbs, in the Hebrew language, are called meshalim, which is derived from a verb signifying both "to rule," "to have dominion," and "to compare," "to liken," "to assimilate:" hence the term denotes the highly figurative and poetical style in general, and likewise those compendious and authoritative sentences in particular which are commonly denominated proverbs. This term, which our translators have adopted after the Vulgate, denotes, according to our great lexicographer, "a short sentence frequently repeated by the people, a saw, an adage;" and no other word can, perhaps, be substituted more accurately expressing the force of the Hebrew; or, if there could, it has been so long familiarized by constant use, that a change is totally inadmissible.

The Meshalim, or Proverbs of Solomon, on account of their intrinsic merit, as well as of the rank and renown of their author, would be received with submissive deference; in consequence of which, they would rapidly spread through every part of the Jewish territories. The pious instructions of the king would be listened to with the attention and respect they deserve, and, no doubt, would be carefully recorded by a people attached to his person, and holding his wisdom in the highest admiration. These, either preserved in writing, or handed down by oral communication, were subsequently collected into one volume, and constitute the book in the sacred canon, entitled, "The Proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel." The genuineness and authenticity of this title, and those in chapter x. 1, and xxv. 1, cannot be disputed; not the smallest reason appears for calling them in question. One portion of the book, from the twenty-fifth chapter to the end of the twenty-ninth, was compiled by the men of Hezekiah, as appears from the title prefixed to it. Eliakim, Shebna, Joah, Isaiah, Hosea, and Micah, personages of eminence and worth, were contemporary with Hezekiah; but whether these or others executed the compilation, it is now impossible to determine. They were persons, however, as we may reasonably suppose, well qualified for the undertaking, who collected what were known to be the genuine proverbs of Solomon from the various writings in which they were dispersed, and arranged them in their present order. Whether the preceding twenty-four chapters—which, doubtless, existed in a combined form previous to the additional collection—were compiled by the author, or some other person, is quite uncertain. Both collections, however, being made at so early a period, is a satisfactory evidence that the Proverbs are the genuine production of Solomon, to whom they are ascribed; for, from the death of Solomon to the reign of Hezekiah, according to the Bible chronology, was a period of two hundred and forty-nine years, or, according to Dr. Hales, two hundred and sixty-five years; too short a space to admit of any forgery or material error, as either must have been immediately detected by the worthies who flourished during the virtuous reign of Hezekiah.

PROVIDENCE, the conduct and direction of the several parts of the universe, by a superior intelligent Being. The notion of a providence is founded upon this truth, that the Creator has not so fixed and ascertained the laws of nature, nor so connected the chain of second causes, as to leave the world to itself, but that he still preserves the reins in his own hands, and occasionally intervenes, alters, restrains, enforces, suspends, etc., those laws by a particular providence. Some use the word providence in a more general sense, signifying by it that power or action by which the several parts of the creation are ordinarily directed. Thus Damascenus defines providence to be that Divine will by which all things are ordered and directed to the proper end: which notion of providence supposes no laws at all fixed by the author of nature at the creation, but that he reserved it at large, to be governed by himself immediately. The Epicureans denied any Divine providence, as thinking it inconsistent with the ease and repose of the Divine nature to meddle at all with human affairs. Simplicius argues thus for a providence: If God does not look to the affairs of the world, it is either because he cannot or will not; but the first is absurd, since to govern cannot be difficult where to create was easy; and the latter is both absurd and blasphemous. In Plato's Tenth Dialogue of Laws, he teaches excellently, that (since what is self-moving is, by its nature, before that which moves only in consequence of being moved) mind must be prior to matter, and the cause of all its modifications and changes; and that, therefore, there is a universal Mind possessed of all perfection, which produced and which actuates all things. After this he shows that the Deity exercises a particular providence over the world, taking care of small no less than great things. In proving this he observes "that a superior nature of such excellence as the Divine, which hears, sees, and knows all things, cannot, in any instance, be subject to negligence or sloth; that the meanest and the greatest part of the world are all equally his work or possession; that great things cannot be rightly taken care of without taking care of small; and that, in all cases, the more able and perfect any artist is, (as a physician, an architect, or the ruler of the state,) the more his skill and care appear in little as well as great things. Let us not then," says he, "conceive of God as worse than even mortal artists."

The term providence, in its primary signification, simply denotes foresight; and if we allow the existence of a Supreme Being who formed the universe at first, we must necessarily allow that he has a perfect foresight of every event which at any time takes place in the natural or moral world. Matter can have no motion, nor spirit any energy, but what is derived from him; nor can he be ignorant of the effects which they will, either separately or conjointly, produce. A common mechanic has knowledge of the work of his own hands: when he puts the machine which he has made in motion, he foresees how long it will go, and what will be the state and position of its several parts at any particular point of time; or, if he is not perfectly able to do this, it is because he is not perfectly acquainted with all the powers of the materials which he has used in its construction: they are not of his making, and they may therefore have qualities which he does not understand, and consequently cannot regulate. But in the immense machine of the universe there is nothing except that which God has made; all the powers and properties, relations and dependencies, which created things have, they have, both in kind and degree, from him. Nothing, therefore, it should seem, can come to pass at any time, or in any part of the universe, which its incomprehensible Architect did not, from the moment his almighty fiat called it into existence, clearly foresee. The providence of God is implied in his very existence as an intelligent Creator; and it imports not only an abstract foresight of all possible events, but such a predisposition of causes and effects, such an adjustment of means and ends, as seems to us to exclude that contingency of human actions with which, as expectants of positive rewards and punishments in another world, we firmly believe it to be altogether consistent.

By providence we may understand, not merely foresight, but a uniform and constant operation of God subsequent to the act of creation. Thus, in every machine formed by human ingenuity, there is a necessity for the action of some extraneous power to put the machine in motion: a proper construction and disposition of parts not being sufficient to effect the end: there must be a spring, or a weight, or an impulse of air or water, or some substance or other, on which the motion of the several parts of the machine must depend. In like manner, the machine of the universe depends upon its Creator for the commencement and the conservation of the motion of its several parts. The power by which the insensible particles of matter coalesce into sensible lumps, as well as that by which the great orbs of the universe are reluctantly, as it were, retained in their courses, admits not an explanation from mechanical causes: the effects of both of them are different from such as mere matter and motion can produce: they must ultimately be referred to God. Vegetable and animal life and increase cannot be accounted for, without recurring to him as the primary cause of both. In all these respects the providence of God is something more than foresight; it is a continual influence, a universal agency: "by him all things consist," and "in him we live, and move, and have our being."

Much labor has been employed to account for all the phenomena of nature by the powers of mechanism, or the necessary laws of matter and motion. But this, as we imagine, cannot be done. The primary causes of things must certainly be some powers and principles not mechanical, otherwise we shall be reduced to the necessity of maintaining an endless progression of motions communicated from matter to matter, without any first mover; or of saying that the first impelling matter moved itself. The former is an absurdity too great to be embraced by any one; and there is reason to hope that the essential inactivity of matter is at present so well understood, and so generally allowed, notwithstanding some modern opposers of this hypothesis, that there can be but few who will care to assert the latter. All our reasonings about bodies, and the whole of natural philosophy, are founded on the three laws of motion laid down by Sir Isaac Newton, at the beginning of the "Principia." These laws express the plainest truths, but they would have neither evidence nor meaning, were not inactivity contained in our idea of matter. Should it be said that matter, though naturally inert, may be made to be otherwise by Divine power, this would be the same with saying that matter may be made not to be matter. If inactivity belong to it at all, it must belong to it as matter, or solid extension, and therefore must be inseparable from it. Matter is figured, movable, discernible, inactive, and capable of communicating motion by impulse to other matter; these are not accidental but primary qualities of matter. Besides, matter void of inactivity, if we were to suppose it possible, could produce no effects. The communication of motion, its direction, the resistance it suffers, and its cessation—in a word, the whole doctrine of motion, cannot be consistently explained or clearly understood without supposing the inertia of matter. Self-moving matter must have thought and design; because, whenever matter moves, it must move in some particular direction, and with some precise degree of velocity; and as there is an infinity of these equally possible, it cannot move itself without selecting one of these preferably to and exclusively of all others, and therefore not without design. Moreover, it may be plainly proved that matter cannot be the ultimate cause of the phenomena of nature, or the agent which, by any powers inherent in itself, produces the general laws of nature, without possessing the highest degree of knowledge and wisdom; which might be easily evinced or exemplified by adverting to the particular law of gravitation. "The philosopher," says an excellent writer, "who overlooks the laws of an all-governing Deity in nature, contenting himself with the appearance of the material universe only, and the mechanical laws of motion, neglects what is most excellent, and prefers what is imperfect to what is supremely perfect, finitude to infinity, what is narrow and weak to what is unlimited and almighty, and what is perishing to what endures for ever. Sir Isaac Newton thought it most unaccountable to exclude the Deity only out of the universe. It appeared to him much more just and reasonable to suppose that the whole chain of causes, or the several series of them, should centre in him as their source; and the whole system appear depending on him, the only independent cause." If, then, the Deity pervades and actuates the material world, and his unremitting energy is the cause to which every effect in it must be traced, the spiritual world, which is of greater consequence, cannot be disregarded by him. Is there one atom of matter on which he does not act? Is there one living being about which he has no concern? Does not a stone fall without him? and does, then, a man suffer without him? The inanimate world is of no consequence abstracted from its subserviency to the animate and reasonable world: the former, therefore, must be preserved and governed entirely with a view to the latter. But it is not mere energy or the constant exertion of power that is discernible in the frame or laws of the universe, in maintaining the succession of men, and in producing men and other beings; but wisdom and skill are also conspicuous in the structure of every object in the inanimate creation. After a survey of the beauty and elegance of the works of nature, aided by the perusal of Matt. vi. 28, etc., we may ask ourselves, Has God, in the lowest of his works, been lavish of wisdom, beauty, and skill, and is he sparing of these in the concerns of reasonable beings? Or does he less regard order, propriety, and fitness in the determination of their states? The answer is obvious. Providence also implies a particular interposition of God in administering the affairs of individuals and nations, and wholly distinct from that general and incessant exertion of his power by which he sustains the universe in existence.

The doctrine of providence may be evinced from the consideration of the Divine perfections. The first cause of all things must be regarded as a being absolutely perfect; and the idea of absolute perfection comprehends infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; hence we deduce the doctrine of providence. The Deity cannot be an indifferent spectator of the series of events in that world to which he has given being. His goodness will as certainly engage him to direct them agreeably to the ends of goodness, as his wisdom and power enable him to do it in the most effectual manner. This conclusion is conformable to all our ideas of those attributes. Could we call that being good who would refuse to do any good which he is able to do without the least labor or difficulty? God is present everywhere. He sees all that happens, and it is in his power, with perfect ease, to order all for the best. Can he then possess goodness and at the same time not do this? A God without a providence is undoubtedly a contradiction. Nothing is plainer than that a being of perfect reason will, in every instance, take such care of the universe as perfect reason requires. That supreme intelligence and love which are present to all things, and from whence all things sprung, must govern all occurrences. These considerations prove what has been called a particular, in opposition to a general providence. We cannot conceive of any reasons that can influence the Deity to exercise any providence over the world, which are not likewise reasons for extending it to all that happens in the world. As far as it is confined to generals, or overlooks any individual, or any event, it is incomplete, and therefore unsuitable to the idea of a perfect being.

One common prejudice against this doctrine arises from the apprehension that it is below the dignity of the Deity to watch over, in the manner implied in it, the meanest beings and the minutest affairs. To which it may be replied, that a great number of minute affairs, if they are each of them of some consequence, make up a sum which is of great consequence; and that there is no way of taking care of this sum, without taking care of each particular. This objection, therefore, under the appearance of honoring God, plainly dishonors him. Nothing is absolutely trifling in which the happiness of any individual, even the most insignificant, is at all concerned; nor is it beneath a wise and good being to interpose in any thing of this kind. To suppose the Deity above this, is to suppose him above acting up to the full extent of goodness and rectitude. The same eternal benevolence that first engaged him to produce beings, must also engage him to exercise a particular providence over them; and the very lowest beings, as well as the highest, seem to have a kind of right to his superintendence, from the act itself of bringing them into existence. Every apprehension that this is too great a condescension in him, is founded on the poorest ideas; for, surely, whatever it was not too great condescension in him to create, it cannot be too great a condescension in him to take care of. Besides, with regard to God, all distinctions in the creation vanish. All beings are infinitely, that is, equally, inferior to him.

Accident, and chance, and fortune, are words which we often hear mentioned, and which is ascribed to them in the life of man. But they are words without meaning; or, as far as they have any signification, they are no other than names for the unknown operations of providence; for it is certain that in God's universe nothing comes to pass causelessly, or in vain. Every event has its own determined direction. That chaos of human affairs and intrigues where we can see no light, that mass of disorder and confusion which they often present to our view, is all clearness and order in the sight of Him who is governing and directing the whole, and bringing forward every event in its due time and place. "The Lord sitteth on the flood. The Lord maketh the wrath of man to praise him," as he maketh the "hail and rain to obey his word. He hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all. A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps." No other principle than this, embraced with a steady faith, and attended with a suitable practice, can ever be able to give repose and tranquillity to the mind; to animate our hopes, or extinguish our fears; to give us any true satisfaction in the enjoyments of life, or to minister consolation under its adversities. If we are persuaded that God governs the world, that he has the superintendence and direction of all events, and that we are the objects of his providential care, whatever may be our distress or our danger, we can never want consolation; we may always have a fund of hope, always a prospect of relief. But take away this hope and this prospect, take away the belief of God and of a superintending providence, and man would be of all creatures the most miserable; destitute of every comfort, every support under present sufferings, and of every security against future dangers. [PROVOST, PRÆPOSITUS. The presiding elders of 1 Thess. v. 12, (προϊστάμενοι,) and 1 Tim. v. 17, (προεστῶτες,) were sometimes called by the Latin fathers, præpositi. The bishops were designated by these terms. The provost of a college is the president.]

PSALMODY. The service of the ancient Christian Church usually began with reading or with the singing of psalms. We are not to understand this as if their psalmody was performed in one course of many psalms together, without intermission, but rather with some respite, and a mixture of other parts of Divine service, to make the whole more agreeable and delightful. As to the persons concerned in singing the psalms publicly in the church, they may be considered in four different respects, according to the different ways of psalmody; for sometimes the psalms were sung by one person alone; and sometimes the whole assembly joined together, men, women, and children: this was the most ancient and general practice. At other times the psalms were sung alternately, the congregation dividing themselves into two parts, and singing verse for verse. Beside all these, there was yet a fourth way of singing, pretty common in the fourth century, which was when a single person began the verse, and the people joined with him in the close.

Psalmody was always esteemed a considerable part of devotion, and upon that account was usually performed in the standing posture. As to the voice or pronunciation used in singing, it was of two sorts, the plain song, and the more artificial. The plain song was only a gentle inflexion, or turn of the voice, not very different from the chanting in our cathedrals; the artificial song seems to have been a regular musical composition, like our anthems. It was no objection against the psalmody of the Church, that she sometimes made use of psalms and hymns of human composition, beside those of the inspired writers. St. Augustin himself made a psalm of many parts, in imitation of the hundred and nineteenth, to preserve his people from the errors of the Donatists. St. Hilary and St. Ambrose likewise made many hymns which were sung in their respective churches. But two corruptions crept into the psalmody, which the fathers declaim against with great zeal. The first was, the introducing secular music, or an imitation of the light airs of the theatre, in the devotions of the Church. The other was, the regarding more the sweetness of the composition than the sense and meaning; thereby pleasing the ear without raising the affections of the soul.

The use of musical instruments in the singing of psalms seems to be as ancient as psalmody itself. The first psalm we read of was sung to a timbrel, namely, that which Moses and Miriam sung after the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt; and afterward at Jerusalem, when the temple was built, musical instruments were constantly used at their public services. And this has been the common practice in all ages of the Church. When the use of organs was first introduced is not certainly known; but we find that about A. D. 660, Constantine Copronymus, Emperor of Constantinople, sent a present of an organ to King Pepin of France.

Clement Marot, groom of the bedchamber to Francis I., King of France, was the first who engaged in translating the Psalms into metre. He versified the first fifty at the instigation of Vatablus, Hebrew professor at Paris; and afterward, upon his return to Geneva, he made an acquaintance with Beza, who versified the rest, and had tunes set to them; and thus they began to be sung in private houses, and afterward were brought into the churches of France, and other countries. In imitation of this version, Sternhold, one of the grooms of the privy chamber to our King Edward VI., undertook a translation of the Psalms into metre. He went through but thirty-seven of them, the rest being soon after finished by Hopkins and others. This translation was at first discountenanced by many of the clergy, who looked upon it as done in opposition to the practice of chanting the Psalms in the cathedrals.

Early in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, metrical psalmody was introduced into this country. The new morning prayer began at St. Antholin's, London, when a psalm was sung in the Geneva fashion, all the congregation, men, women, and boys, singing together. Bishop Jewel says, that "the singing of psalms, begun in one church in London, did quickly spread itself, not only through the city, but in the neighboring places; sometimes at Paul's Cross six thousand people singing together."

A curious controversy on this subject arose among the Dissenters in the end of the seventeenth century. Whether singing in public worship had been partially discontinued during the times of persecution to avoid informers, or whether the miserable manner in which it was performed gave persons a distaste to it, so it appears, that in 1691, Mr. Benjamin Keach published a tract entitled, "The Breach Repaired in God's Worship: or, Psalms, Hymns, etc., proved to be a Holy Ordinance of Jesus Christ." To us it may appear strange that such a point should be disputed; but Mr. Keach was obliged to labor earnestly, and with a great deal of prudence and caution, to obtain the consent of his people to sing a hymn at the conclusion of the Lord's Supper. After six years more they agreed to sing on the thanksgiving days; but it required still fourteen years more before he could persuade them to sing every Lord's day, and then it was only after the last prayer, that those who chose it might withdraw without joining in it! Nor did even this satisfy these scrupulous consciences; for after all a separation took place, and the inharmonious seceders formed a new church in May's Pond, where it was above twenty years longer before singing the praises of God could be endured. It is difficult at this period to believe it; but Mr. Ivimey quotes Mr. Crosby as saying that Mr. Keach's was the first church in which psalm-singing was introduced. This remark, however, must probably be confined to the Baptist churches. The Presbyterians, it seems, were not quite so unmusical; for the Directory of the Westminster divines distinctly stated, that "it is the duty of Christians to praise God publicly by singing of psalms together in the congregation." And beside the old Scotch psalms, Dr. John Patrick, of the Charter House, made a version which was in very general use among Dissenters, Presbyterians and Independents, before it was superseded by the far superior compositions of Dr. Watts. These psalms, however, like those of the English and Scotch establishment, were drawled out in notes of equal length, without accent or variety. Even the introduction of the triple-timed tunes, probably about the time of Dr. Watts's psalms, gave also great offence to some people, because it marked the accent of the measure. Old Mr. Thomas Bradbury used to call this time "a long leg and a short one." The beautiful compositions of Dr. Watts, Mr. C. Wesley, and others, have produced a considerable revolution in modern psalmody. Better versions of the Psalms, and many excellent collections of hymns, are now in use, and may be considered as highly important gifts bestowed upon the modern Church of God. [Lists of metrical English versions of the Psalms are appended to the "Wesleyan Psalter; a poetical version of nearly the whole Book of Psalms, by C. Wesley."]

PSALMS. The book of Psalms is a collection of hymns, or sacred songs, in praise of God, and consists of poems of various kinds. They are the productions of different persons, but are generally called the Psalms of David, because a great part of them was composed by him, and David himself is distinguished by the name of the Psalmist. We cannot now ascertain all the Psalms written by David, but their number probably exceeds seventy; and much less are we able to discover the authors of the other Psalms, or the occasions upon which they were composed. A few of them were written after the return from the Babylonian captivity. The titles prefixed to them are of very questionable authority; and in many cases they are not intended to denote the writer, but refer only to the person who was appointed to set them to music. David first introduced the practice of singing sacred hymns in the public service of God; and it was restored by Ezra. The authority of the Psalms is established not only by their rank among the sacred writings, and by the unvaried testimony of ages, but likewise by many intrinsic proofs of inspiration. Not only do they breathe through every part a divine spirit of eloquence, but they contain numberless illustrious prophecies that were remarkably accomplished, and are frequently appealed to by the evangelical writers. The sacred character of the whole book is established by the testimony of our Saviour and his apostles, who, in various parts of the New Testament, appropriate the predictions of the Psalms as obviously apposite to the circumstances of their lives, and as intentionally composed to describe them. The veneration for the Psalms has in all ages of the Church been considerable. The fathers assure us that in the earlier times the whole book of Psalms was generally learned by heart; and that the ministers of every gradation were expected to be able to repeat them from memory. These invaluable scriptures are daily repeated without weariness, though their beauties are often overlooked in familiar and habitual perusal. As hymns immediately addressed to the Deity, they reduce righteousness to practice; and while we acquire the sentiments, we perform the offices of piety; while we supplicate for blessings, we celebrate the memorial of former mercies; and while in the exercise of devotion, faith is enlivened by the display of prophecy. Josephus asserts, and most of the ancient writers maintain, that the Psalms were composed in metre. They have undoubtedly a peculiar conformation of sentences, and a measured distribution of parts. Many of them are elegiac, and most of David's are of the lyric kind. There is no sufficient reason, however, to believe, as some writers have imagined, that they were written in rhyme, or in any of the Grecian measures. Some of them are acrostic; and though the regulations of the Hebrew measure are now lost, there can be no doubt, from their harmonious modulation, that they were written with some kind of metrical order; and they must have been composed in accommodation to the measure to which they were set. (See POETRY OF THE HEBREWS.) The Hebrew copies and the Septuagint version of this book contain the same number of Psalms; only the Septuagint translators have, for some reason which does not appear, thrown the ninth and tenth into one, as also the one hundred and fourteenth and one hundred and fifteenth, and have divided the one hundred and sixteenth and one hundred and forty-seventh each into two.

It is very justly observed by Dr. Allix, that, "although the sense of near fifty Psalms be fixed and settled by divine authors, yet Christ and his apostles did not undertake to quote all the Psalms they could, but only to give a key to the same subjects the Psalms of the same composure and expression." With regard to the Jews, Bishop Chandler very pertinently remarks, that "they must have understood David, their prince, to have been a figure of Messiah. They would not otherwise have made his Psalms part of their daily worship; nor would David have delivered them to the Church to be so employed, were it not to instruct and support them in the knowledge and belief of this fundamental article. Were the Messiah not concerned in the Psalms, it would have been absurd to celebrate twice a day, in their public devotions, the events of one man's life, who was deceased so long ago as to have no relation now to the Jews and the circumstances of their affairs; or to transcribe whole passages from them into their prayers for the coming of the Messiah." Upon the same principle, it is easily seen that the objections which may seem to lie against the use of Jewish services in Christian congregations may cease at once. Thus it may be said, Are we concerned with the affairs of David and of Israel? Have we any thing to do with the ark and the temple? They are no more. Are we to go up to Jerusalem, and to worship on Sion? They are desolated, and trodden under foot by the Turks. Are we to sacrifice young bullocks according to the law? The law is abolished, never to be observed again. Do we pray for victory over Moab, Edom, and Philistia; or for deliverance from Babylon? There are no such nations, no such places in the world. What then do we mean, when, taking such expressions into our mouths, we utter them in our own persons, as parts of our devotions, before God? Assuredly we must mean a spiritual Jerusalem and Sion; a spiritual ark and temple; a spiritual law; spiritual sacrifices; and spiritual victories over spiritual enemies; all described under the old names, which are still retained, though "old things are passed away, and all things are become new." 2 Cor. v. 17. By substituting Messiah for David, the gospel for the law, the Church Christian for that of Israel, and the enemies of the one for those of the other, the Psalms are made our own. Nay, they are with more fulness and propriety applied now to the substance, than they were of old to the "shadow of good things then to come." Heb. x. 1. For let it not pass unobserved, that when, upon the first publication of the gospel, the apostles had occasion to utter their transports of joy, on their being counted worthy to suffer for the name of their Lord and Master, which was then opposed by Jew and Gentile, they broke forth into an application of the second Psalm to the transactions then before their eyes. Acts iv. 25. The Psalms, thus applied, have advantages which no fresh compositions, however finely executed, can possibly have; since, beside their incomparable fitness to express our sentiments, they are at the same time memorials of, and appeals to, former mercies and deliverances; they are acknowledgments of prophecies accomplished; they point out the connection between the old and new dispensations, thereby teaching us to admire and adore the wisdom of God displayed in both, and furnishing, while we read or sing them, an inexhaustible variety of the noblest matter that can engage the contemplations of man.

Very few of the Psalms, comparatively, appear to be simply prophetic, and to belong only to Messiah, without the intervention of any other person. Most of them, it is apprehended, have a double sense, which stands upon this ground and foundation, that the ancient patriarchs, prophets, priests, and kings, were typical characters, in their several offices, and in the more remarkable passages of their lives, their extraordinary depressions and miraculous exaltations foreshowing him who was to arise as the head of the holy family, the great prophet, the true priest, the everlasting king. The Israelitish polity, and the law of Moses, were purposely framed after the example and shadow of things spiritual and heavenly; and the events which happened to the ancient people of God were designed to shadow out parallel occurrences, which should afterward take place in the accomplishment of man's redemption, and the rise and progress of the Christian Church. (See PROPHECY.) For this reason, the Psalms composed for the use of Israel, and by them accordingly used at the time, do admit of an application to us, who are now "the Israel of God," Gal. vi. 16, and to our Redeemer, who is the King of this Israel. It would be an arduous and adventurous undertaking to attempt to lay down the rules observed in the conduct of the mystic allegory, so diverse are the modes in which the Holy Spirit has thought proper to communicate his counsels to different persons on different occasions; inspiring and directing the minds of the prophets according to his good pleasure; at one time vouchsafing more full and free discoveries of future events; while, at another, he is more obscure and sparing in his intimations. From hence, of course, arises a great variety in the Scripture usage of this kind of allegory as to the manner in which the spiritual sense is couched under the other. Sometimes it can hardly break forth and show itself at intervals through the literal, which meets the eye as the ruling sense, and seems to have taken entire possession of the words and phrases. On the contrary, it is much oftener the capital figure in the piece, and stands confessed at once by such splendor of language, that the letter, in its turn, is thrown into shade, and almost totally disappears. Sometimes it shines with a constant equable light, and sometimes it darts upon us on a sudden, like a flash of lightning from the clouds. But a composition is never more truly elegant and beautiful than when the two senses, alike conspicuous, run parallel together through the whole poem, mutually corresponding with and illustrating each other.

Thus the establishment of David upon his throne, notwithstanding the opposition made to it by his enemies, is the subject of the second Psalm. David sustains in it a twofold character, literal and allegorical. If we read over the Psalm first with an eye to the literal David, the meaning is obvious, and put out of all dispute by the sacred history. There is indeed an uncommon glow in the expression, and sublimity in the figures; and the diction is now and then exaggerated, as it were, on purpose to intimate and lead us to the contemplation of higher and more important matters concealed within. In compliance with this admonition, if we take another survey of the Psalm, as relative to the person and concerns of the spiritual David, a nobler series of events instantly rises to view, and the meaning becomes more evident, as well as exalted. The coloring, which may perhaps seem too bold and glaring for the King of Israel, will no longer appear so, when laid upon his great Antitype. After we have thus attentively considered the subjects apart, let us look at them together, and we shall behold the full beauty and majesty of this most charming poem. We shall perceive the two senses very distinct from each other, yet conspiring in perfect harmony, and bearing a wonderful resemblance in every feature and lineament, while the analogy between them is so exactly preserved, that either may pass for the original, from whence the other was copied. New light is continually cast upon the phraseology, fresh weight and dignity are added to the sentiment, till gradually ascending from things below to things above, from human affairs to those which are Divine, they bear the great important theme upward with them, and at length place it in the height and brightness of heaven. What has been observed with regard to this Psalm, may also be applied to the seventy-second; the subject of which is of the same kind, and treated in the same manner. Its title might be, "The Inauguration of Solomon." The scheme of the allegory is alike in both; but a diversity of matter occasions an alteration in the diction. For whereas one is employed in celebrating the magnificent triumphs of victory, it is the design of the other to draw a pleasing picture of peace, and of that felicity which is her inseparable attendant. The style is therefore of a more even and temperate sort, and more richly ornamented. It abounds not with those sudden changes of the person speaking which dazzle and astonish; but the imagery is borrowed from the delightful scenes with which creation cheers the sight, and the pencil of the Divine artist is dipped in the softer colors of nature. And here we may take notice how peculiarly adapted to the genius of this kind of allegory the parabolical style is, on account of that great variety of natural images to be found in it. For as these images are capable of being employed in the illustration of things Divine and human, between which there is a certain analogy maintained, so they easily afford that ambiguity which is necessary in this species of composition, where the language is applicable to each sense, and obscure in neither; it comprehends both parts of the allegory, and may be clearly and distinctly referred to one or the other.

On this book Bishop Horsley remarks: These Psalms go, in general, under the name of the Psalms of David. King David gave a regular and noble form to the musical part of the Jewish service. He was himself a great composer, both in poetry and music, and a munificent patron, no doubt, of arts in which he himself so much delighted and excelled. The Psalms, however, appear to be compositions of various authors, in various ages; some much more ancient than the times of King David, some of a much later age. Of many, David himself was undoubtedly the author; and that those of his composition were prophetic, we have David's own authority, which may be allowed to overpower a host of modern expositors. For thus King David, at the close of his life, describes himself and his sacred songs: "David, the son of Jesse, said, and the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and sweet psalmist of Israel, said, The Spirit of Jehovah spake by me, and his word was in my tongue." It was the word, therefore, of Jehovah's Spirit which was uttered by David's tongue. But it should seem, the Spirit of Jehovah would not be wanting to enable a mere man to make complaint of his own enemies, to describe his own sufferings just as he felt them, and his own escapes just as they happened. But the Spirit of Jehovah described by David's utterance what was known to that Spirit only, and that Spirit only could describe. So that, if David be allowed to have any knowledge of the true subject of his own compositions, it was nothing in his own life, but something put into his mind by the Holy Spirit of God; and the misapplication of the Psalms to the literal David has done more mischief than the misapplication of any other parts of the Scriptures among those who profess the belief of the Christian religion.

The Psalms are all poems of the lyric kind, that is, adapted to music, but with great variety in the style of composition. Some are simply odes. An ode is a dignified sort of song, narrative of the facts, either of public history or private life, in a highly adorned and figured style. But the figure in the Psalms is that which is peculiar to the Hebrew language, in which the figure gives its meaning with as much perspicuity as the plainest speech. Some are of the sort called elegiac, which are pathetic compositions upon mournful subjects. Some are ethic, delivering grave maxims of life, or the precepts of religion, in solemn, but for the most part simple strains. Some are enigmatic, delivering the doctrines of religion in enigmas contrived to strike the imagination forcibly, and yet easy to be understood. In all these the author delivers the whole matter in his own person. But a very great, I believe the far greater part are a sort of dramatic ode, consisting of dialogues between persons sustaining certain characters. In these dialogue Psalms the persons are frequently the psalmist himself, or the chorus of priests and Levites, or the leader of the Levitical band, opening the ode with a proem declarative of the subject, and very often closing the whole with a solemn admonition drawn from what the other persons say. The other persons are Jehovah, sometimes as one, sometimes as another of the three Persons; Christ in his incarnate state, sometimes before, sometimes after his resurrection; the human soul of Christ as distinguished from the Divine essence. Christ in his incarnate state, is personated sometimes as a priest, sometimes as a king, sometimes as a conqueror; and in those Psalms in which he is introduced as a conqueror, the resemblance is very remarkable between this conqueror in the book of Psalms and the warrior on the white horse in the book of Revelation, who goes forth with a crown on his head, and a bow in his hand, conquering and to conquer. And the conquest in the Psalms is followed, like the conquest in the Revelation, by the marriage of the conqueror. These are circumstances of similitude which, to any one versed in the prophetic style, prove beyond a doubt that the mystical conqueror is the same personage in both. [The word Psalms comes from ψάλλω, to strike a stringed instrument, to sing. The Hebrew name of the book is Tehillim, usually derived from halal, to move briskly, and rendered Praises. For an interesting analysis of this book, see A. Clarke's Introduction and Notes to the Psalms, and works cited by him.]

[PSALTER. The book of Psalms. In the Church of England it is so arranged that it may be read through once a month. In the Hebrew Bible it is divided into five books: I. Ps. i.-xlii. II. Ps. xlii.-lxxii. III. Ps. lxxiii.-lxxxix. IV. Ps. xc.-cvi. V. Ps. cvii.-cl. The Church of Rome divided it into five parts, corresponding with the Pentateuch.—The Papists call a series of one hundred and fifty sentences in honor of the sufferings of Christ, a Psalter; also a rosary of one hundred and fifty beads.]

PUBLICAN, a collector or receiver of the Roman revenues. Judea being added to the provinces of the Roman empire, and the taxes paid by the Jews directly to the emperor, the publicans were the officers appointed to collect them. The ordinary taxes which the Romans levied in the provinces were of three sorts: 1. Customs upon goods imported and exported, which tribute was therefore called portorium, from portus, "a haven." 2. A tax upon cattle fed in certain pastures belonging to the Roman state, the number of which being kept in writing, this tribute was called scriptura. 3. A tax upon corn, of which the government demanded a tenth part. This tribute was called decuma. These publicans are distinguished by Sigonius into three sorts or degrees—the farmers of the revenue, their partners, and their securities; in which he follows Polybius. These are called the manicipes, socii, and prædes, who were all under the quæstores æarii, that presided over the finances at Rome. The manicipes farmed the revenue of large districts or provinces, had the oversight of the inferior publicans, received their accounts and collections, and transmitted them to the quæstores æarii. They often let out their provinces in smaller parcels to the socii: so called because they were admitted to a share in the contract, perhaps for the sake of more easily raising the purchase-money; at least, to assist in collecting the tribute. Both the manicipes and socii are therefore properly styled τελῶναι, from τέλος, tributum, and ὀνέσθαι, emo. They were obliged to procure prædes, or sureties, who gave security to the government for the fulfilment of the contract. The distribution of Sigonius, therefore, or rather of Polybius, is not quite exact, since there were properly but two sorts of publicans, the manicipes and the socii. The former are, probably, those whom the Greeks call ἀρχιτελῶναι, chiefs of the publicans; of which sort was Zaccheus. As they were superior to the common publicans in dignity, being mostly of the equestrian order, so they were generally in their moral character. But as for the common publicans, the collectors or receivers, as many of the socii were, they are spoken of with great contempt, by heathens as well as Jews, and particularly by Theocritus, who said, that "among the beasts of the wilderness, bears and lions are the most cruel; among the beasts of the city, the publican and parasite." The reason of the general hatred to them was, doubtless, their rapine and extortion; for, having a share in the farm of the tribute at a certain rate, they were apt to oppress the people with illegal exactions, to raise as large a fortune as they could for themselves. Besides, publicans were particularly odious to the Jews, who looked upon them to be the instruments of their subjection to the Roman emperors, to which they generally held it sinful for them to submit. They considered it as incompatible with their liberty to pay tribute to any foreign power, Luke xx. 22, etc.; and those of their own nation that engaged in this employment they regarded as heathens. Matt. xviii. 17. It is even said that they would not allow them to enter into their temple or synagogues, nor to join in prayers, nor even allow their evidence in a court of justice on any trial; nor would they accept of their offerings in the temple.

It appears by the Gospel that there were many publicans in Judea at the time of our Saviour. Zaccheus was probably one of the principal receivers, since he is called the chief of the publicans, Luke xix. 2; but St. Matthew was only an inferior publican. The Jews reproached our Saviour for showing kindness to these persons, Luke vii. 34; and he himself ranks them with harlots. Matt. xxi. 31. Some of them, it should seem, had humbling views of themselves. Luke xviii. 10. Zaccheus assures our Lord, who had honored him with a visit, that he was ready to give the half of his goods to the poor, Luke xix. 8, and to return fourfold of whatever he had unjustly acquired.

PUBLIUS, the governor of Melita. Acts xxviii. 7-9. When St. Paul was shipwrecked on this island, Publius received him and his company into his house very kindly, and treated them for three days with great humanity.

[PUDENS. Some think that Pudens, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 21, was the distinguished Roman spoken of by Martial, in his Epigrams, (iv. 13; xi. 54,) as married to Claudia, a British lady having the cognomen of Rufina—as they suppose, from the Rufus mentioned by Paul, Rom. xvi. 13, and also by Martial, as taking an interest in Claudia's marriage. See "Claudia and Pudens, by J. Williams." Dr. Alexander, in his "Ancient British Church," and others, oppose this view.]

PUL, King of Assyria. He came into the land of Israel in the time of Menahem, King of the ten tribes, 2 Kings xv. 19, etc., and invaded the kingdom on the other side of Jordan. But Menahem, by a present of one thousand talents of silver, prevailed on the King of Assyria not only to withdraw his forces, but to recognize his title to the crown of Israel before he left the kingdom. This is the first time that we find any mention made of the kingdom of Assyria since the days of Nimrod; and Pul is the first monarch of that nation who invaded Israel, and began their transportation out of their own country.

[PUL. Isa. lxvi. 19. This is supposed to be Philæ, an island of the Nile, near the Nubian frontier. Φιλαί is supposed to come from the Egyptian Philakh, the extremity. It is now called Djesiret el Birbe, or Temple-island, from the remains of four Egyptian temples, which, with other ruins, are found upon it.]

PULSE, קלי, Lev. xxi. 14: 1 Sam. xvii. 17: 2 Sam. xvii. 28: a term applied to those grains or seeds which grow in pods, as beans, peas, vetches, etc., from פול, a bean. The Vulgate renders kali in 2 Sam. xvii. 28, frizum cicer, "parched peas." In Daniel i. 12, 16, the word ורעים, rendered pulse, may signify seeds in general.

PUNISHMENTS OF THE HEBREWS. There were several sorts of punishments in use among the Jews which are mentioned in the Scripture. 1. The punishment of the cross. (See Cross.) 2. Suspension. Esther vii. 10: Joshua viii. 29: 2 Samuel xxi. 12. 3. Stoning. 4. Fire. This punishment was common. Gen. xxxviii. 24: Leviticus xxi. 9. 5. The rack or tympanum, mentioned Heb. xi. 35. Commentators are much divided about the meaning of this punishment; but most of them are of opinion that the bastinado, or the punishment of the stick, is intended, and that the apostle alludes to the cruelties exercised upon old Eleazar; for, in 2 Macc. vi. 19, where his martyrdom is spoken of, it is said that he came to the tympanum. 6. The precipice, or throwing persons headlong from a rock, with a stone tied about the neck. 2 Chron. xxv. 12. 7. Decapitation. Gen. xl. 19: Judges ix. 5: 2 Kings x. 7: Matt. xiv. 8. 8. The punishment of the saw, or to be cut asunder in the middle. Heb. xi. 37. This punishment was not unknown to the Hebrews. Some think it was originally from the Persians or Chaldeans. 9. Plucking out the eyes. Exod. xxi. 24. Some think this punishment was seldom executed, but the offender was made to suffer in his property rather than in his person; yet there are some instances on record. Judges xvi. 21: 1 Sam. xi. 2: 2 Kings xxv. 7. 10. The cutting off the extremities of the feet and hands. Judges i. 5-7: 2 Sam. iv. 12. [11. Casting into the lion's den. Dan. vi. 12. Fighting with wild beasts. 1 Cor. xv. 32. 13. Drowning. Matt. xviii. 6. 14. Bruising to death in a mortar. Prov. xxvii. 22. 15. Suffocating in a high tower containing ashes, which were stirred up by a wheel—a Persian punishment. 2 Macc. xiii. 4-6. 16. Imprisonment. Matt. xviii. 30, 34: 2 Cor. xi. 23. 17. Scourging. Lev. xix. 20: 2 Cor. xi. 23-25. 18. Subjection to slavery. 2 Kings iv. 1: Matt. xviii. 25. 19. Plucking off the hair. Neh. xiii. 25: Isa. i. 6. 20. Fining. Exod. xxi. 22, 30;

xxii. 1, 4. 21. The lex talionis. Exod. xxi. 23-25. 22. Excision from the people. Exod. xxx. 33. Compare Gen. iv. 12-14: 2 Thess. i. 9.]

[PUNON. A station of the Israelites, Num. xxxiii. 42, identified with Phaino, and Metallophænon, because of its mines of metals. Eusebius locates it between Petra and Segor. Athanasius says that criminals sent to labor in those mines lived but a few days. Bishops of Phænos subscribed the decrees of some of the ancient councils. Some think that here Moses erected the brazen serpent; others think this was at ZALMONAH.]

PUR, פּוּר, κλήρος, signifies lot. Pur, Phur, or Purim, was a solemn feast of the Jews, instituted in memory of the lots cast by Haman, the enemy of the Jews. Esther iii. 7. These lots were cast in the first month of the year, and gave the twelfth month of the same year for the execution of Haman's design, to destroy all the Jews in Persia. Thus the superstition of Haman, in crediting these lots, caused his own ruin, and the preservation of the Jews, who, by means of Esther, had time to avert this blow. The Jews have exactly kept this feast down to our times. See HAMAN, ESTHER, and MORDECAI.

PURGATORY, a place in which, according to the Church of Rome, the just, who depart out of this life, are supposed to expiate certain offences which do not merit eternal damnation. Broughton has endeavored to prove that this notion has been held by Pagans, Jews, and Mohammedans, as well as by Christians; and that in the days of the Maccabees the Jews believed that sin might be expiated by sacrifice after the death of the sinner. The arguments advanced for purgatory by the Papists are these: Every sin, how slight soever, though no more than an idle word, as it is an offence to God, deserves punishment from him, and will be punished by him hereafter, if not cancelled by repentance here. 2. Such small sins do not deserve eternal punishment. 3. Few depart this life so pure as to be totally exempt from spots of this nature, and from every kind of debt due to God's justice. 4. Therefore, few will escape without suffering something from his justice for such debts as they have carried with them out of this world, according to the rule of Divine justice, by which he treats every soul hereafter according to his works, and according to the state in which he finds it in death. From these positions, which the Papist considers as so many self-evident truths, he infers that there must be some third place of punishment; for since the infinite holiness of God can admit nothing into heaven that is not clean and pure from all sin, both great and small, and his infinite justice can permit none to receive the reward of bliss who as yet are not out of debt, but have something in justice to suffer, there must, of necessity, be some place or state where souls, departing this life, pardoned as to the eternal guilt of sin, yet obnoxious to some temporal penalty, or with the guilt of some venial faults, are purged and purified before their admittance into heaven. And this is what he is taught concerning purgatory: though he knows not where it is, of what nature the pains are, or how long each soul is detained there, yet he believes that those who are in this place are relieved by the prayers of their fellow-members here on earth, as also by alms and masses offered up to God for their souls. And as for such as have no relations or friends to pray for them, or give alms to procure masses for their relief, they are not neglected by the Church, which makes a general commemoration of all the faithful departed, in every mass, and in every one of the canonical hours of the Divine office. Besides the above arguments, the following passages are alleged as proofs: 2 Macc. xii. 43-45: Matt. xii. 31, 32: 1 Cor. iii. 15: 1 Peter iii. 19. But it may be observed, 1. That the books of Maccabees have no evidence of inspiration, therefore quotations from them are not to be regarded. 2. If they were, the texts referred to would rather prove that there is no such place as purgatory, since Judas did not expect the souls departed to reap any benefit from the sin-offering till the resurrection. The texts quoted from the Scriptures have no reference to the doctrine, as may be seen by consulting the context, and any just commentator upon it. 3. The Scriptures, in general, speak of departed souls going immediately, at death, to a fixed state of happiness or misery, and give us no idea of purgatory. Isaiah lvii. 2: Rev. xiv. 13: Luke xvi. 22: 2 Cor. v. 8. 4. It is derogatory from the doctrine of the satisfaction of Christ. If Christ died for us, and redeemed us from sin and hell, as the Scripture speaks, then the idea of further meritorious suffering detracts from the perfection of his sacrifice, and places merit still in the creature; a doctrine exactly opposite to the Scriptures.

[PURIFICATION OF THE VIRGIN MARY. The fortieth day after Christmas—February 2—kept in honor of the purification of the Virgin. It was established in the sixth century. It is also called Festum Candelarum, Candlemas, candles being used in its celebration, because Christ is “a light to lighten the Gentiles.” The Romanists consecrate all their sacred candles on this day.]

PURITANS. In England, the term Puritans was applied to those who wished for a further degree of reformation in the Church than was adopted by Queen Elizabeth; and a purer form, not of faith, but of discipline and worship. It was a common name given to all who, from conscientious motives, though on different grounds, disapproved of the established religion, from the reformation under Elizabeth to the Act of Uniformity in 1662. From that time to the revolution in 1688, as many as refused to comply with the established worship (among whom were about two thousand clergymen, and perhaps five hundred thousand people) were denominated Nonconformists. From the passing of the Act of Toleration on the accession of William and Mary, the name of Nonconformists was changed to that of Protestant Dissenters. Prior to the grand rebellion in 1640, the Puritans were, almost without exception, Episcopalians; but after the famous “League and Covenant” of those turbulent times, the greater part of them became Presbyterians. Some, however, were Independents, and some Baptists. The objections of the latter were more fundamental: they disapproved of all national Churches, as such, and disavowed the authority of human legislation in matters of faith and worship. The persecutions carried on against the Puritans during the reigns of Elizabeth and the Stuarts served to lay the foundation of a new empire, and eventually a vast republic, in the western world. Thither, as into a wilderness, they fled from the face of their persecutors; and, being protected in the free exercise of their religion, continued to increase, until at length they became an independent nation. The different principles, however, on which they had originally divided from the Church establishment at home, operated in a way that might have been expected, when they came to the possession of the civil power abroad. Those who formed the colony of Massachusetts having never relinquished the principle of a national Church, and of the power of the civil magistrate in matters of faith and worship, were less tolerant than those who settled at New Plymouth, at Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations. The very men who had just escaped the persecutions of the English prelates, now, in their turn, persecuted others who dissented from them; until, at length, the liberal system of toleration established in the parent country at the revolution, extended to the colonies, and in a good measure put an end to these censurable proceedings.

PURPLE, אַרְבֶּנֶן, Exod. xxv. 4, etc.; πορφύρα, Mark xv. 17, 20: Luke xvi. 19: John xix. 2, 5: Rev. xvii. 4; xviii. 12, 16. This is supposed to be the very precious color extracted from the purpura or murex, a species of shell-fish; and the same with the famous Tyrian dye, so costly, and so much celebrated in antiquity. The purple dye is called in 1 Macc. iv. 23, “purple of the sea,” or sea purple; it being the blood or juice of a turbinated shell-fish, which the Jews call חִלְזֹן. (See SCARLET.) Among the blessings pronounced by Moses upon the tribes of Israel, those of Zebulun and Issachar are, “They shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of the treasures hid in the sand.” Deut. xxxiii. 19. Jonathan Ben Uzziel explains the latter clause thus: “From the sand are produced looking-glasses, and glass in general; the treasures, the method of finding and working which was revealed to these tribes.” Several ancient writers inform us that there were havens in the coasts of the Zebulunites, in which the sand proper for making glass was found. The words of Tacitus are remarkable: “Et Belus amnis Judaico mari illabitur, circa ejus os lectæ arenæ admixto nitro in vitrum excoquantur.”—“The river Belus falls into the Jewish sea, about whose mouth those sands mixed with nitre are collected, out of which glass is formed.” But it seems much more natural to explain “the treasures hid in the sand,” of those highly valuable murexes and purpurae which were found on the sea-coast, near the country of Zebulun and Issachar, and of which those tribes partook in common with their heathen neighbors of Tyre, who rendered the curious dyes made from those shell-fish so famous among the Romans by the names of Sarranum ostrum, Tyrii colores. In reference to the purple vestment, Luke xvi. 19, it may be observed that this was not appropriately a royal robe. In the earlier times it was the dress of any of high rank. Thus all the courtiers were styled by the historians purpurati. This color is more properly crimson than purple; for the LXX., Josephus, and Philo, constantly use πορφύρεον to express the Hebrew אֶרְבֶּנְךָ, by which the Talmudists understood crimson; and that this Hebrew word expressed, not the Tyrian purple, but that brought to the city from another country, appears from Ezek. xxvii. 7. The purple robe put on our Saviour, John xix. 2, 5, is explained by a Roman custom, the dressing of a person in the robes of state, as the investiture of office. Hence the robe brought by Herod's or the Roman soldiers, scoffingly, was as though it had been the picte vestes usually sent by the Roman senate. In Acts xvi. 14, Lydia is said to be "a seller of purple." Mr. Harmer styles purple the most sublime of all earthly colors, having the gaudiness of red, of which it retains a shade, softened with the gravity of blue.

[PUSEYITES. A party in the Church of England and its affiliated branches, so called from E. B. Pusey, D. D., Regius Professor of Hebrew in Oxford University. The Puseyites are also called TRACTARIANS, from a series of "Tracts for the Times," issued by some of the Oxford Professors, hence denominated "Oxford Tracts." Ninety of these books were published, when the continuation of the series was interdicted by the authorities of the Church, on the ground of their opposition to its standards. They interpret the Articles and Liturgy in a "non-natural sense," so as to make subscription to them not incompatible with a belief in the Tridentine system, or one very nearly resembling it. The Puseyites are great sticklers for the uninterrupted prelatical succession, and for the priestly prerogatives of the clergy: they do not recognize the infallibility of the pope, but are not averse to his primacy, secundum canones, as allowed by ancient canons. As a matter of course, they abjure the title "Protestant," and denounce the "Reformation." Their progress has been somewhat arrested by the overt secession of many of them to the Romish Church, among whom are the Rev. J. H. Newman, B. D., Fellow of Oriel College, one of their prime leaders, and "The Lord Bishop of North Carolina," as Dr. Ives was styled by the English Puseyites before his defection. They are generally more inclined to go over to Rome than to form a separate organization.]

PUTEOLI—so called from its baths of hot water—a city of Campania, in Italy, now called Pozzuoli, in a province of the kingdom of Naples, called Terra di Lavoro, and about eight miles from Naples. St. Paul stayed a week with the Christians of this place, in his journey as a prisoner to Rome. Acts xxviii. 13. The Alexandrian merchant-vessels preferred Puteoli to all the harbors in Italy, and here they deposited their rich freights. They conducted the ships, adorned with wreaths and festive garments, in the form of a fleet, one after another, into the harbor, where they were received with the greatest demonstrations of friendship. Such was the case with the sale of Alexandrian commodities throughout Italy. According to the course then pursued, the vessel in which St. Paul sailed went direct into this harbor.

[PYX. A case for the host—sometimes made in the form of a dove, and hung over the altar.]

[QUADRAGENE. A Popish indulgence of forty days.]

[QUADRAGESIMA. Lent, so called because it lasts forty days. Quadragesima Sunday is the first Sunday in Lent.]

QUAIL, שָׂמֹר, Exod. xvi. 13: Num. xi. 31, 32: Psalm cv. 10: a bird of the gallinaceous kind. Hasselquist, mentioning the quail of the larger kind, says, "It is of the size of the turtle-dove. I have met with it in the wilderness of Palestine, near the shores of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, between Jordan and Jericho, and in the deserts of Arabia Petrea. If the food of the Israelites was a bird, this is certainly it; being so common in the places through which they passed." It is said that God gave quails to his people in the wilderness upon two occasions: first, within a few days after they had passed the Red Sea. Exod. xvi. 3–13. The second time was at the encampment at the place called in Hebrew, Kibroth-hataavah, the graves of lust, Num. xi. 32: Psalm cv. 40. Both of these happened in the spring, when the quails passed from Asia into Europe. They are then to be found in great quantities upon the coast of the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. God caused a wind to arise that drove them within and about the camp of the Israelites; and it is in this that the miracle consists, that they were brought so seasonably to this place, and in so great number as to furnish food for above a million of persons for more than a month. The Hebrew word shalav signifies "a quail," by the agreement of the ancient interpreters. And the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic languages call them nearly by the same name. The Septuagint, Symmachus, and most of commentators, both ancient and modern, understand it in the same manner; and with them agree Philo, Josephus, Apollinaris, and the rabbins; but Ludolphus has endeavored to prove that a species of locust is spoken of by Moses. Dr. Shaw answers, that the holy Psalmist, in describing this particular food of the Israelites, by calling the animals feathered fowls, entirely confutes this supposition. And it should be recollected, that this miracle was performed in compliance with the wish of the people that they might have flesh to eat.

QUAKERS. See FRIENDS.

[QUARRIES. Some think that by פְּסִלִים, pesilim, in Judg. iii. 19, 26, are meant the quarries where idols were hewn, as the word comes from פָּסַל, to cut; but why may it not mean "graven images," as in Isa. xliii. 8, and other places? The pesilim may have been Moabitish Termini.]

[QUARTODECIMANI. Before the Council of Nice, the oriental Churches kept the anniversary of Christ's death on the fourteenth day of the first Hebrew month; but that council determined in favor of the western rule. Those who persisted in the former course were called Quartodecimani, and sometimes Paschiles.]

[QUASIMODOGENITI. This title for the first Sunday after Easter is taken from 1 Pet. ii. 2, Quasi modo geniti, etc.]

[QUATERNION. Τετράδιον. Acts xii. 4, 6, 19. A night-guard of four soldiers. As the watch was changed every three hours, four quaternions were appointed for the night. Two soldiers watched inside, and two outside of the prison door.]

[QUEEN OF HEAVEN. See ASHTAROTH.]

QUESTIONS. Among the ancients no pastime was more common than that of proposing and answering difficult questions. The person who solved the question was honored with a reward; he who failed in the attempt suffered a certain punishment; both the rewards and penalties were varied according to the disposition of the company. That the custom of proposing riddles was very ancient, and derived from the eastern nations, appears from the story of Samson, in the book of Judges, who proposed one to the Philistines at his nuptial feast. Nor were these questions confined to entertainments, but, in the primitive times, were proposed on other occasions, by those who desired to make proof of another's wisdom and learning. Agreeably to this custom, the Queen of Sheba came to prove Solomon with hard questions. 1 Kings x. 1.

[QUICK, QUICKEN. These words in Scripture mean alive, to make alive, either in a natural (Num. xvi. 30: Ps. lv. 15; cxiv. 3: 1 Tim. iv. 1) or a spiritual sense, (Eph. ii. 1.) דרירו, Isa. xi. 3, rendered, "shall make him quick of understanding," is literally, "shall make him smell:" some interpret it, "He shall readily discern those who have the fear of the Lord."

[QUICKSANDS. Acts xxvii. 17. Conybeare and Howson say κύρτις means "the notoriously dangerous bay between Tunis and Tripoli." There are two of these gulfs: Syrtis major, north of Tripoli, four or five thousand stadia in circumference, now called the Gulf of Sidra—this is thought to be that mentioned by Luke—and Syrtis minor, the Gulf of Cabes, east of Tunis. The banks in those gulfs are very dangerous, on account of the shifting of the sands.]

QUIETISTS, the disciples of Michael de Molinos, a Spanish priest, who flourished in the seventeenth century, and wrote a book called "The Spiritual Guide." He had many disciples in Spain, Italy, France, and the Netherlands. Some pretend that he borrowed his principles from the Spanish Illuminati; and M. Gregoire will have it that they came originally from the Persian Soofees; while others no less confidently derive them from the Greek Hesycasts. The Quietists, however, deduce their principles from the Scriptures. They argue thus: "The Apostle tells us that 'the Spirit makes intercession for' or in 'us.' Now if the Spirit pray in us, we must resign ourselves to his impulses by remaining in a state of absolute rest, or quietude, till we attain the perfection of the unitive life," a life of union with, and, as it should seem, of absorption in, the Deity. They contend that true religion consists in the present calm and tranquillity of a mind removed from all external and finite things, and centred in God; and in such a pure love of the Supreme Being as is independent of all prospect of interest or reward. To prove that our love to the Deity must be disinterested, they allege that the Lord hath made all things for himself, as saith the Scripture; and it is for his glory that he wills our happiness. To conform, therefore, to the great end of our creation, we must prefer God to ourselves, and not desire our own happiness but for his glory; otherwise we shall go contrary to his order. As the perfections of the Deity are intrinsically amiable, it is our glory and perfection to go out of ourselves, to be lost and absorbed in the pure love of infinite beauty. Madame Guion, a woman of fashion in France, born 1648, becoming pious, was a warm advocate of these principles. She asserted that the means of arriving at this perfect love, are prayer and the self-denial enjoined in the gospel. Prayer she defines to be the entire bent of the soul towards its Divine origin. Some of her pious canticles were translated by the poet Cowper, and represent her sentiments to the best advantage. Fénelon, the amiable Archbishop of Cambray, also favored these sentiments in his celebrated publication, entitled, "The Maxims of the Saints." The distinguishing tenet in his theology was the doctrine of the disinterested love of God for his own excellences, independent of his relative benevolence: an important feature also in the system of Madame Guion, who, with the good archbishop, was persecuted by the pope and by Bossuet. See MYSTICS.

[QUINQUAGESIMA. Shrove Sunday—the fiftieth day before Easter.]

[QUINQUARTICULAR CONTROVERSY. A dispute on the "Five Points"—particularly that which arose at Cambridge, A. D. 1594. In 1626 two conferences were held on these points; and in 1630 Bishop Davenant preached on them at court, and gave great offence to Charles I. In 1631 the controversy was revived at Oxford and in Ireland. The king set bounds to the discussion, which being transcended by Thomas Cooke, in a Latin sermon before the University of Oxford, in 1634, he was forced to make a public recantation.]

[QUINTILLANI. Followers of Quintilla, a Montanist prophetess of Phrygia, A. D. 189. They attributed extraordinary gifts to Eve, because she ate the forbidden fruit. They were sticklers for women's rights in regard to the exercise of episcopal and other ministerial offices, citing the case of Miriam and that of Philip's daughters in defence of their practice. They were condemned by the Council of Laodicea, A. D. 320.]

[QUIVER. An arrow-case, Gen. xxvii. 3. It stands for destruction in Jer. v. 16: the quiver—that is, the arrows it contained—should bring death. Compare Ps. cxxvii. 5: Isa. xlix. 2.]

[RAAMAH. Son of Cush. Gen. x. 7. Some identify the name with Regma, a city near the Persian Gulf. Ezek. xxvii. 22.]

[RAAMESSES. See RAMESES, the same word in the Hebrew.]

RAB. The title rabbi, with several others from the same root, רבב, magnum est, vel multiplacatus est, began first to be assumed, according to Godwin, as a distinguishing title of honor by men of learning, about the time of the birth of Christ. We find it anciently given, indeed, to several magistrates and officers of state. In Esth. i. 8, it is said, the king appointed בכירים בכירים, which we render "all the officers of his house." In Jeremiah xli. 1, we read of the רבי המלך רבי, "the princes of the king." In Job xxxii. 9, it is said that the רבים רבים, which we render "great men, are not always wise;" a rendering which well expresses the original meaning of the word. It was not therefore in those days properly a title of honor, belonging to any particular office or dignity, in church or state; but all who were of superior rank and condition in life were called רבים רבים. We do not find the prophets, or other men of learning in the Old Testament, affecting any title beside that which denoted their office; and they were contented to be addressed by their bare names. The first Jewish rabbi said to have been distinguished with any title of honor was Simeon, the son of Hillel, who succeeded his father as president of the sanhedrim; and his title was that of rabban. The later rabbies tell us this title was conferred with a good deal of ceremony. When a person had gone through the schools and was thought worthy of the degree of rabbi, he was first placed in a chair somewhat raised above the company; then were delivered to him a key and a table book: the key, as a symbol of the power or authority now conferred upon him to teach that knowledge to others which he had learned himself; and this key he afterward wore as a badge of his honor, and when he died it was buried with him: the table book was a symbol of his diligence in his studies, and of his endeavoring to make further improvements in learning. The next ceremony in the creation of a rabbi was the imposition of hands on him by the delegates of the sanhedrim, practiced in imitation of Moses's ordaining Joshua by this rite, to succeed him in his office. Num. xxvii. 18: Deut. xxxiv. 9. And then they proclaimed his title.

According to Maimonides, the imposition of hands was not looked upon to be essential, but was sometimes omitted. They did not always, saith he, lay their hands on the head of the elder to be ordained; but called him rabbi, and said, "Behold, thou art ordained, and hast power," etc. We find this title given to John the Baptist, John iii. 26; and frequently to our blessed Saviour, as by John's disciples, by Nicodemus, and by the people that followed him. John i. 38; iii. 2; vi. 20. The reason of our Saviour's prohibiting his disciples to be called rabbi is expressed in these words: "Be not ye called rabbi, for one is your master, even Christ," καθηγητὴς, your guide and conductor, on whose word and instructions alone you are to depend in matters of religion and salvation. Accordingly, the inspired apostles pretend to nothing more than, as the ambassadors of Christ, to deliver his instructions; and, for their own part, they expressly disclaim all dominion over the faith and consciences of men. 2 Cor. i. 24; v. 20. The Jewish writers distinguish between the titles rab, rabbi, rabban. As for rab and rabbi, the only difference between them is, that rab was the title of such as had had their education, and taken their degree, in some foreign Jewish school—suppose at Babylon, where there was a school or academy of considerable note: rabbi was the title of such as were educated in the land of Judea, who were accounted more honorable than the others. But as for rabban, it was the highest title; which, they say, was never conferred on more than seven persons, namely, on R. Simeon, five of his descendants, and on R. Jochanan, who was of a different family. It was on this account, it should seem, that the blind man gave this title to Christ, Mark x. 51; being convinced that he was possessed of Divine power, and worthy of the most honorable distinctions. And Mary Magdalene, when she saw Christ after his resurrection, "said unto him, Rabboni," Joha xx. 16, that is, my rabban, like my lord in English; for rabbon is the same with rabban, only pronounced according to the Syriac dialect.

There were several gradations among the Jews before the dignity of rabbin, as, among us, before the degree of doctor. The head of a school was called chacham, or wise. He had the head seat in the assemblies and in the synagogues. He reprimanded the disobedient, and could excommunicate them; and this procured him great respect. In their schools they sat upon raised chairs, and their scholars were seated at their feet. Hence St. Paul is said to have studied at the feet of Rabbi Gamaliel. Acts xxii. 3. The studies of the rabbins are employed either on the text of the law, or the traditions, or the cabala; these three objects form so many different schools and different sort of rabbins. Those who chiefly apply to the letter of Scripture are called Caraites, Literalists. Those who chiefly study the traditions and oral laws of the Talmud are called Rabbanists. Those who give themselves to their secret and mysterious divinity, letters and numbers, are called Cabalists, Traditionaries. The rabbins are generally very ignorant in history, chronology, philology, antiquity, and geography. They understand the holy language but imperfectly. They know not the true signification of a multitude of words in the sacred text. They are prodigiously conceited about their traditions, so that there is very little profit in reading them; and experience shows that most who have applied themselves to peruse their books, have been but little benefited by them, and have entertained a perfect contempt of their understanding and their works. The chief function of the rabbins is to preach in the synagogue, to make public prayers there, and to interpret the law: they have the power of binding and loosing, that is, of declaring what is forbidden, and what allowed. When the synagogue is poor and small, there is but one rabbin, who at the same time discharges the office of a judge and a teacher. But when the Jews are numerous and powerful, they appoint three pastors, and a house of judgment, where all their civil affairs are determined. Then the rabbin applies himself to instruction only, unless it be thought proper to call him into the council to give his advice, in which case he takes the chief place.

RABBATH, or RABBATH-AMMON, the capital city of the Ammonites, situated beyond Jordan. See AMMON. [Deut. iii. 11: 2 Sam. xi.

1; xvii. 27; Jer. xlix. 2, 3; Ezek. xxi. 20; xxv. 5; Amos i. 14. Rabbath was on the Zerka, an affluent of the Jordan, fifty-five miles north-north-east of Jerusalem, twenty-five miles east-north-east of the Dead Sea. After its destruction by the Assyrians, it was rebuilt by Ptolemy Philadelphus, and called Philadelphia. Its ruins, which are included in the pashalic of Damascus, are now called 'Ammân. See AMMONITES.]

RABBATH-MOAB, the capital city of the Moabites, called otherwise Ar, or Areopolis. See MOAB. [As Jerome remarks, Rabbath-Moab means Great Moab, and Areopolis is formed from the Hebrew Ar, (Num. xxi. 28; Deut. ii. 9: Isa. xv. 1,) and the Greek polis. In early times it was an episcopal see of Palestina Tertia, and after the destruction of Petra, the metropolitan city of that region. Jerome says it was destroyed by an earthquake when he was young. See Ar.]

RABBI. See RAB.

RABSHAKEH, a chief butler, or cup-bearer. This is a term of dignity, and not a proper name. Rabshakeh was sent by Sennacherib, King of Assyria, to summon Hezekiah to surrender Jerusalem. 2 Kings xviii. 17, 18; xix. 4: Isaiah xxxvi.

RACA, a Syriac word which properly signifies empty, vain, beggarly, foolish, and which includes in it a strong idea of contempt. Our Saviour pronounces a censure on every person using this term to his neighbor. Matt. v. 22. Lightfoot assures us that in the writings of the Jews the word raca is a term of the utmost contempt, and that it was usual to pronounce it with marked signs of indignation.

[RACES. See GAMES.]

RACHEL, the daughter of Laban, and sister of Leah. The prophet Jeremiah, xxxi. 15, and St. Matthew, ii. 18, have put Rachel for the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, the children of Joseph, the son of Rachel. This prophecy was completed when these two tribes were carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates; and St. Matthew made application of it to what happened at Bethlehem, when Herod put to death the children of two years old and under. Then Rachel, who was buried there, might be said to make her lamentations for the death of so many innocent children sacrificed to the jealousy of a wicked monarch.

[RACHEL'S TOMB, as it is called, a mile or two north of Bethlehem, is, says Robinson, "an ordinary Muslim Wely;" pilgrimages are made to it by the Jews. Tradition, going back to the third century, locates her tomb in this place, which is countenanced by Gen. xxxv. 19, 20.]

[RAGUEL. See JETHRO.]

RAHAB was a hostess of the city of Jericho, who received and concealed the spies sent by Joshua. The Hebrew calls her Zona, Joshua ii. 1, which Jerome and many others understand of a prostitute. Others think she was only a hostess or innkeeper, and that this is the true signification of the original word. Had she been a woman of ill-fame, would Salmon, a prince of the tribe of Judah, have taken her to wife? Or could he have done it by the law? Besides, the spies of Joshua would hardly have gone to lodge with a common harlot, they who were charged with so nice and dangerous a commission. Those who maintain that she was a harlot, pretend that she was perhaps one of those women who prostituted themselves in honor of the pagan deities; as if this could extenuate her crime, or the scandal of her profession if she were a public woman. It is also observable that such women are called kadeshah, not zona, in the Hebrew. Rahab married Salmon, a prince of Judah, by whom she had Boaz, from whom descended Obed, Jesse, and David. Thus Jesus Christ condescended to reckon this Canaanitish woman among his ancestors. St. Paul magnifies the faith of Rahab. Heb. xi. 31.

RAHAB is also a name of Egypt. Isa. xxx. 7; li. 9. [This word רַהַב, Rahab, means pride, and is applied to Egypt, because the Egyptians were proverbially proud. Besides Psalms lxxxvii. 4; lxxxix. 10: Isa. li. 9, it occurs in Isa. xxx. 7, though it does not appear in our version. Lowth renders, "Rahab, the inactive;" Rosenmüller: "Full of pride are they, yet an indolent people." Compare Job xxvi. 12, Heb. Others think the word means a sea-monster, and is used to designate Egypt, because of the crocodile and hippopotamus that infest its waters. This name is different from that of Salmon's wife, which is רַחַב, Rachab, from a root meaning to enlarge.]

RAIMENT. In addition to what occurs under the article HABITS, it may be observed that to make presents of changes of raiment, Gen. xlv. 22, has always been common among all ranks of orientals. The perfuming of raiment with sweet-scented spices or extracts is also still a custom, which explains the smell of Jacob's raiment. A coat or robe of many colors, such as Jacob gave to Joseph, is also a mark of distinction. The Turks at Aleppo thus array their sons; and, in the time of Sisera, a coat of divers colors is mentioned among the rich spoils which fell to the conquerors. A frequent change of garments is also very common both to show respect and to display opulence. Is there an allusion to this in Psalm cii. 26: "As a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed?" If so, it conveys the magnificent idea of the almighty Creator investing himself with the whole creation as with a robe, and having laid that aside, by new creations, or the successive production of beings, clothing himself with others, at his pleasure.

RAIN, the vapors exhaled by the sun, which descend from the clouds to water the earth. Eccles. xi. 3. The sacred writers often speak of the rain of the former and latter season. Deut. xi. 14: Hosea vi. 3. Twice in the year there generally fell plenty of rain in Judea; in the beginning of the civil year, about September or October; and half a year after, in the month of Abib, or March, which was the first month in the ecclesiastical or sacred year, whence it is called the latter rain in the first month. Joel ii. 23. [Robinson says, "The whole period from October to March now constitutes only one continued season of rain. Unless, therefore, there has been some change in the climate since the times of the New Testament, the early and the latter rains seem to have implied the first showers of autumn, which revived the parched earth and prepared it for the seed, and the later showers of spring, which continued to refresh and forward the ripening crops.] (See CANAAN.) The ancient Hebrews compared eloquence, and even learning or doctrine, to rain: "My doctrine shall drop as the rain." Deut. xxxii. 2.

[RAINBOW. The rainbow is produced by the reflection and refraction of the sun's rays falling on drops of rain. It doubtless existed before the deluge, but was appointed by God as a sign of the covenant made with Noah, that "the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh." As נִחַתִּי, nathatti, is in the past tense, some render Gen. ix. 13, "I have set my bow in the cloud." As under certain conditions the rainbow must be produced so long as the sun and atmosphere continue, so surely shall the earth be preserved from a second deluge. Homer, Il. xi. 27, and Virgil, Æn. v. 606, ix. 803, allude to the symbolical character of Iris, the rainbow, which the Greeks, Romans, and other nations worshipped as a deity, and as a messenger of the gods. In Rev. iv. 3, the lapis seems to symbolize God's mercy in Christ, as guaranteed to man by the covenant of grace; the prevalent hue being green, indicates the refreshment and comfort which it affords to believers. Compare Ezek. ii. 28: Rev. x. 1.]

[RAM. A clean animal, used in sacrifice. Gen. xv. 9; xxii. 13. The ram of consecration, Exod. xxix., was offered in consecrating the priests, and the peculiar manner in which his blood was sprinkled indicated that they should devote all their powers to the service of God, in dependence on the great atonement.—The rams' skins dyed red, Exod. xxv. 5, were literally the skins of red rams; some include goats as well as sheep. Homer, Odys. ix. 425, Virgil, Ec. iv. 43, and others, speak of purple rams: so the fable of the golden fleece. Red morocco was manufactured in ancient times in Libya; and Egyptian paintings represent leather-cutters and harness-makers using red leather.]

[RAMAH. A town of Benjamin, situated on an eminence—hence perhaps its name, which signifies elevated. It was near Gibeah, six miles north of Jerusalem. Josh. xviii. 25; Judg. xix. 13. Robinson identifies it with er-Ram, which is a miserable village, with few houses, and those in summer mostly deserted. There are here large squared stones and columns scattered about the fields, indicating an ancient place of some importance. Some think this is the Ramah mentioned Jer. xxxi. 15; xl. 1: Hos. v. 8: Matt. ii. 18.—Also a city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 36.—Also the place of Samuel's birth, residence, death, and burial. 1 Sam. i. 1, 19; ii. 11; vii. 17; viii. 4; xxv. 1. It is called Ramatham-Zophim of Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. i. 1; and Robinson thinks that Sôba, eight miles south-west of Jerusalem, is on the site of Ramah: he explodes the monkish tradition which locates it at Neby Samw'el, five miles north-west of Jerusalem; and tries to overthrow the common opinion which identifies it and Arimathea with Ramleh, nine miles south-east of Joppa. See ARIMATEA.—Also a town of Gilead. 2 Kings viii. 29. The

RAMESES, or RAAMESSES, a city supposed to have been situated in the eastern part of Egypt, called the land of Goshen, which was also hence termed the land of Rameses. It was one of the cities built by the Israelites as a treasure city, as it is translated in our Bibles; probably a store city, or, as others interpret it, a fortress. Its position may be fixed about six or eight miles above the modern Cairo, a little to the south of the Babylon of the Persians, the ancient Letopolis; as Josephus says that the children of Israel, after quitting this place, in their first march to Succoth, passed by the latter city. [Gen. xlvii. 11: Exod. i. 11; xii. 37.]

RAMOTH, a famous city in the mountains of Gilead. 1 Kings iv. 13. It is often called Ramoth-Gilead. Josephus calls it Ramathan, or Aramatha. The city belonged to the tribe of Gad. Deut. iv. 43. It was assigned for a dwelling of the Levites, and was one of the cities of refuge beyond Jordan. Josh. xx. 8; xxi. 38. It became famous during the reigns of the latter kings of Israel, and was the occasion of several wars between them and the kings of Damascus, who had made a conquest of it, which the sovereigns of Israel endeavored to regain. 1 Kings xxii. 3-5. Eusebius says, that Ramoth was fifteen miles from Philadelphia toward the east. St. Jerome places it in the neighborhood of Jabbock, and consequently to the north of Philadelphia. [Also a Levitical town in the tribe of Issachar. 1 Chron. vi. 73.—Also a place called "Ramoth of the south," Josh. xix. 8, 1 Sam. xxx. 27, belonging to Simeon. See RAMAH.]

[RATIONALISTS. A class of philosophers who made great boast of reason. Lord Bacon says, "The rationalists are like the spiders: they spin all out of their own bowels." "Can those, then, be enthusiasts," says Waterland, "who profess to follow reason? Yes, undoubtedly, if by reason they mean only conceits. Therefore such persons are now commonly called reasonists and rationalists, to distinguish them from true reasoners or rational inquirers." The name is now appropriated to those who repudiate every thing supernatural in Christianity. See NEOLOGY.]

RAVEN, עֵרָב, in Chaldee orba, in Syriac croac, in Latin corvus, Gen. viii. 7: Lev. xi. 15: Deut. xiv. 14: 1 Kings xvii. 4, 6: Job xxxviii. 41: Psalm cxlvii. 9: Prov. xxx. 17: Cant. v. 11: Isa. xxxiv. 11: κόραξ, Luke xii. 24: a well-known bird of prey. All the interpreters agree that oreb signifies the raven, from oreb, "evening," on account of its color. Michaelis, in proposing a question respecting certain birds, says of the oreb, "Il est décidé, que c'est le corbeau; il seroit donc superflu de le demander. Mais je desirerois plus de certitude sur le nom Syriacque des corbeaux." [It is settled that this is the raven; it would therefore be superfluous to investigate it. But I could wish more certainty respecting the Syriac name of ravens.] One can hardly doubt that it is taken from the note of this bird. On the decrease of the waters of the flood, so that the tops of the mountains became visible, Noah sent forth out of one of the windows of the ark a raven, a bold and adventurous bird, by way of experiment, to see whether the waters were sunk or abated. Forty days the violent rain had continued; and he might think this, therefore, a likely time for the waters to run off again. In the original text, in the Samaritan, in the Chaldee and Arabic, it is said that the raven "returned" to the ark; but the Greek interpreters, the Syriac, the Latin, and most of the eminent fathers and commentators, say that it did not return any more. Here are great authorities on both sides, but the latter reading, though so contrary in sense to the other, yet in the Hebrew is not very different in the form of the letters, and appears to be the better reading of the two. For if the raven had returned, what occasion had Noah to send forth a dove? Or why did he not take the raven in unto him into the ark, as he did afterward the dove? Or why did he not send forth the same raven again, as he did afterward the same dove again? It is not improperly expressed in our translation, that "the raven went forth to and fro," flying hither and thither, "until the waters were dried up from off the face of the earth." It found, perhaps, in the higher grounds, some of the carcasses of those who had perished in the deluge.

The prophet Elijah was in his retirement fed by this bird. A writer, indeed, in the Memoirs of Literature, for April, 1710, endeavors to show, from many authors, that there was in the country of Bethshan, in Decapolis, by the brook Cherith or Carith, a little town called Aorabi or Orbo, Judges vii. 25; Isa. x. 6; and he therefore explains the word orebim, which, in 1 Kings xvii. 4, we translate "ravens," of the inhabitants of that village, some of whom, he contends, daily carried bread and flesh to Elijah, who had retired to and lay in a cave in the neighborhood. On the other hand, Scheuchzer ably vindicates the commonly received opinion. The editor of Calmet, also, in the appendix, under the article ELIJAH, has some pertinent observations on this subject. "We ought to consider," says he, "1. That Ahab sought Elijah with avidity, and took an oath of every people, no doubt, also, in his dominions, that he was not concealed among its inhabitants; his situation, therefore, required the utmost privacy, even to solitude. 2. That when the brook Cherith was dried up, the prophet was obliged to quit his asylum, which he needed not to have done, had a people been his suppliers, for they could have brought him water as well as food."

[Dr. Kitto, who selects Arabs, as the best of the five senses which, according to the various pointings, are given to the original word, says, "To us nothing seems more likely than that encampments of Arabs, who still intrude their tents, at certain seasons of the year, upon the borders or into the unappropriated pastures of settled countries, would at this season of drought have been forced within reach of the brook Cherith, and, knowing the increasing scarcity of water, would have remained there as long as its stream afforded any to them—that is, as long as Elijah himself remained, which was until the stream was dried up. They were also, from their condition and habits of life, the very persons to whom the secret of his retreat might be most safely intrusted, far more so than it would have been to any townsmen, subjects of Ahab, whom some conceive to have been the parties in question;" that is, the Orebim, or inhabitants of Oreb, or Orbo. See ELIJAH.]

In Psalm cxlvii. 9, it is said, "The Lord giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry." And in Job xxxviii. 41, "Who provideth for the raven his food, when his young ones cry unto God, wandering for want of meat?" Job and the Psalmist may allude to what is said by some naturalists, that the ravens drive out their young ones early from their nests, and oblige them to seek food for their own sustenance. The same kind Providence which furnishes support to his intelligent offspring is not unmindful of the wants, or inattentive to the desires, of the meanest of his creatures.

"Lo, the young ravens, from their nest exiled,
On hunger's wings attempt the aerial wild!
Who leads their wanderings, and their feast supplies?
To God ascend their importuning cries."

Christ instructs his disciples, from the same circumstance, to trust in the care and kindness of Heaven: "Consider the ravens; for they neither sow nor reap, neither have storehouse nor barn; and God feedeth them. How much better are ye than the fowls!" Luke xii. 24. Solomon, speaking of the peculiar regard and veneration due to the worthy persons and salutary instructions of parents, observes, that an untimely fate, and the want of decent interment, may be expected from contrary conduct; and that the leering eye, which throws wicked contempt on a good father, and insolent disdain on a tender mother, shall be dug out of the unburied exposed corpse by the ravens of the valley, and eaten up by the young eagles. Prov. xxx. 17. It was a common punishment in the east, and one which the orientals dreaded above all others, to expose in the open fields the bodies of evil-doers that had suffered by the laws of their offended country, to be devoured by the beasts of the field and the fowls of heaven. The wise man insinuates that the raven makes his first and keenest attack on the eye, which perfectly corresponds with his habits, for he always begins his banquet with that part. Isidore says of him, Primo in cadaveribus oculum petit; [he attacks first the eye of the dead:] and Epictetus, Οἱ μὲν κόρακες τῶν τετελευτηκότων τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς λυμαίνονται, "the ravens devour the eyes of the dead." Many other testimonies might be adduced, but these are sufficient to justify the allusion in the proverb.

The raven, it is well known, delights in solitude. He frequents the ruined tower or the deserted habitation. In Isaiah, xxxiv. 11, it is accordingly foretold that the raven, with other birds of similar dispositions, should fix his abode in the desolate houses of Edom. In the Septuagint and other versions, the Hebrew word for desolation is rendered raven. The meaning is, that in those splendid palaces, where the voice of joy and gladness was heard, and every sound which could ravish the ear and subdue the heart, silence was, for the wickedness of their inhabitants, to hold her reign for ever, interrupted only by the scream of the cormorant and the croaking of the raven.

READING. In the countries of the Levant the people never read silently, but go on in a kind of singing voice, aloud. The eunuch was probably thus reading when Philip overheard him, and, finding that he was reading the Scriptures, said, "Understandest thou what thou readest?"

[READING-DESK. Divine service was formerly performed in the chancel; but to bring the minister nearer the people, a reading-desk was erected in the nave of the church. In primitive times it was called an ambo, and sermons were sometimes delivered from it. Cyprian calls it pulpitum.]

REASON, USE OF, IN RELIGION. The sublime, incomprehensible nature of some of the Christian doctrines has so completely subdued the understanding of many pious men, as to make them think it presumptuous to apply reason in any way to the revelations of God; and the many instances in which the simplicity of truth has been corrupted by an alliance with philosophy confirm them in the belief that it is safer, as well as more respectful, to resign their minds to devout impressions, than to exercise their understandings in any speculations upon sacred subjects. Enthusiasts and fanatics of all different names and sects agree in decrying the use of reason, because it is the very essence of fanaticism to substitute, in place of the sober deductions of reason, the extravagant fancies of a disordered imagination, and to consider these fancies as the immediate illumination of the Spirit of God. Insidious writers in the deistical controversy have pretended to adopt those sentiments of humility and reverence which are inseparable from true Christians, and even that total subjection of reason to faith which characterizes enthusiasts. A pamphlet was published about the middle of the last century that made a noise in its day, although it is now forgotten, entitled, "Christianity not founded on Argument," which, while to a careless reader it may seem to magnify the gospel, does in reality tend to undermine our faith, by separating it from a rational assent; and Mr. Hume, in the spirit of this pamphlet, concludes his Essay on Miracles with calling those dangerous friends or disguised enemies to the Christian religion who have undertaken to defend it by the principles of human reason: "Our most holy religion," he says, with a dis-ingenuity very unbecoming his respectable talents, "is founded on faith, not on reason;" and, "this reason is insufficient to convince us of its veracity." The Church of Rome, in order to subject the minds of her votaries to her authority, has reprobated the use of reason in matters of religion. She has revived an ancient position, that things may be true in theology which are false in philosophy; and she has, in some instances, made the merit of faith to consist in the absurdity of that which was believed.

The extravagance of these positions has produced, since the Reformation, an opposite extreme. While those who deny the truth of revelation consider reason as in all respects a sufficient guide, the Socinians, who admit that a revelation has been made, employ reason as the supreme judge of its doctrines, and boldly strike out of their creed every article that is not altogether conformable to those notions which may be derived from the exercise of reason. These controversies concerning the use of reason in matters of religion are disputes, not about words, but about the essence of Christianity. But a few plain observations are sufficient to ascertain where the truth lies in this subject.

The first use of reason in matters of religion is to examine the evidences of revelation. For, the more entire the submission which we consider as due to every thing that is revealed, we have the more need to be satisfied that any system which professes to be a Divine revelation does really come from God.

After the exercise of reason has established in our minds a firm belief that Christianity is of Divine original, the second use of reason is to learn what are the truths revealed. As these truths are not in our days communicated to any by immediate inspiration, the knowledge of them is to be acquired only from books transmitted to us with satisfying evidence that they were written above seventeen hundred years ago, in a remote country and foreign language, under the direction of the Spirit of God. In order to attain the meaning of these books, we must study the language in which they were written; and we must study also the manners of the times and the state of the countries in which the writers lived; because these are circumstances to which an original author is often alluding, and by which his phraseology is generally affected; we must lay together different passages in which the same word or phrase occurs, because without this labor we cannot obtain its precise signification; and we must mark the difference of style and manner which characterizes different writers, because a right apprehension of their meaning often depends upon attention to this difference. All this supposes the application of grammar, history, geography, chronology, and criticism in matters of religion; that is, it supposes that the reason of man had been previously exercised in pursuing these different branches of knowledge, and that our success in attaining the true sense of Scripture depends upon the diligence with which we avail ourselves of the progress that has been made in them. It is obvious that every Christian is not capable of making this application. But this is no argument against the use of reason, of which we are now speaking. For they who use translations and commentaries rely only upon the reason of others, instead of exercising their own. The several branches of knowledge have been applied in every age by some persons for the benefit of others; and the progress in sacred criticism which distinguishes the present times is nothing else but the continued application, in elucidating the Scripture, of reason enlightened by every kind of subsidiary knowledge, and very much improved in this kind of exercise by the employment which the ancient classics have given it since the revival of letters.

After the two uses of reason that have been illustrated, a third comes to be mentioned, which may be considered as compounded of both. Reason is of eminent use in repelling the attacks of the adversaries of Christianity. When men of erudition, of philosophical acuteness, and of accomplished taste, direct their talents against our religion, the cause is very much hurt by an unskilful defender. He cannot unravel their sophistry; he does not see the amount and the effect of the concessions which he makes to them; he is bewildered by their quotations, and he is often led by their artifice upon dangerous ground. In all ages of the Church there have been weak defenders of Christianity; and the only triumphs of the enemies of our religion have arisen from their being able to expose the defects of those methods of defending the truth which some of its advocates had unwarily chosen. A mind trained to accurate and philosophical views of the nature and the amount of evidence, enriched with historical knowledge, accustomed to throw out of a subject all that is minute and irrelevant, to collect what is of importance within a short compass, and to form the comprehension of a whole, is the mind qualified to contend with the learning, the wit, and the sophistry of infidelity. Many such minds have appeared in this honorable controversy during the course of this and the last century; and the success has corresponded to the completeness of the furniture with which they engaged in the combat. The Christian doctrine has been vindicated by their masterly exposition from various misrepresentations; the arguments for its Divine original have been placed in their true light; and the attempts to confound the miracles and prophecies upon which Christianity rests its claim, with the delusions of imposture, have been effectually repelled. Christianity has, in this way, received the most important advantages from the attacks of its enemies; and it is not improbable that its doctrines would never have been so thoroughly cleared from all the corruptions and subtleties which had attached to them in the progress of ages, nor the evidences of its truths have been so accurately understood, nor its peculiar character been so perfectly discriminated, had not the zeal and abilities which have been employed against it called forth in its defence some of the most distinguished masters of reason. They brought into the service of Christianity the same weapons which had been drawn for her destruction, and, wielding them with confidence and skill in a good cause, became the successful champions of the truth.

of the truths of religion. Every thing which is revealed by God comes to his creatures from so high an authority, that it may be rested in with perfect assurance as true. Nothing can be received by us as true which is contrary to the dictates of reason, because it is impossible for us to receive at the same time the truth and the falsehood of a proposition. But many things are true which we do not fully comprehend; and many propositions, which appear incredible when they are first enunciated, are found, upon examination, such as our understandings can readily admit. These principles embrace the whole of the subject, and they mark out the steps by which reason is to proceed in judging of the truths of religion. We first examine the evidences of revelation. If these satisfy our understandings, we are certain that there can be no contradiction between the doctrines of this true religion and the dictates of right reason. If any such contradiction appear, there must be some mistake: by not making a proper use of our reason in the interpretation of the gospel, we suppose that it contains doctrines which it does not teach; or we give the name of right reason to some narrow prejudices which deeper reflection and more enlarged knowledge will dissipate; or we consider a proposition as implying a contradiction, when, in truth, it is only imperfectly understood. Here, as in every other case, mistakes are to be corrected by measuring back our steps. We must examine closely and impartially the meaning of those passages which appear to contain the doctrine; we must compare them with one another; we must endeavor to derive light from the general phraseology of Scripture and the analogy of faith; and we shall generally be able, in this way, to separate the doctrine from all those adventitious circumstances which give it the appearance of absurdity. If a doctrine which, upon the closest examination, appears unquestionably to be taught in Scripture, still does not approve itself to our understanding, we must consider carefully what it is that prevents us from receiving it. There may be preconceived notions hastily taken up which that doctrine opposes; there may be pride of understanding that does not readily submit to the views which it communicates; or reason may need to be reminded that we must expect to find in religion many things which we are not able to comprehend. One of the most important offices of reason is to recognize her own limits. She never can be moved, by any authority, to receive as true what she perceives to be absurd. But, if she has formed a just estimate of human knowledge, she will not shelter her presumption in rejecting the truths of revelation under the pretence of contradictions that do not really exist; she will readily admit that there may be in a subject some points which she knows, and others of which she is ignorant; she will not allow her ignorance of the latter to shake the evidence of the former, but will yield a firm assent to that which she does understand, without presuming to deny what is beyond her comprehension. And thus, availing herself of all the light which she now has, she will wait in humble hope for the time when a larger measure shall be imparted. [See NEOLOGY.]

[RE-BAPTISM. From the nature of the initiating ordinance of Christianity and its analogy to circumcision, it is obvious that it should not be repeated on any subject. The Marcionites, Donatists, and some of the African Catholics, re-baptized those who came to them from sects reputed heretical; but the Church of Rome has always disallowed rebaptism, when the baptism of heretics and schismatics had been administered in due form. The Reformed Churches, with the exception of some Anabaptist sects, practice upon this principle. Some of the Puritans, and in later times some of the Presbyterians, favor the re-baptism of Papists, on the ground that the ordinance is vitiated by the superstitious additions of the Church of Rome. There were no re-baptisms, however, at the time of the Reformation. See Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent: Session vii., on Baptism, Canons iv., xi., xiii. Hooker, Ecl. Pol. v. 62.]

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM. Matthew, when called, was sitting at the receipt of custom, or dues on merchandise. He was a publican or tax-gatherer, or, as we should say, a custom-house officer. The publicans had houses or booths built for them at the foot of bridges, at the mouth of rivers, by the sea-shore, and the ports of the Lake of Gennesaret, or Sea of Tiberias, to collect the taxes on passengers and merchandise. See PUBLICAN.

RECHABITES. The Rechabites, though they dwelt among the Israelites, did not belong to any of their tribes; for they were Kenites, as appears from 1 Chron. ii. 55, where the Kenites are said to have come of "Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab." These Kenites, afterward styled Rechabites, were of the family of Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, whose daughter Moses married; for "the children of the Kenite, Moses's father-in-law," it is said, "went up out of the city of palm trees with the children of Judah, and dwelt among the people," Judges i. 16; and we read of "Heber the Kenite, who was of the children of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses, who had severed himself from the Kenites," or from the bulk of them who settled in the tribe of Judah, "and pitched his tent in the plain of Zaanaïm." Judges iv. 11. They appear to have sprung from Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2; for Jethro, from whom they are descended, is called a Midianite, Num. x. 23. Of this family was Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, a man of eminent zeal for the pure worship of God against idolatry, who assisted King Jehu in destroying the house of Ahab, and the worshippers of Baal. 2 Kings x. 15, 16, 23, etc. It was he who gave that rule of life to his children and posterity which we read of in Jer. xxxv. 6, 7. It consisted of these three articles: that they should drink no wine; that they should neither possess nor occupy any houses, fields, or vineyards; that they should dwell in tents. This was the institution of the children of Rechab; and this they continued to observe for upward of three hundred years, from the time of Jehu to that of Jehoiakim, King of Judah, when Nebuchadnezzar coming to besiege Jerusalem, the Rechabites were obliged to leave the country and take refuge in the city. In Jer. xxxv. here is a promise made to this people, that Jonadab, the son of Rechab, should not want a man to stand before the Lord; that is, that his posterity should not fail; and to this day this tribe is found among the Arabians of the desert, distinct, free, and practicing exactly the institutions of Jonadab, whose name they bear, and of whose institutions they boast. This is a remarkable instance of the exact fulfilment of a minute and isolated prophecy. See BENI KHAIBIR [and JETHRO.]

[RECLUSE. A person shut up in a monastic cell. Anciently, the bishop set his seal on the door, which was never opened except when the recluse was sick or dead. His food was conveyed through a window, which sometimes opened into the church, so that he could join in the public service. In some cases he was allowed a little garden near his cell.]

RECONCILIATION. The expressions "reconciliation" and "making peace" necessarily suppose a previous state of hostility between God and man, which is reciprocal. This is sometimes called enmity, a term, as it respects God, rather unfortunate, since enmity is almost fixed in our language to signify a malignant and revengeful feeling. Of this, the opponents of the doctrine of the atonement have availed themselves to argue, that as there can be no such affection in the Divine nature, therefore, reconciliation in Scripture does not mean the reconciliation of God to man, but of man to God, whose enmity the example and teaching of Christ, they tell us, is very effectual to subdue. It is, indeed, a sad and humbling truth, and one which the Socinians in their discussions on the natural innocence of man are not willing to admit, that by the infection of sin "the carnal mind is enmity against God," that human nature is malignantly hostile to God and to the control of his law; but this is far from expressing the whole of that relation of man in which, in Scripture, he is said to be at enmity with God, and so to need a reconciliation, the making of peace between God and him. That relation is a legal one, as that of a sovereign in his judicial capacity, and a criminal who has violated his laws and risen up against his authority, and who is, therefore, treated as an enemy. The word ἐχθρὸς is used in this passive sense, both in the Greek writers and in the New Testament. So, in Romans xi. 28, the Jews, rejected and punished for refusing the gospel, are said by the apostle, "as concerning the gospel," to be "enemies for your sakes:" treated and accounted such; "but, as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes." In the same epistle, v. 10, the term is used precisely in the same sense, and that with reference to the reconciliation by Christ: "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son;" that is, when we were objects of the Divine judicial displeasure, accounted as enemies, and liable to be capitally treated as such. Enmity, in the sense of malignity and the sentiment of hatred, is added to this relation in the case of man; but it is no part of the relation itself: it is rather a case of it, as it is one of the actings of a corrupt nature which render man obnoxious to the displeasure of God, and the penalty of his law, and place him in the condition of an enemy. It is this judicial variance and opposition between God and man which is referred to in the term reconciliation, and in the phrase "making peace," in the New Testament; and the hostility is, therefore, in its own nature, mutual.

But that there is no truth in the notion that reconciliation means no more than our laying aside our enmity to God, may also be shown from several express passages. The first is the passage we have above cited: "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God," Rom. v. 10. Here the act of reconciling is ascribed to God, and not to us; but if this reconciliation consisted in the laying aside of our own enmity, the act would be ours alone; and, further, that it could not be the laying aside of our enmity, is clear from the text, which speaks of reconciliation while we were yet enemies. The reconciliation spoken of here is not, as Socinus and his followers have said, our conversion. For that the apostle is speaking of a benefit obtained for us previous to our conversion, appears evident from the opposite members of the two sentences, "Much more, being justified, we shall be saved from wrath through him," "much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." The apostle argues from the greater to the less. If God was so benign to us before our conversion, what may we not expect from him now we are converted? To reconcile here cannot mean to convert; for the apostle evidently speaks of something greatly remarkable in the act of Christ; but to convert sinners is nothing remarkable, since none but sinners can be ever converted; whereas it was a rare and singular thing for Christ to die for sinners, and to reconcile sinners to God by his death, when there have been but very few good men who have died for their friends. In the next place, conversion is referred more properly to his glorious life than to his shameful death; but this reconciliation is attributed to his death, as contradistinguished from his glorious life, as is evident from the antithesis contained in the two verses. Besides, it is from the latter benefit that we learn the nature of the former. The latter, which belongs only to the converted, consists of the peace of God, and salvation from wrath. Rom. v. 9, 10. This the apostle afterward calls receiving the reconciliation. And what is it to receive the reconciliation, but to receive the remission of sins? Acts x. 43. To receive conversion is a mode of speaking entirely unknown. If, then, to receive the reconciliation is to receive the remission of sins, and in effect to be delivered from wrath or punishment, to be reconciled must have a corresponding signification.

"God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." 2 Cor. v. 19. Here the manner of this reconciliation is expressly said to be, not our laying aside our enmity, but the non-imputation of our trespasses to us by God; in other words, the pardoning of our offences and restoring us to favor. The promise, on God's part, to do this, is expressive of his previous reconciliation to the world by the death of Christ; for our actual reconciliation is distinguished from this by what follows, "and hath committed to us the ministry of reconciliation," by virtue of which all men were, by the apostles, entreated and besought to be reconciled to God. The reason, too, of this reconciliation of God to the world, by virtue of which he promises not to impute sin, is grounded by the apostle, in the last verse of the chapter, not upon the laying aside of enmity by men, but upon the sacrifice of Christ: "For he hath made him to be sin"—a sin-offering—"for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." "And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby." Eph. ii. 16. Here the act of reconciling is attributed to Christ. Man is not spoken of as reconciling himself to God; but Christ is said to reconcile Jews and Gentiles together, and both to God, "by his cross." Thus, says the apostle, "he is our peace;" but in what manner is the peace effected? Not, in the first instance, by subduing the enmity of man's heart, but by removing the enmity of "the law." "Having abolished in" or by "his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments." The ceremonial law only is here probably meant; for by its abolition, through its fulfilment in Christ, the enmity between Jews and Gentiles was taken away; but still it was not only necessary to reconcile Jew and Gentile together, but to "reconcile both unto God." This he did by the same act; abolishing the ceremonial law by becoming the antitype of all its sacrifices, and thus, by the sacrifice of himself, effecting the reconciliation of all to God, "slaying the enmity by his cross," taking away whatever hindered the reconciliation of the guilty to God, which, as we have seen, was not enmity and hatred to God in the human mind only, but that judicial hostility and variance which separated God and man as Judge and criminal. The feeble criticism of Socinus on this passage, in which he has been followed by his adherents to this day, is thus answered by Grotius: "In this passage the dative Θεῷ, to God, can only be governed by the verb ἀποκατάλλασθαι, that he might reconcile; for the interpretation of Socinus, which makes to God stand by itself, or that to reconcile to God is to reconcile them among themselves, that they might serve God, is distorted and without example. Nor is the argument valid which is drawn from thence, that in this place St. Paul properly treats of the peace made between Jews and Gentiles; for neither does it follow from this argument, that it was beside his purpose to mention the peace made for each with God. For the two opposites which are joined, are so joined among themselves, that they should be primarily and chiefly joined by that bond; for they are not united among themselves, except by and for that bond. Gentiles and Jews, therefore, are made friends among themselves by friendship with God."

Here also a critical remark will be appropriate. The above passages will show how falsely it has been asserted that God is nowhere in Scripture said to be reconciled to us, and that they only declare that we are reconciled to God; but the fact is, that the very phrase of our being reconciled to God imports the turning away of his wrath from us. Whitty observes on the words καταλλάττειν and καταλλάγη, "that they naturally import the reconciliation of one that is angry or displeased with us, both in profane and Jewish writers." When the Philistines suspected that David would appease the anger of Saul by becoming their adversary, they said, "Wherewith should he reconcile himself to his master? Should it not be with the heads of these men?" not, surely, How shall he remove his own anger against his master? but, how shall he remove his master's anger against him? How shall he restore himself to his master's favor? "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee," not that thou hast aught against thy brother, "first be reconciled to thy brother;" that is, appease and conciliate him; so that the words, in fact, import, "See that thy brother be reconciled to thee;" since that which goes before, is not that he hath done thee an injury, but thou him. Thus, then, for us to be reconciled to God, is to avail ourselves of the means by which the anger of God toward us is to be appeased, which the New Testament expressly declares to be meritoriously "the sin-offering" of Him "who knew no sin," and instrumentally, as to each individual personally, "faith in his blood." REDEEMER. The Hebrew goel is thus rendered, and the title is applied to Christ, as he is the avenger of man upon his spiritual enemy, and delivers man from death and the power of the grave, which the human avenger could not do. The right of the institution of goel was only in a relative, one of the same blood; and hence our Saviour's assumption of our nature is alluded to and implied under this term. There was also the right of buying back the family inheritance when alienated; and this also applies to Christ, our Goel, who has purchased back the heavenly inheritance into the human family. Under these views Job joyfully exclaims, "I know that my Redeemer," my Goel, "liveth," etc. See GOEL, MEDIATOR, and JESUS CHRIST.

REDEMPTION denotes our recovery from sin and death by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, who, on this account, is called the Redeemer. "Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." Rom. iii. 24. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Gal. iii. 13. "In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." Eph. i. 7. "Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish, and without spot." 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. "And ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price." 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20.

By redemption, those who deny the atonement made by Christ wish to understand deliverance merely, regarding only the effect, and studiously putting out of sight the cause from which it flows. But the very terms used in the above-cited passages, "to redeem," and "to be bought with a price," will each be found to refute this notion of a gratuitous deliverance, whether from sin or punishment, or both. Our English word, to redeem, literally means "to buy back;" and λυτρώω, to redeem, and ἀπολύτρωσις, redemption, are, both in Greek writers and in the New Testament, used for the act of setting free a captive by paying λύτρον, a ransom or redemption price. But, as Grotius has fully shown by reference to the use of the words both in sacred and profane writers, redemption signifies not merely "the liberation of captives," but deliverance from exile, death, and every other evil from which we may be freed; and λύτρον signifies every thing which satisfies another, so as to effect this deliverance. The nature of this redemption or purchased deliverance, (for it is not gratuitous liberation, as will presently appear,) is, therefore, to be ascertained by the circumstances of those who are the subjects of it. The subjects in the case before us are sinful men. They are under guilt, under "the curse of the law," the servants of sin, under the power and dominion of the devil, and "taken captive by him at his will," liable to the death of the body and to eternal punishment. To the whole of this case, the redemption, the purchased deliverance of man as proclaimed in the gospel, applies itself. Hence, in the above-cited and other passages it is said, "We have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins," in opposition to guilt; redemption from "the curse of the law;" deliverance from sin, that "we should be set free from sin;" deliverance from the power of Satan; from death by a resurrection; and from future "wrath" by the gift of eternal life. Throughout the whole of this glorious doctrine of our redemption from these tremendous evils there is, however, in the New Testament, a constant reference to the λύτρον, the redemption price, which λύτρον is as constantly declared to be the death of Christ, which he endured in our stead. "The Son of man came to give his life a ransom for many." Matt. xx. 28. "Who gave himself a ransom for all." 1 Tim. ii. 6. "In whom we have redemption through his blood." Eph. i. 7. "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ." 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. That deliverance of man from sin, misery, and all other penal evils of his transgression, which constitutes our redemption by Christ, is not, therefore, a gratuitous deliverance, granted without a consideration, as an act of mere prerogative; the ransom, the redemption-price, was exacted and paid; one thing was given for another; the precious blood of Christ for captive and condemned men. Of the same import are those passages which represent us as having been "bought" or "purchased" by Christ. St. Peter speaks of those "who denied the Lord, τὸν ἀγοράσαντα αὐτοὺς, that bought them;" and St. Paul, in the passage above cited, says, "Ye are bought with a price, ἡγοράσθητε;" which price is expressly said by St. John to be the blood of Christ: "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God (ἡγόρασας, hast purchased us) by thy blood." Rev. v. 9.

RED SEA, celebrated chiefly for the miraculous passage of the Israelites through its waters. They were thrust out of Egypt, says Dr. Hales, on the fifteenth day of the first month; "about six hundred thousand men on foot, beside women and children. And a mixed multitude went up also with them; and flocks and herds, even very much cattle." Exod. xii. 37-39: Num. xi. 4; xxxiii. 3. After they set out from Rameses, in the land of Goshen, in the neighborhood of Cairo, their first encampment was at Succoth, signifying "booths," or an "enclosure for cattle," after a stage of about thirty miles; their second, at Etham, or Adsjerud, on the edge of the wilderness, about sixty miles farther: "for the Lord led them not by the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near; for God said, Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, and they return to Egypt; but God led the people about by the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea," or by a circuitous route to the land of promise, in order to train them and instruct them in the solitudes of Arabia Petræa. Exod. xiii. 17-20: Deut. xxxii. 10. Instead of proceeding from Etham round the head of the Red Sea, and coasting along its eastern shore, the Lord made them turn southward along its western shore, and, after a stage of about twenty or thirty miles, to encamp in the valley of Bedea, where there was an opening in the great chain of mountains that line the western coast, called Pi-hahiroth, the mouth of the ridge between Migdol westward and the sea eastward, "over against Baal-zephon," on the eastern coast; to tempt Pharaoh, whose heart he finally hardened, to pursue them when they were "entangled in the land," and shut in by the wilderness on their rear and flanks, and by the sea in their front. The leading motive with Pharaoh and his servants was to bring back the Israelites to bondage; and of the Egyptians in general, to recover the treasures of which they had been spoiled. Exod. xiv. 1-5. So Pharaoh pursued the Israelites by the direct way of Migdol, with six hundred chariots, his horsemen, and his army, and overtook them encamping by the sea, beside Pi-hahiroth, over against Baal-zephon. When their destruction or their return to bondage seemed to be inevitable, the Lord interposed and fought for Israel. He opened for them a passage across the Red Sea, where it was about twelve miles wide, and brought them through in safety; while he drowned the Egyptians, who blindly followed them to their own destruction. Psalm lxxvii. 18, etc.

On this memorable deliverance Moses composed a thanksgiving, which he and the Israelites sang unto the Lord. It is also a sublime prophecy, foretelling the powerful effect of this tremendous judgment on the neighboring nations of Edom, Moab, Palestine, and Canaan, the future settlement of the Israelites in the promised land, the erection of the temple and sanctuary on Mount Zion, and the perpetuity of the dominion and worship of God.

The precise place of this passage has been much contested. Some place it near Suez, at the head of the gulf; others, with more probability, about ten hours' journey lower down, at Clysma, or the vale of Bedea. The day before the passage, by the Divine command, the Israelites encamped beside Pi-hahiroth, "between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon." Exod. xiv. 2: Num. xxxiii. 7. Pi-hahiroth signifies "the mouth of the ridge," or chain of mountains, which line the western coast of the Red Sea, called Attaka, "deliverance," in which was a gap, which formed the extremity of the valley of Bedea, ending at the sea eastward, and running westward to some distance, toward Cairo; Migdol, signifying "a tower," probably lay in that direction; and Baal-zephon, signifying "the northern Baal," was probably a temple on the opposite promontory, built on the eastern coast of the Red Sea. And the modern names of places in the vicinity tend to confirm these expositions of the ancient. Beside Attaka, on the eastern coast opposite is a head-land, called Ras Musa, or "the Cape of Moses;" somewhat lower, Hamam Faroun, "Pharaoh's Springs;" below Gironde, a reach of the gulf, called Birket Faroun; and the general name of the gulf is Bahr al Kolsum, "the Bay of Submersion." These names indicate that the passage was considerably below Suez, according to the tradition of the natives. The depth and breadth of the gulf, from Suez downward, is thus described by Niebuhr: "I have not found in this sea, from Suez southward, any bank or isthmus under water. When we departed from Suez, we sailed as far as Gironde, without fear of encountering any such. We had, in the first place, the road of Suez, four fathoms and a half: at three German leagues from Suez, in the middle of the gulf, four fathoms; and about Gironde, near the shore, even to ten fathoms." Bruce, also, describing the place of passage opposite Ras Musa, or a little below it, says, "There is here about fourteen fathoms of water in the channel, and about nine in the sides, and good anchorage everywhere. The farthest side, the eastern, is a low sandy coast, and a very easy landing-place." Shaw reckons the breadth of the gulf at this place about ten miles; Niebuhr, three leagues and more; Bruce, something less than four leagues; we may, therefore, estimate it about twelve miles, from their joint reports. But this space the host of the Israelites could easily have passed in the course of a night, from the evening to the ensuing morning watch, or dawn of day, according to the Mosaical account. And surely the depth of the sea was no impediment, when the Lord divided it by "a strong east wind," which blew across the sea all that night, and made the bottom of the sea dry land; "and the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground, and the waters were a wall unto them, on their right hand and on their left." Exod. xiv. 21, 22.

In the queries of Michaelis, sent to Niebuhr, when in Egypt, it was proposed to him to inquire upon the spot, whether there were not some ridges of rocks where the water was shallow, so that an army at particular times may pass over;

secondly, whether the Etesian winds, which blow strongly all summer from the north-west, could not blow so violently against the sea as to keep it back on a heap, so that the Israelites might have passed without a miracle. And a copy of these queries was left, also, for Bruce, to join his inquiries likewise; his observations on which are excellent: "I must confess, however learned the gentlemen were who proposed these doubts, I did not think they merited any attention to solve them. This passage is told us by Scripture to be a miraculous one; and if so, we have nothing to do with natural cases. If we do not believe Moses, we need not believe the transaction at all, seeing that it is from his authority alone we derive it. If we believe in God, that he made the sea, we must believe he could divide it when he sees proper reason; and of that he must be the only judge. It is no greater miracle to divide the Red Sea than to divide the river Jordan. If the Etesian wind, blowing from the north-west in summer, could keep up the sea as a wall on the right, or to the south, of fifty feet high, still the difficulty would remain of building the wall on the left hand, or to the north. Besides, water standing in that position for a day must have lost the nature of fluid. Whence came that cohesion of particles which hindered that wall to escape at the sides? This is as great a miracle as that of Moses. If the Etesian winds had done this once, they must have repeated it many a time before and since, from the same causes. Yet Diodorus Siculus says the Troglodytes, the indigenous inhabitants of that very spot, had a tradition from father to son, from their very earliest ages, that 'once this division of the sea did happen there; and that, after leaving its bottom some time dry, the sea again came back, and covered it with great fury.' The words of this author are of the most remarkable kind: we cannot think this heathen is writing in favor of revelation: he knew not Moses, nor says a word about Pharaoh and his host; but records the miracle of the division of the sea in words nearly as strong those of Moses, from the mouths of unbiased, undesigning pagans." Still skeptical queries have their use: they lead to a stricter investigation of facts, and thereby tend strongly to confirm the veracity of the history they mean to impeach. Thus it appears from the accurate observations of Niebuhr and Bruce, that there is no ledge of rocks running across the gulf anywhere, to afford a shallow passage. And the second query, about the Etesian or northerly wind, is refuted by the express mention of a strong easterly wind blowing across, and scooping out a dry passage; not that it was necessary for Omnipotence to employ it there as an instrument, any more than at Jordan; but it seems to be introduced in the sacred history by way of anticipation, to exclude the natural agency that might in after times be employed for solving the miracle; and it is remarkable that the monsoon in the Red Sea blows the summer half of the year from the north, the winter half from the south; neither of which, therefore, even if the wind could be supposed to operate so violently upon the waters, could produce the miracle in question.

Wishing to diminish, though not to deny, the miracle, Niebuhr adopts the opinion of those who contend for a higher passage near Suez. "For," says he, "the miracle would be less if they crossed the sea there than near Bedea. But whosoever should suppose that the multitude of the Israelites could be able to cross it here without a prodigy would deceive himself; for, even in our days, no caravan passes that way to go from Cairo to Mount Sinai, although it would considerably shorten the journey. The passage would have been naturally more difficult for the Israelites some thousands of years back, when the gulf was probably larger, deeper, and more extended toward the north; for, in all appearance, the water has retired, and the ground near this end has been raised by the sands of the neighboring desert. But it sufficiently appears, even from Niebuhr's own statement, that the passage of the Israelites could not have been taken near Suez; for, 1. He evidently confounded the town of Kolsun, the ruins of which he places near Suez, and where he supposed the passage to be made, with the bay of Kolsun, which began about forty-five miles lower down; as Bryant has satisfactorily proved, from the astronomical observations of Ptolemy and of Ulug Beigh, made at Heroum, the ancient head of the gulf. 2. Instead of crossing the sea at or near Eatham, their second station, the Israelites turned southward, along the western shore; and their third station at Pi-hahiroth, or Bedea, was at a full day's journey below Eatham, as Bryant has satisfactorily proved from Scripture. Exodus xiv. 2. And it was this unexpected change in the direction of their march, and the apparently disadvantageous situation in which they were then placed—entangled in the land, and shut in by the wilderness, with a deep sea in front, the mountains of Attaka on the sides, and the enemy in their rear—that tempted the Egyptians to pursue them through the valley of Bedea, by the direct route from Cairo, who overlooked them encamping by the sea, beside Pi-hahiroth, opposite to Baalzephon. Exod. xiv. 2-9.

Niebuhr wonders how the Israelites could suffer themselves to be brought into such a disadvantageous situation, or be led blindfold by Moses to their apparent destruction. "One need only travel with a caravan," says he, "which meets with the least obstacle, namely, a small torrent, to be convinced that the orientals do not let themselves be led, like fools, by their caravan baschi," or leader of the caravan. But the Israelites went out of Egypt with "a high hand," though led by Moses, yet under the visible guidance and protection of "the Lord God of the Hebrews," who "went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, and by night in a pillar of fire;" and who, for their encouragement, to enter the passage of the sea miraculously prepared for them, removed the cloud which went before the camp of Israel hitherto, and placed it behind them. "And it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a cloud and darkness to the one, but gave light by night to the other: so that the one came not near the other all the night." Exod. xiv. 8-20.

Niebuhr wonders, also, how Pharaoh and the Egyptians could be led to follow the Israelites: "Pharaoh must have wanted prudence, if, after having seen so many prodigies in Egypt, he had entered into a sea more than three leagues wide: all the Egyptians, too, must have been bereft of understanding, in wishing to pursue the Israelites into such a sea. Doubtless they knew their own country well enough to distinguish the bottom of a large sea, which bounds Egypt on that side, from a desert." But Pharaoh and the Egyptians probably did not know their situation. The cloud which separated them from the Israelites increased the darkness of the night; and they probably did not enter into the sea till about midnight, by which time the van of the Israelites might have reached the eastern shore. Meanwhile the bed of the sea, now beaten by the feet of the immense multitude of men and cattle that had gone before, might not have been easily distinguishable from the desert. If we ask, Why did the Egyptians venture to pursue the Israelites by night? Why did they not wait till daylight, when they could see whither they were going? Niebuhr himself has unwittingly answered the question: Pharaoh wanted "prudence," indeed, and the Egyptians were "bereft of understanding." And this is the scriptural solution; for God hardened the heart of Pharaoh to follow after them, that he might be honored upon Pharaoh and all his host; and that, by their miraculous destruction, the Egyptians might know that he was the Lord supreme. Exod. xiv. 4-18. The Egyptians did not find out their mistake till the "morning appeared," or till daybreak, when the rear of the Israelites had gained the shore, and the Egyptians had reached the middle of the sea, and their whole host had entered into it: then, indeed, they attempted to fly back, but in vain; for "their chariot wheels were broken off, so that they drove them heavily, and their host was troubled" by the Lord, who looked or frowned upon them through the cloudy pillar of fire, and overwhelmed all their host in the midst of the sea, when the sea suddenly returned to his strength at the signal of Moses stretching forth his hand over it. Exod. xiv. 24-28.

The particulars of this transaction demonstrate, that neither the host of the Israelites, nor the host of Pharaoh, could possibly have passed at the head of the gulf near Suez; where the sea was only half a league broad, according to Niebuhr's own supposition, and consequently too narrow to contain the whole host of Pharaoh at once; whose six hundred chariots alone, exclusive of his cavalry and infantry, must have occupied more ground. Manetho, and the Egyptian writers, have passed over in silence this tremendous visitation of their nation. An ancient writer, however, Artapanus, who wrote a history of the Jews, about B. C. 130, has preserved the following curious Egyptian traditions:—"The Memphites relate, that Moses, being well acquainted with the country, watched the influx of the tide, and made the multitude pass through the dry bed of the sea. But the Heliopolitans relate, that the king, with a great army, accompanied by the sacred animals, pursued after the Jews, who had carried off with them the substance of the Egyptians; and that Moses having been directed by a Divine voice to strike the sea with his rod, when he heard it, touched the water with his rod; and so the fluid divided, and the host passed over through a dry way. But when the Egyptians entered along with them, and pursued them, it is said that fire flashed against them in front, and the sea, returning back, overwhelmed the passage. Thus the Egyptians perished, both by the fire, and by the reflux of the tide."

The latter account is extremely curious: it not only confirms Scripture, but it notices three additional circumstances: 1. That for their protection against the God of Israel, the Egyptians brought with them the sacred animals; and by this means God executed judgment upon all the bestial gods of Egypt, as foretold, Exod. xii. 12, that perished with their infatuated votaries: completing the destruction of both, which began with smiting the first-born both of man and beast. 2. That the recovery of the jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and raiment, which they asked and obtained of the Egyptians, according to the Divine command, Exod. xii. 35, 36, was a leading motive with the Egyptians to pursue them; as the bringing back the Israelites to slavery had been with Pharaoh and his servants, or officers. 3. That the destruction of the Egyptians was partly occasioned by lightning and thunderbolts from the presence of the Lord: exactly corresponding to the Psalmist's sublime description: "The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee: they were afraid: the depths also were troubled. The clouds poured out water, the air thundered, thine arrows also went abroad. Yea, he sent out his arrows, and scattered them; he shot forth lightnings, hailstones, and coals of fire, and discomfited them. Then the channels of waters were seen, and the foundations of the world were discovered, at thy rebuke, O Lord, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils." Psalm lxxvii. 16, 17; xviii. 13-15.

The Red Sea derived its name from Edom, signifying "red," a title of Esau, to whom the bordering country of Edom, or Idumæa, belonged. Gen. xxv. 30; xxxvi. 31-40. It is also called Yam Suph, "the weedy sea," in several passages, Num. xxxiii. 10, Psalm cvi. 9, etc., which are improperly rendered "the Red Sea." Some learned authors have supposed that it was so named from the quantity of weeds in it. "But in contradiction to this," says Bruce, "I must confess, that I never in my life—and I have seen the whole extent of it—saw a weed of any sort in it. And indeed, upon the slightest consideration, it will appear to any one, that a narrow gulf, under the immediate influence of monsoons, blowing from contrary points six months each year, would have too much agitation to produce such vegetables, seldom found but in stagnant water, and seldomer, if ever, found in salt ones. My opinion then is, that it is from the large trees, or plants, of white coral, perfectly in imitation of plants on land, that the sea has taken the name 'weedy.' I saw one of these, which, from a root nearly central, threw out ramifications in a nearly central form, measuring twenty-six feet diameter every way." This seems to be the most probable solution that has been hitherto proposed of the name. The tides in this sea are but moderate. At Suez the difference between high and low water did not exceed from three to four feet, according to Niebuhr's observations on the tides in that gulf, during the years 1762 and 1763.

[Some derive 'Ερυθρά, Red, from Erythrus, a king who reigned in the adjacent region. Others think it was called Red Sea from the hue given it by vast multitudes of red animalcules found in it. The sea is a gulf of the Indian Ocean, with which it communicates by the strait Bab-el-Mandel. Its length from north-west to south-east is fourteen hundred miles, breadth from one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles. At its northern extremity it bifurcates into the Eilatitic Gulf, or Gulf of Akabah, and the "Sea of Bulrushes," as the Hebrews call it, or Gulf of Suez, the former one hundred and twelve miles in length, fifteen in average breadth; the latter one hundred and ninety miles in length, twenty in average breadth. These gulfs enclose the peninsula of Sinai. The researches of Leider, Olin, (Travels, chap. xix.,) and others, corroborate the opinion that the Israelites crossed the gulf at the valley of Bedea, or, as the word means, the miraculous valley, and not at Suez, according to Niebuhr, Robinson, Hengstenberg, and others.]

REED, אֶבֶן, Job xli. 2: [Eng., xl. 26, Heb.:] Isaiah ix. 14; xix. 15; lviii. 5; κάλαμος, Matt. xi. 7: a plant growing in fenny and watery places; very weak and slender, and bending with the least breath of wind, Matt. xi. 7: Luke vii. 24. Thus it is threatened, "The Lord shall smite Israel as a reed is shaken in the water, and he shall root up Israel out of the good land which he gave to their fathers, and shall scatter them beyond the river, because they have made their idol groves, provoking him to anger." 1 Kings xiv. 15. The slenderness and fragility of the reed is mentioned in 2 Kings xviii. 21: Isaiah xxxvi. 6; and is referred to in Matt. xii. 20, where the remark, illustrating the gentleness of our Saviour, is quoted from the prophecy of Isaiah xlii. 3. The Hebrew word in these places is קָנָם, as also in Job xl. 21: Isaiah xix. 6; xxxv. 7: Ezek. xxix. 6. See BULRUSH.

REFORMATION, usually spoken of the great Reformation in the Church, begun by Luther in 1517. The sad departure from the standard of holiness which the Romish hierarchy should have placed before them, combined with the indecency and arrogance with which they trampled upon the rights of sovereigns, and upon the property and the comfort of all classes of men, had, for a considerable period, produced a general conviction that a reformation of the Church in its head and members—to use the expression which was then prevalent—was absolutely requisite; and some steps to accomplish this had been actually taken. The celebrated Council of Constance, while, in its efforts to heal the schism which had so long grieved and scandalized the Catholic world, it set aside the rival pontiffs who claimed to be the successors of St. Peter, laid down the important maxim, that a general council was superior to a pope, and that its decisions can restrain his power; and this doctrine, which might otherwise have appeared to arise out of the extraordinary circumstances under which it was declared, was fully confirmed by the Council of Basel, which met several years after, and which decided the point upon grounds that might at all times be urged. The popes, indeed, remonstrated against this, but still they were compelled to lower their tone; and they were often reminded, even within the precincts of their own court, that the period was fast approaching when the fallacy of many of their pretensions would be ascertained and exposed. It had become common, before the election of a new pontiff, to frame certain articles of reformation, which the successful candidate was required to swear that he would carry into effect; and although the oath was uniformly disregarded or violated, the views which led to the imposition of it indicated the existence of a spirit which could not be eradicated, and which might, from events that could not be foreseen, and could not be controlled, acquire a vigor which no exertion of power could resist. Such, under the beneficent arrangement of Providence, was soon actually the case. In the progress of the opposition made to some of the worst abuses of Rome, they who conducted that opposition were guided to the word of life; they studied it with avidity and with delight; and they found themselves furnished by it with sufficient armor for the mighty contest in which they were to engage. They discovered in the New Testament what Christianity really was; their representations of it were received with wonder, and read with avidity; the secession from the Church of Rome became much more rapid and much more extensive than it had previously been, and all possibility of reconciliation with that Church was done away. Of this the popes were fully aware; and as the only way of counteracting that which was to them so formidable, they attempted, by various devices, to fetter the press, to prevent the circulation of the Bible, and thus again to plunge the world into that intellectual darkness from which it had been happily delivered. The scheme was impracticable. The "Indices Expurgatorii," in which they pointed out the works that they condemned, and which they declared it to be heresy and pollution to peruse, increased the desire to become acquainted with them; and although some who indulged that curiosity suffered the punishment denounced by the inquisition against the enemies of papal superstition, there was an immense proportion which even spiritual tyranny could not reach; so that the light which had been kindled daily brightened till it shone with unclouded lustre through many of the most powerful and the most refined nations of Europe.

It is worthy of careful observation, that the resistance which ultimately proved so successful, was first occasioned by practices that had been devised for establishing the monstrous despotism of the popes: that when it commenced, it was directed against what was conceived to be an abuse of power, without the slightest suspicion being entertained that the power itself was unchristian; that the reformers gradually advanced—every additional inquiry to which they were conducted enlarging their views, and bringing them acquainted with fresh proofs of that daring usurpation to which men had long submitted, till at length the foundation upon which the whole system, venerated through ages, rested, was disclosed to them, and perceived to be a foundation of sand. The consequence was, that the supremacy of the pope was by multitudes abjured; that he was branded as Antichrist; that communion with the popish Church was avoided as sinful; and that the form of ecclesiastical polity, the essential principle of which was the infallibility of the Bishop of Rome, was for ever renounced. The wonderful manner in which this signal revolution, so fraught with blessings to mankind, was accomplished, the various events which mark its history, and the characters and exertions of the men by whose agency it was effected, cannot be too often surveyed, or too deeply fixed in the memory. The whole, even with reference to the illumination of the human mind, and the improvement of the social state of the world, is in a high degree interesting; and that interest is unpeakenly increased by our discerning the most striking evidence of the gracious interposition of Providence dissipating the cloud which obscured Divine truth, and restoring to mankind that sacred treasure which is sufficient to make all who seriously examine it wise unto salvation. It does not, however, come within the province of this work to give a minute history of the origin and progress of the Reformation, to trace the steps of Zuinglius and of Luther, and to detail the circumstances which advanced or retarded them in the glorious career upon which they had entered. Much discussion has taken place with respect to the motives by which Luther was actuated. This point, in reference to what he accomplished, is really of little moment; but there cannot be a doubt that although he might, throughout his arduous struggle, be guided occasionally by inferior considerations, he was eventually, at least, chiefly animated by the noble and disinterested wish to emancipate his fellow-creatures from what he was convinced was the direct and most infatuated spiritual oppression; that he looked to Heaven for support, and that such support he largely received.

[REFORMED. In the widest sense, this term denotes all who separated from Rome at the time of the Reformation, and also their spiritual descendants. It is thus synonymous with PROTESTANT. The nominal adherents to the Reformation are estimated at 88,250,000, distributed as follows: Great Britain, 21,000,000; Ireland, 2,000,000; Prussia, 10,000,000; German States, 11,000,000; Austrian empire, 3,000,000; Denmark, 2,500,000; Sweden and Norway, 4,600,000; Holland and Belgium, 2,500,000; Switzerland, 1,500,000; France, 2,500,000; Russian empire, 1,200,000; British America, 1,750,000; Greece and Asiatic Islands, 500,000; United States of America, 21,000,000; Africa and its islands, 700,000; West Indies and Guinea, 1,000,000; India, Ceylon, and China, 500,000; Australia and Polynesia, 1,000,000. It is believed, however, that not one-fourth of these are communicants.—In a more limited sense, the term denotes the Protestants in Switzerland, France, Holland, and Germany, who separated from the Lutherans on the ground of the adherence of the latter to consubstantiation and some other points. They are organized on the Calvinistic platform of doctrine and polity.]

[REFORMED CHURCH, DUTCH. This is the oldest body of Presbyterians in the United States. The first minister sent to this country from Holland was Everardus Bogardus, who left to return home in 1647. Other ministers were soon after sent over by the Classis of Amsterdam and the Synod of North Holland, who had the spiritual charge of "New Netherlands," as the Dutch colony was called. For a while they had no higher judicatory than a consistory, but in 1738 they organized a cetus, which, in 1757, was developed into a classis, without, however, the approval of the authorities in Holland. Through the instrumentality of John H. Livingston, D.D., the Synod of North Holland and Classis of Amsterdam devised a plan by which, in 1772, a General Synod was organized, with five classes, three in New Jersey and two in New York. The Dutch language began to be laid aside in the pulpit in 1764, and gradually fell into general disuse. Rutgers College, at New Brunswick, was founded by this Church, in 1770; connected with it is a theological seminary. The Church has a General Synod, two particular synods, twenty-eight classes, or presbyteries, three hundred and eighty ministers, fifty candidates and licentiates, and thirty-six thousand two hundred and ninety-seven communicants. It manifests enlightened zeal in the cause of missions and education. Its standards are those of the Reformed Church of Holland, as settled by the Synod of Dort.]

[REFORMED CHURCH, GERMAN. The German Reformed Churches, which at an early period were scattered through Pennsylvania and other colonies of this country, were united in 1746, by the Rev. Michael Schlatter. It is remarkable that this minister was sent over for this purpose not by the Church in Germany, but by the Classis of Amsterdam and Synod of North Holland. He was soon followed by others, who came over under the same auspices. In 1792 the dependence of this Church on the Church in Holland ceased, by the organization of a regular synod. In 1819 it was divided into classes. In 1825 a theological institution was opened at Carlisle; it has since been transferred to York, and finally to Mercersburg, Pa. It has some thirty students. The Church has also a college at Lancaster. It takes great interest in missionary and educational enterprises. It numbers some three hundred and fifty ministers, sixty-five licentiates and candidates, and one hundred and ten thousand communicants. A species of semi-Romanism has been recently developed in the theological seminary, and it is feared has made considerable progress in the German Reformed Church. The standards of the Church are, of course, Calvinistic.]

REFUGE, CITIES OF. In order to provide for the security of those who, without design, might happen to kill a person, in whatever manner it should be, the Lord commanded Moses to appoint six cities of refuge—Exod. xxi. 18: Num. xxxv. 11, etc.—that whoever should undesignedly spill

the blood of a fellow-creature might retire thither, and have time to prepare for his defence before the judges; so that the relatives of the deceased might not pursue and kill him. Of these cities there were three on each side Jordan. Those on this side Jordan were Kedesh of Naphtali, Hebron, and Shechem; those beyond Jordan were Bezer, Golan, and Ramoth-Gilead. Joshua xx. 7, 8. They served not only for the Hebrews, but for strangers also that should dwell in their country. These cities were to be of easy access, and to have good roads to them, and bridges wherever there should be occasion. The width of these roads was, at least, to be two-and-thirty cubits, or eight-and-forty feet. When there were any cross-roads, they were careful to erect posts with an inscription pointing to the city of refuge. Every year, on the fifteenth of the month Adar, which answers to our February moon, the magistrates of the city visited the roads to see if they were in good condition. The city was to be well supplied with water and provisions. It was not allowed to make any weapons there, lest the relatives of the deceased should be furnished with arms for the gratifying of their revenge. Lastly, it was necessary that whoever took refuge there should understand a trade or calling, that he might not be chargeable to the inhabitants. They were wont to send some prudent persons to meet those who were pursuing their revenge for the relations, that they might dispose them to clemency, and persuade them to wait the decision of justice.

Though the man-slayer had fled to the city of refuge, yet he was not on this account exempted from the pursuit of justice. An information was preferred against him, Num. xxxv. 12; he was summoned before the judges and before the people, to clear himself, and to prove that the murder was merely casual and involuntary. If he was found innocent, he dwelt safely in the city to which he had retired; if otherwise, he was put to death according to the severity of the law. The following texts of Scripture are not very explicit whether the affair was under the cognizance of the judges of the place where the murder was committed, or of the judges of the city of refuge to which the murderer had fled: Deut. xix. 11, 12: Josh. xx. 4-6: Num. xxxv. 25; and the commentators are at variance in this matter. But it appears, from a passage of Joshua, that the man-slayer was to undergo two trials; first, in the city of refuge, where the judges summarily examined the affair, and heard his allegations at his first arrival; secondly, when he was taken back to his own city, to be judged by the magistrates of the place, who took the cause under a more strict and scrupulous examination. If the latter judges declared him innocent, they had him reconducted, under a strong guard, to the city of refuge to which he had before fled. He was not, however, immediately liberated; but, to inspire the greater horror even of involuntary murder, it seems as if the law would punish it by a kind of banishment; for he was obliged to dwell in the city, without going out of it, till the death of the high-priest; and if before that time he was imprudent enough to leave the city, the avenger of blood might safely kill him; but after the death of the high-priest he was at liberty to go whither he pleased without molestation.

It is a curious fact, that the North American Indian nations have, most of them, either a house or town of refuge, which is a sure asylum to protect a man-slayer, or the unfortunate captive, if he can once enter it. "In almost every Indian nation," says Adair, "there are several peaceable towns which are called old, beloved, ancient, holy, or white towns: (white being their fixed emblem of peace, friendship, prosperity, happiness, purity etc.) they seem to have been formerly towns of refuge; for it is not in the memory of their oldest people that ever human blood was shed in them, although they often force persons from thence, and put them to death elsewhere." Sanctuaries affording security for criminals are still known in the east, and anciently were established in Europe.

REGENERATION, a new birth; that work of the Holy Spirit by which we experience a change of heart. It is expressed in Scripture by being born again, John iii. 7; born from above; being quickened, Eph. ii. 1; by Christ being formed in the heart, Gal. iv. 19; by our partaking of the Divine nature, 2 Pet. i. 4. The efficient cause of regeneration is the Divine Spirit. That man is not the author of it, is evident from John i. 12, 13; iii. 4: Eph. ii. 8, 10. The instrumental cause is the word of God. James i. 18: 1 Peter i. 23: 1 Cor. iv. 15. The change in regeneration consists in the recovery of the moral image of God upon the heart; that is to say, so as to love him supremely and serve him ultimately as our highest end, and to delight in him superlatively as our chief good. The sum of the moral law is to love the Lord our God with all our heart, and soul, and strength, and mind. This is the duty of every rational creature; and in order to obey it perfectly, no part of our inward affection or actual service ought to be, at any time, or in the least degree, misapplied. Regeneration consists in the principle being implanted, obtaining the ascendancy, and habitually prevailing over its opposite. It may be remarked, that though the inspired writers use various terms and modes of speech in order to describe this change of mind—sometimes terming it conversion, regeneration, a new creation, or the new creature, putting off the old man with his deeds, and putting on the new man, walking not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, etc.—yet it is all effected by the word of truth, or the gospel of salvation, gaining an entrance into the mind through Divine teaching, so as to possess the understanding, subdue the will, and reign in the affections. In a word, it is faith working by love that constitutes the new creature, the regenerate man. Gal. v. 6: 1 John v. 1-5. Regeneration is to be distinguished from our justification, although it is connected with it. Every one who is justified is also regenerated; but the one places us in a new relation, and the other in a new moral state. Our Lord, in one instance, uses the term regeneration for the resurrection state: "Ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging." Matt. xix. 28. And, accordingly, Dr.

Campbell translates the passage thus: "At the renovation, when the Son of man shall be seated on the glorious throne, ye, my followers, sitting also upon twelve thrones, shall judge." We are accustomed, says he, to apply the term solely to the conversion of individuals; whereas its relation here is to the general state of things. The principal completion will be at the general resurrection, when there will be, in the most important sense, a renovation or regeneration of heaven and earth, when all things shall become new.

[REGIUM DONUM. A donation of Parliament to Dissenters, first granted in 1723, in recognition of their attachment to the House of Brunswick.]

[REGULARS. Priests belonging to monastic orders.]

[REHOB. A town of Asher, in the north of Palestine, Num. xiii. 21: Josh. xix. 28, called Beth-Rehob, Judg. xviii. 28: 2 Sam. x. 6. It was a Levitical town, Judg. xxi. 31.]

REHOBOAM, the son and successor of Solomon; his mother was Naamah, an Ammonitish woman, whom Solomon had married. 1 Kings xiv. 20, 21. He was forty-one years of age when he began to reign, and, consequently, was born in the first year of his father's reign, A. M. 2990, or the year before. This prince reigned seventeen years at Jerusalem, and died A. M. 3046. After the death of Solomon, Rehoboam came to Shechem, because all Israel were there assembled to make him king. 1 Kings xii. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who had headed a sedition against Solomon, and had been compelled, toward the close of his reign, to take refuge in Egypt, as soon as he heard that this prince was dead, returned into Judea, and came to the assembly of the people of Shechem. The Israelites would have made terms with Rehoboam; but, being a poor politician, and following the advice of some junior counsellors, he managed his business so imprudently that he lost the whole house of Israel, save the tribes of Judah and Benjamin.

[REHOBOTH. A city of Assyria, unless the word, meaning wide places, is construed with Nineveh, Gen. x. 11.—Also, a well dug by Isaac's men. Gen. xxvii. 22.—Also, a city identified by Robinson with er-Rahabeh, on the western bank of the Euphrates, in ez-Zôr. Gen. xxxvi. 37.]

[RELICS. Remains of the bodies, clothes, etc., of saints. These were early had in great veneration. They were frequently deposited by the fathers under the altars of churches. The rage for procuring them became so great, that Theodosius, in 386, forbade the people to dig them up or to traffic in them. In later times miraculous powers were attributed to them, and they were honored with idolatrous devotion. This is recognized by the Council of Trent, Canons and Decrees, Sess. xxv., and the Creed of Pius IV. It is a prevalent superstition at the present day in popish countries, where the multitude and character of the pretended relics excite the Protestant's pity, indignation, and contempt.]

[RELIEF SYNOD. A sect of Presbyterians, originating in 1752 with the Rev. Mr. Gillespie and others, who organized a presbytery at Colinsburgh, Scotland, called the "Presbytery of Relief," because it was formed to give relief to those Presbyterians who disapproved of the law in regard to patronage in the appointment of ministers. Their numbers greatly increasing, they subsequently formed a synod. In 1847, they effected a union with the "United Secession Church," under the style of the "United Presbyterian Church." See PRESBYTERIANS and SECEDERS.]

[REMONSTRANCE. A complaint of the Commons, in 1628, to Charles I., concerning the increase of Popery, the discouragement of orthodox preachers, and other grievances, ecclesiastical and civil. It was answered by the king.]

REMONSTRANTS have obtained this name, particularly on the continent, because, in 1610, they presented to the states of Holland a petition, entitled their Remonstrance, in which they stated their grievances, and prayed for relief. They are also called Arminians, because they maintained the doctrines respecting predestination and grace which were embraced and defended by James Harmenson, or Arminius, an eminent Protestant divine and a native of Holland, who was born in 1560, and died in 1609. He first studied at Leyden, and then at Geneva. While at the University of Geneva, he studied under Beza, by whom he was instructed in the doctrines of Calvin; and having been judged by Martin Lydius, professor of divinity at Franeker, a proper person to refute a work in which the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination had been attacked by some ministers of Delft, he undertook the task. On a strict examination of the reasons on both sides, however, he became a convert to the opinions which he was employed to refute. The result of his inquiries on this and other subjects connected with it was, that thinking the doctrines of Calvin with respect to free will, predestination, and grace too severe, he expressed his doubts respecting them in the year 1591, and at length adopted the religious system of those who extend the love of God and the merits of his Son to all mankind. After his appointment to the theological chair of Leyden, in 1603, he avowed and vindicated the principles which he had embraced; but the prudence and caution with which he published and defended them could not screen him from the resentment of those who adhered to the theological system of Calvin, and in particular from the opposition of Gomar, his colleague. After the death of Arminius, the controversy, thus begun, became more general, and threatened to involve the United Provinces in civil discord. However, the Arminian tenets gained ground, and were adopted by several persons of merit and distinction. The Calvinists, or Gomarists, as they were now called, appealed to a national synod. Accordingly, a synod was at length convened at Dordrecht or Dort, and was composed of ecclesiastical and lay deputies from the United Provinces, and also of ecclesiastical deputies from the reformed Churches of England, Switzerland, Bremen, Hesse, and the Palatinate. This synod sat from the first of November, 1618, to the twenty-sixth of April, 1619. The principal advocate in favor of the Arminians was Episcopius, who was at that time professor of divinity at Leyden. The religious principles of the Arminians have insinuated themselves more or less into the established Church in Holland, and imbued the theological system of many of those pastors who are appointed to maintain the doctrine and authority of the Synod of Dort. The principles of Arminius were early introduced into various other countries, as Great Britain, France, Geneva, and many parts of Switzerland; but their progress is said to have been rather retarded of late, especially in Germany and several parts of Switzerland, by the prevalence of the Leibnitzian and Wolfian philosophy, which is more favorable to Calvinism. The distinguishing tenets of the Remonstrants may be said to consist chiefly in the different light in which they view the subjects of the Five Points, or in the different explanation which they give to them, and comprised in the five following articles: predestination, universal redemption, the operation of grace, the freedom of the will, and perseverance. They believe that God, having an equal regard for all his creatures, sent his Son to die for the sins not of the elect only, but of the whole world; that no mortal is rendered finally unhappy by an eternal and invincible decree, but that the misery of those who perish arises from themselves; and that, in this present imperfect state, believers, if not vigilant, may, through the force of temptation and the influence of Satan, fall from grace, and sink into final perdition. See ARMINIANISM.

REMPHAN, רֵמְפָן, Remphā, signifies an idol, according to the Septuagint. Amos (v. 26) upbraids the Hebrews with having carried, during their wanderings in the wilderness, the tabernacle of their Moloch and Chium, their images, the star of their god, which they made to themselves, according to our version of the Bible. St. Stephen, quoting this passage of Amos, says, "Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan," Acts vii. 43, which has given occasion to a variety of conjectures. Grotius thinks it to have been some deity, as Rimmon; and Capellus and Hammond take this Remphan to be a king of Egypt, deified by his subjects. A late writer is of opinion that God here refers to the idolatries to which, in succeeding ages, the Jews were gradually given up, after having begun to revolt in the wilderness by the sin of the golden calf.

[REÖRDINATION. The Apostolical Canons forbid a second ordination of bishop, presbyter, or deacon, on pain of deposition, both of the ordainer and ordained, unless the previous ordination were schismatical or heretical.]

REPENTANCE is sometimes used generally for a change of mind, and an earnest wishing that something were undone that has been done. Esau found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears: he could not move his father Isaac to repent of what he had done, or to recall the blessing from Jacob and confer it on himself. Heb. xii. 17: Matt. iii. 2; iv. 17.

Taken in a religious sense, it signifies conviction of sin, and sorrow for it. But there is, 1. A partial or worldly repentance, wherein one is grieved for and turns from his sin, merely on account of the hurt it has done or is likely to do him; so a malefactor who still loves his sin, repents of doing it, because it brings him to punishment. 2. An evangelical repentance, which is a godly sorrow wrought in the heart of a sinful person by the word and Spirit of God, whereby, from a sense of his sin as offensive to God, and defiling and endangering to his own soul, and from an apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ, he, with grief and hatred of all his known sins, turns from them to God, as his Saviour and Lord. This is called "repentance toward God," as therein we turn from sin to him; and "repentance unto life," as it leads to spiritual life, and is the first step to eternal life. Matt. iii. 2: Acts iii. 19; xi. 18; xx. 12. God himself is said to repent; but this can only be understood of his altering his conduct toward his creatures, either in the bestowing of good or the infliction of evil; which change in the Divine conduct is founded on a change in his creatures; and thus, speaking after the manner of men, God is said to repent.

REPETITIONS IN PRAYER. These are forbidden by our Lord, and were well styled "vain," if they consisted, as among the Mohammedans, in the repetition of words and phrases. Richardson mentions an old man who travelled with him, who was thought to be of peculiar sanctity, and most devout in prayer: "Certainly he did not pray in secret, communing with his heart, but called aloud with all his might, and repeated the words as fast as his tongue could give them utterance. The form and words of his prayer were the same with those of the others; but this good man had made a vow to repeat certain words of the prayer a given number of times, both night and morning. The word rabboni, for example, answering to our word Lord, he would bind himself to repeat a hundred or two hundred times, twice a day; and, accordingly, went on in the hearing of all the party; and on his knees sometimes with his face directed steadily to heaven, and at other times bowing down to the ground, and calling out rabboni, rabboni, rabboni, rabboni, rabboni, etc., as fast as he could articulate the words after each other, like a schoolboy going through his task, not like a man who, praying with the heart and the understanding also, continues longer on his knees, in the rapture of devotion, whose soul is a flame of fire, enkindled by his Maker, and fixing upon his God, like Jacob, will not let him go until he bless him. Having settled his accounts with the word rabboni, which the telling of his beads enabled him to know when he had done, he proceeded to dispose of his other vows in a similar manner. Allah houakbar perhaps came next, 'God most great;' and he would go on, as with the other, Allah houakbar, Allah houakbar, Allah houakbar, Allah houakbar, etc., repeating them as fast as he could frame his organs to pronounce them."

REPHAIM. The Rephaim were the ancient giants of the land of Canaan. There were anciently several families of them in this country.

It is commonly thought that they were descended from one called Rephah, or Rapha; but others imagine that the word Rephaim properly signifies giants, in the ancient language of this people. There were some of the Rephaim beyond Jordan, at Ashteroth Karnaim, in the time of Abraham, when Chedorlaomer made war against them. Gen. xiv. 5. There were also some of them in the country in the days of Moses. Og, King of Bashan, was one of the posterity of the Rephaim. Josh. xii. 4. Also in the time of Joshua there were some of their descendants in the land of Canaan. Joshua xvii. 15. Lastly, we hear of them still in David's time, in the city of Gath. 1 Chron. xx. 4-6. The giants Goliath, Sippai, Lahmi, and others, were some remains of the Rephaim; their magnitude and strength are known from Scripture. See GIANTS. [For the use of the word in Job xxvi. 5: Ps. lxxxviii. 11, (10, Eng.): Prov. ii. 18; ix. 18; xxi. 16: Isa. xiv. 9; xxvi. 14, 19, see Parkhurst, Hebrew Lexicon, sub voce, and A. Clarke on Job xxvi. 5.]

[REPHAIM, VALLEY OF. A fertile valley between Jerusalem and Bethlehem: it was probably settled by the giants. Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16: 2 Sam. v. 18, 22: Isa. xvii. 5.]

REPHIDIM, a station or encampment of the Israelites. Exodus xvii. 1. At this station, adjoining to Mount Horeb, the people again murmured for want of water; and they chid Moses, saying, "Give us water that we may drink." And "they tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us or not?" Moses, therefore, to convince them that he was, by a more obvious miracle than at Marah, smote the rock with his rod, by the Divine command, and brought water out of it for the people to drink; wherefore he called the place Meribah, "chiding," and the rock Massah, "temptation." On their way to Rephidim, the Amalekites, the original inhabitants of the country, who are noticed in Abraham's days, Gen. xiv. 7, not having the fear of God before their eyes, nor regarding the judgments recently inflicted on the Egyptians, attacked the rear of the Israelites when they were faint and weary; but were defeated by a chosen party, under the command of Joshua, the faithful lieutenant of Moses, who is first noticed on this occasion, and even then pointed out by the Lord as his successor. This victory was miraculous; for while Moses held up his hand Israel prevailed, but when he let it down Amalek prevailed. So Aaron and Hur (the husband of Miriam, according to Josephus) held up both his hands steadily till sunset, and thereby gave a decided victory to Israel. This unprovoked aggression of the Amalekites drew down upon them from the Lord the sentence of "war from generation to generation" between them and the Israelites, and of final extermination, which was commanded to be written or registered in a book, for a memorial to Joshua and his successors, the judges and kings of Israel, and was carried into execution by Saul, 1 Sam. xv. 8, by David, 1 Sam. xxx. 17, and finally accomplished by the Simeonites in Hezekiah's reign. Exod. xvii. 8-13: Deut. xxv. 17: 1 Chron. iv. 43. While the Israelites were encamped at Rephidim, on the western side of Horeb, the mount of God, Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, who lived in that neighborhood, and was priest and prince of Midian, came to visit him, with his wife Zipporah, and his two sons, Eleazar and Gershom, who had accompanied him part of the way to Egypt, but returned home again; and they rejoiced with him "for all the goodness which the Lord had done for Israel, whom he had delivered out of the hand of the Egyptians;" and upon this occasion Jethro, as "a priest of the most high God," of the order of Melchizedek, "offered a burnt-offering and sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, at which Aaron and all the elders of Israel ate bread with Jethro before God," by a repetition of the eucharistic feast upon a sacrifice which Melchizedek formerly administered to Abraham. Gen. xiv. 18: Exod. xviii. 1-12. Thus was fulfilled the prophetic sign which the Lord had given to Moses when he first appeared to him in the burning bush: "This shall be a token unto thee that I have sent thee: when thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain." Exod. iii. 12. The speedy accomplishment, therefore, of this sign, at the beginning of their journey, was well calculated to strengthen their faith or reliance on the Divine protection throughout. Jethro appears to have been distinguished not only for his piety, but also for his political wisdom. By his advice, which also was approved by the Lord, Moses, to relieve himself from the fatigue of administering justice to the people, the whole day, from morning until evening, instituted inferior judges or magistrates over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, as his deputies, who were to relieve him from the burden of judging the smaller causes, but to refer the greater or more difficult to Moses, for his decision. [See HOREB.]

REPROBATION is equivalent to rejection. Rejection always implies a cause: "Reprobate silver shall men call them, inasmuch that the Lord hath rejected them," Jer. vi. 30; that is, they are base metal, which will not bear the proof. Conditional reprobation, or rejecting men from the Divine mercy, because of their impenitence or refusal of salvation, is a scriptural doctrine; but to the unconditional, absolute reprobation of the rigid Calvinists, the following objections may be urged:

1. It cannot be reconciled to the love of God. "God is love." "He is loving to every man, and his tender mercies are over all his works."

2. Nor to the wisdom of God; for the bringing into being a vast number of intelligent creatures under a necessity of sinning, and of being eternally lost, teaches no moral lesson to the world; and contradicts all those notions of wisdom in the ends and processes of government, which we are taught to look for, not only from natural reason, but from the Scriptures.

3. Nor to the grace of God, which is so often magnified in the Scriptures; for doth it argue any sovereign or high strain, any superabounding richness of grace or mercy in any man, when ten thousand have equally offended him, only to pardon one or two of them? Or in what sense has "the grace of God appeared unto all men," or even to one-millionth part of them?

4. Nor can this merciless reprobation be reconciled to any of those numerous passages in which Almighty God is represented as tenderly compassionate and pitiful to the worst and most unworthy of his creatures, even them who finally perish. "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth." "Being grieved at the hardness of their hearts." "How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" "The Lord is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish." "Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?"

5. It is as manifestly contrary to his justice. Here, indeed, we would not assume to measure this attribute of God by unauthorized human conceptions; but when God himself has appealed to those established notions of justice and equity which have been received among all enlightened persons, in all ages, as the measure and rule of his own, we cannot be charged with this presumption. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" "Are not my ways equal? saith the Lord." We may then be bold to affirm that justice and equity in God are what they are taken to be among reasonable men; and if all men everywhere would condemn it, as most contrary to justice and right, that a sovereign should condemn to death one or more of his subjects for not obeying laws which it is absolutely impossible for them, under any circumstances which they can possibly avail themselves of, to obey, and much more the greater part of his subjects; and to require them, on pain of aggravated punishment, to do something in order to the pardon and remission of their offences, which he knows they cannot do, say to stop the tide or to remove a mountain; it implies a charge as obviously unjust against God, who is "just in the judgments which he executeth," to suppose him to act precisely in the same manner in regard to those whom he has passed by and rejected, without any avoidable fault of their own; to destroy them by the simple rule of his own sovereignty, or, in other words, to show that he has power to do it. In whatever light the subject be viewed, no fault, in any right construction, can be chargeable upon the persons so punished, or, as we may rather say, destroyed, since punishment supposes a judicial proceeding, which this act shuts out. For either the reprobates are destroyed for a pure reason of sovereignty without any reference to their sinfulness, and thus all criminality is left out of the consideration; or they are destroyed for the sin of Adam, to which they were not consenting; or for personal faults resulting from a corruption of nature which they brought into the world with them, and which God wills not to correct, and which they have no power to correct themselves. Every received notion of justice is thus violated. We grant, indeed, that some proceedings of the Almighty may appear at first irreconcilable with justice which are not so; as that we should suffer pain and death, and be infected with a morally corrupt nature, in consequence of the transgression of our first progenitors; that children should suffer for their parents' faults in the ordinary course of providence; and that in general calamities the comparatively innocent should suffer the same evils as the guilty. But none of these are parallel cases. For the "free gift" has come upon all men, "to justification of life," through "the righteousness" of the second Adam, so that the terms of our probation are but changed. None are doomed to inevitable ruin, or the above words of the apostle would have no meaning; and pain and death, as to all who avail themselves of the remedy, are made the instruments of a higher life, and of a superabounding of grace through Christ. The same observation may be made as to children who suffer evils for their parents' faults. This circumstance alters the terms of their probation; but if every condition of probation leaves to men the possibility and the hope of eternal life, and the circumstances of all are balanced and weighed by Him who administers the affairs of individuals on principles the end of which is to turn all the evils of life into spiritual and higher blessings, there is, obviously, no impeachment of justice in the circumstances of the probation assigned to any person whatever. As to the innocent suffering equally with the guilty in general calamities, the persons so suffering are but comparatively innocent, and their personal transgressions against God deserve a higher punishment than any which this life witnesses; this may also as to them be overruled for merciful purposes, and a future life presents its manifold compensations. But as to the non-elect, the whole case, in this scheme of sovereign reprobation, or sovereign preterition, is supposed to be before us. Their state is fixed: their afflictions in this life will not in any instance be overruled for ends of edification and salvation; they are left under a necessity of sinning in every condition; and a future life presents no compensation, but a fearful looking for of fiery and quenchless indignation. It is surely not possible for the ingenuity of man to reconcile this to any notion of just government which has ever obtained; and by the established notions of justice and equity in human affairs, we are taught by the Scriptures themselves to judge of the Divine proceedings in all completely stated and comprehensible cases.

6. Equally impossible is it to reconcile this notion to the sincerity of God in offering salvation by Christ to all who hear the gospel, of whom this scheme supposes the majority, or at least great numbers, to be among the reprobate. The gospel, as we have seen, is commanded to be preached to every creature; which publication of good news to every creature is an offer of salvation to every creature, accompanied with earnest invitations to embrace it, and admonitory comminations lest any should neglect and despise it. But does it not involve a serious reflection upon the truth and sincerity of God which men ought to shudder at, to assume, that at the very time the gospel is thus preached, no part of this good news was ever designed to benefit the majority, or any great part, of those to whom it is addressed? that they to whom this love of God in Christ is proclaimed were never loved by God? that he has decreed that many to whom he offers salvation, and whom he invites to receive it, shall never be saved? and that he will consider their sins aggravated by rejecting that which they never could receive, and which he never designed them to receive? It is no answer to this to say that we also admit that the offers of mercy are made by God to many whom he, by virtue of his prescience, knows will never receive them. We grant this; but it is enough to reply, that in this case there is no insincerity. On the Calvinian scheme the offer of salvation is made to those for whose sins Christ made no atonement; on the other, he made atonement for the sins of all. On the former, the offer is made to those whom God never designed to embrace it; on the latter, to none but those whom God seriously and in truth wills that they should avail themselves of it: on one theory, the bar to the salvation of the non-elect lies in the want of a provided sacrifice for sin; on the other, it rests solely in men themselves: one consists, therefore, with a perfect sincerity of offer, the other cannot be maintained without bringing the sincerity of God into question, and fixing a stigma upon his moral truth.

7. Unconditional reprobation cannot be reconciled with that frequent declaration of Scripture, that "God is no respecter of persons." This phrase, we grant, is not to be interpreted as though the bounties of the Almighty were dispensed in equal measures to his creatures. In the administration of favor, there is place for the exercise of that prerogative which, in a just sense, is called the sovereignty of God; but justice knows but of one rule; it is, in its nature, settled and fixed, and looks not at the person, but the case. To have respect of persons is a phrase, therefore, in Scripture, which sometimes refers to judicial proceedings, and signifies to judge from partiality and affection, and not upon the merits of the question. It is also used by St. Peter with reference to the acceptance of Cornelius: "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." Here it is clear, that to respect persons would be to reject or accept them without regard to their moral qualities, and on some national and other prejudice or partiality which forms no moral rule of any kind. But if the doctrine of absolute election and reprobation be true; if we are to understand that men like Jacob and Esau, in the Calvinistic construction of the passage, while in the womb of their mother, nay, from eternity, are loved and hated, elected or reprobated, before they have done "good or evil," then it necessarily follows that there is precisely this kind of respect of persons with God; for his acceptance or rejection of men stands on some ground of aversion or dislike, which cannot be resolved into any moral rule, and has no respect to the merits of the case itself; and if the Scripture affirms that there is no such respect of persons with God, then the doctrine which implies it is contradicted by inspired authority.

8. The doctrine of which we are showing the difficulties, brings with it the repulsive and shocking opinion of the eternal punishment of infants. Some Calvinists have, indeed, to get rid of the difficulty, or rather to put it out of sight, consigned them to annihilation; but of the annihilation of any human being there is no intimation in the word of God. In order, therefore, to avoid the fearful consequence of admitting the punishment of beings innocent as to all actual sin, there is no other way than to suppose all children, dying in infancy, to be an elected portion of mankind, which, however, would be a mere hypothesis brought in to serve a theory without any evidence. That some of those who, as they suppose, are under this sentence of reprobation, die in their infancy, is, probably, what most Calvinists allow; and, if their doctrine be received, cannot be denied; and it follows, therefore, that all such infants are eternally lost. Now, we know that infants are not lost, because our Lord gave it as a reason why little children ought not to be hindered from coming unto him, that "of such is the kingdom of heaven." On which Calvin himself remarks, "In this word, 'for of such is the kingdom of heaven,' Christ comprehends as well little children themselves, as those who in disposition resemble them. Hac voce, tam parvulos, quam eorum similes, comprehendit." We are assured of the salvation of infants, also, because "the free gift has come upon all men to," in order to, "justification of life," and because children are not capable of rejecting that blessing, and must, therefore, derive benefit from it. The point, also, on which we have just now touched, that "there is no respect of persons with God," demonstrates it. For, as it will be acknowledged that some children, dying in infancy, are saved, it must follow, from this principle and axiom in the Divine government, that all infants are saved; for the case of all infants, as to innocence or guilt, sin or righteousness, being the same, and God, as a judge, being "no respecter of persons," but regarding only the merits of the case, he cannot make this awful distinction as to them, that one part shall be eternally saved and the other eternally lost. That doctrine, therefore, which implies the perdition of infants, cannot be congruous to the Scriptures of truth, but is utterly abhorrent to them.

Finally, not to multiply these instances of the difficulties which accompany the doctrine of absolute reprobation, or of preterition, (to use the milder term, though the argument is not in the least changed by it,) it destroys the end of punitive justice. That end can only be, to deter men from offence, and to add strength to the law of God. But if the whole body of the reprobate are left to the influence of their fallen nature, without remedy, they cannot be deterred from sin by threats of inevitable punishment; nor can they ever submit to the dominion of the law of God: their doom is fixed, and threats and examples can avail nothing.

RESTITUTION, that act of justice by which we restore to our neighbor whatever we have unjustly deprived him of. Exod. xxii. 1: Luke xix. 8. Moralists observe, respecting restitution, 1. That where it can be made in kind, or the injury can be certainly valued, we are to restore the thing or the value. 2. We are bound to restore the thing with the natural increase of it, that is, to satisfy for the loss sustained in the meantime, and the gain hindered. 3. When the thing cannot be restored, and the value of it is not certain, we are to give reasonable satisfaction, according to a liberal estimation. 4. We are at least to give, by way of restitution, what the law would give; for that is generally equal, and in most cases rather favorable than rigorous. 5. A man is not only bound to make restitution for the injury he did, but for all that directly follows upon the injurious act; for the first injury being wilful, we are supposed to will all that which follows upon it.

RESURRECTION. The belief of a general resurrection of the dead, which will come to pass at the end of the world, and will be followed with an immortality either of happiness or misery, is an article of religion in common to Jews and Christians. It is very expressly taught both in the Old and New Testaments: Psalm xvi. 10: Job xix. 25, etc.: Ezek. xxxvii. 1, etc.: Isaiah xxvi. 19: John v. 28, 29; and to these may be added, Wisdom iii. 1, etc.: iv. 15: 2 Macc. vii. 14, 23, 29, etc. At the time when our Saviour appeared in Judea, the resurrection from the dead was received as one of the principal articles of the Jewish religion by the whole body of the nation, the Sadducees excepted. Matt. xxii. 23: Luke xx. 28: Mark xii. 18: John xi. 23, 24: Acts xxiii. 6, 8. Our Saviour arose himself from the dead, to give us, in his own person, a proof, a pledge, and a pattern of our future resurrection. St. Paul, in almost all his Epistles, speaks of a general resurrection, refutes those who denied or opposed it, and proves and explains it by several circumstances. Rom. vi. 5: 1 Cor. xv. 12-15: Phil. iii. 10, 11: Heb. xi. 35: 1 Thess. iv. 13-17, etc.

On this subject no point of discussion, of any importance, arises among those who admit the truth of Scripture, except as to the way in which the doctrine of the resurrection of the body is to be understood: whether a resurrection of the substance of the body be meant, or some minute and indestructible part of it. The latter theory has been adopted for the sake of avoiding certain supposed difficulties. It cannot, however, fail to strike every impartial reader of the New Testament, that the doctrine of the resurrection is there taught without any nice distinctions. It is always exhibited as a miraculous work; and represents the same body which is laid in the grave as the subject of this change from death to life, by the power of Christ. Thus our Lord was raised in the same body in which he died, and his resurrection is constantly held forth as the model of ours; and the Apostle Paul expressly says, "Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." The only passage of Scripture which appears to favor the notion of the rising of the immortal body from some indestructible germ, is 1 Cor. xv. 35, etc.: "But some man will say, How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come? Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain," etc. If, however, it had been the intention of the apostle, holding this view of the case, to meet objections to the doctrine of the resurrection, grounded upon the difficulties of conceiving how the same body, in the popular sense, could be raised up in substance, we might have expected him to correct this misapprehension by declaring that this was not the Christian doctrine; but that some small parts of the body only, bearing as little proportion to the whole as the germ of a seed to the plant, would be preserved, and be unfolded into the perfected body at the resurrection. Instead of this, he goes on immediately to remind the objector of the differences which exist between material bodies as they now exist; between the plant and the bare or naked grain; between one plant and another; between the flesh of men, of beasts, of fishes, and of birds; between celestial and terrestrial bodies; and between the lesser and greater celestial luminaries themselves. Still further, he proceeds to state the difference, not between the germ of the body to be raised, and the body given at the resurrection, but between the body itself, understood popularly, which dies, and the body which shall be raised. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption;" which would not be true of the supposed incorruptible and imperishable germ of this hypothesis; and can only be affirmed of the body itself, considered in substance, and, in its present state, corruptible. Further: the question put by the objector, "How are the dead raised up?" does not refer to the modus agendi of the resurrection, or the process or manner in which the thing is to be effected, as the advocates of the germ hypothesis appear to assume. This is manifest from the answer of the apostle, who goes on immediately to state, not in what manner the resurrection is to be effected, but what shall be the state or condition of the resurrection body; which is no answer at all to the question, if it be taken in that sense.

Thus, in the argument, the apostle confines himself wholly to the possibility of the resurrection of the body in a refined and glorified state, but omits all reference to the mode in which the thing will be effected, as being out of the line of the objector's questions, and in itself above human thought, and wholly miraculous. It is however clear, that when he speaks of the body as the subject of this wondrous "change," he speaks of it popularly, as the same body in substance, whatever changes in its qualities or figure may be impressed upon it. Great general changes it will experience, as from corruption to incorruption, from mortality to immortality: great changes of a particular kind will also take place, as its being freed from deformities and defects, and the accidental varieties produced by climate, aliments, labor, and hereditary diseases. It is also laid down by our Lord, that "in the resurrection they shall neither marry nor be given in marriage, but be like to the angels of God;" and this also implies a certain change of structure; and we may gather from the declaration of the apostle, that though "the stomach" is now adapted "to meats, and meats to the stomach," yet God will "destroy both it and them," that the animal appetite for food will be removed, and the organ now adapted to that appetite will have no place in the renewed frame. But great as these changes are, the human form will be retained in its perfection, after the model of our Lord's "glorious body," and the substance of the matter of which it is composed will not thereby be affected. That the same body which was laid in the grave shall arise out of it, is the manifest doctrine of the Scriptures. The notion of an incorruptible germ, or that of an original and unchangeable stamen, out of which a new and glorious body, at the resurrection, is to spring, appears to have been borrowed from the speculations of some of the Jewish rabbins. But if by this hypothesis it was designed to remove the difficulty of conceiving how the scattered parts of one body could be preserved from becoming integral parts of other bodies, it supposes that the constant care of Providence is exerted to maintain the incorruptibility of those individual germs, or stamina, so as to prevent their assimilation with each other. Now if they have this by original quality, then the same quality may just as easily be supposed to appertain to every particle which composes a human body; so that, though it be used for food, it shall not be capable of assimilation, in any circumstances, with another human body. But if these germs, or stamina, have not this quality by their original nature, they can only be prevented from assimilating with each other by that operation of God which is present to all his works, and which must always be directed to secure the execution of his own ultimate designs. If this view be adopted, then, if the resort must at last be to the superintendence of a Being of infinite power and wisdom, there is no greater difficulty in supposing that his care to secure this object may extend to a million as easily as to a hundred particles of matter. This is, in fact, the true and rational answer to the objection that the same piece of matter may happen to be a part of two or more bodies, as in the instances of men feeding upon animals which have fed upon men, and of men feeding upon one another. The question here is one which simply respects the frustrating a final purpose of the Almighty by an operation of nature. To suppose that he cannot prevent this, is to deny his power; to suppose him inattentive to it, is to suppose him indifferent to his own designs; and to assume that he employs care to prevent it, is to assume nothing greater, nothing in fact so great, as many instances of control which are always occurring; as, for instance, the regulation of the proportion of the sexes in human births, which cannot be attributed to chance, but must either be referred to superintendence, or to some original law. Another objection to the resurrection of the body has been drawn from the changes of its substance during life; the answer to which is, that allowing a frequent and total change of the substance of the body (which, however, is but an hypothesis) to take place, it affects not the doctrine of Scripture, which is, that the body which is laid in the grave shall be raised up. But then we are told that if our bodies have in fact undergone successive changes during life, the bodies in which we have sinned or performed rewardable actions may not be, in many instances, the same bodies as those which will be actually rewarded or punished. We answer that rewards and punishments have their relation to the body, not so much as it is the subject but as it is the instrument of reward and punishment. It is the soul only which perceives pain or pleasure, which suffers or enjoys, and is, therefore, the only rewardable subject. Were we, therefore, to admit such corporeal mutations as are assumed in this objection, they affect not the case of our accountability. The personal identity or sameness of a rational being, as Mr. Locke has observed, consists in self-consciousness: "By this every one is to himself what he calls self, without considering whether that self be continued in the same or divers substances. It was by the same self which reflects on an action done many years ago, that the action was performed." If there were indeed any weight in this objection, it would affect the proceedings of human criminal courts in all cases of offences committed at some distance of time; but it contradicts the common sense, because it contradicts the common consciousness and experience, of mankind.

Our Lord has assured us, that "the hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and come forth: they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." Then we shall "all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump," and "the dead shall be raised incorruptible." It is probable that the bodies of the righteous and the wicked, though each shall in some respects be the same as before, will each be in other respects not the same, but undergo some change conformable to the character of the individual, and suited to his future state of existence; yet both, as the passage just quoted clearly teaches, are then rendered indestructible. Respecting the good it is said, "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we shall appear with him in glory;" "we shall be like him;" "our body shall be fashioned like his glorious body;" notwithstanding this, it doth not yet fully appear what we shall be. Col. iii. 4: 1 John iii. 2: Phil. iii. 21. This has a very obvious reason. Our present manner of knowing depends upon our present constitution, and we know not the exact relation which subsists between this constitution and the manner of being in a future world; we derive our ideas through the medium of the senses; the senses are necessarily conversant with terrestrial objects only; our language is suited to the communication of present ideas; and thus it follows that the objects of the future world may in some respects (whether few or many we cannot say) differ so extremely from terrestrial objects, that language cannot communicate to us any such ideas as would render those matters comprehensible. But language may suggest striking and pleasing analogies; and with such we are presented by the holy apostle: "All flesh," says he, "is not the same flesh; but there is one flesh of men, another of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds;" and yet all these are fashioned out of the same kind of substance, mere inert matter, till God gives it life and activity. It is sown an animal body—a body which previously existed with all the organs, faculties, and propensities requisite to procure, receive, and appropriate nutriment, as well as to perpetuate the species—but it shall be raised a spiritual body, refined from the dregs of matter, freed from the organs and senses required only in its former state, and probably possessing the remaining senses in greater perfection, together with new and more exquisite faculties, fitted for the exalted state of existence and enjoyment to which it is now rising. In the present state, the organs and senses appointed to transmit the impressions of objects to the mind have a manifest relation to the respective objects: the eye and seeing, for example, to light; the ear and hearing, to sound. In the refined and glorious state of existence to which good men are tending, where the objects which solicit attention will be infinitely more numerous, interesting, and delightful, may not the new organs, faculties, and senses be proportionably refined, acute, susceptible, or penetrating? Human industry and invention have placed us, in a manner, in new worlds; what, then, may not a spiritual body, with sharpened faculties and the grandest possible objects of contemplation, effect in the celestial regions to which Christians are invited? There the senses will no longer degrade the affections, the imagination no longer corrupt the heart; the magnificent scenery thrown open to view will animate the attention, give a glow and vigor to the sentiments; that roused attention will never tire; those glowing sentiments will never cloy; but the man, now constituted of an indestructible body as well as of an immortal soul, may visit in eternal succession the streets of the celestial city, may drink of the pure "river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb;" and dwell for ever in those abodes of harmony and peace which, though "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the imagination of man to conceive," we are assured "God hath prepared for them that love him." 1 Cor. ii. 9.

RHODES, an island lying south of the province of Caria, in Lesser Asia, and, among the Asiatic islands, is accounted for dignity next to Cyprus and Lesbos. It is pleasant and healthful, and was anciently celebrated for the skill of its inhabitants in navigation, but most for its prodigious statue of brass consecrated to the sun, and called the Colossus. This statue was seventy cubits high, and bestrode the mouth of the harbor, so that ships could sail between its legs, and it was accounted one of the seven wonders of the world. St. Paul, on his way to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, went from Miletus to Coos, from Coos to Rhodes, and from thence to Patara, in Lycia. Acts xxi. 1. [The island of Rhodes was settled by the Telchines, probably a Phenician colony. In 988 B. C. the Dorians made it a part of their confederacy. The capital, at the north-eastern part of the island, was founded at the time of the Peloponnesian war. It had two ports. Pliny says, "The sun shone every day at Rhodes:" this seems to be intimated by its coin, which, in allusion to the meaning of its name, has a rose on one side, and on the other the head of Apollo, radiated like the sun. The colossal image of the tutelary god of Rhodes was cast by Chares of Lindus, who was twelve years employed in its construction. The statement that it stood on the two moles that formed the entrance of the inner harbor is not well authenticated. It was erected B. C. 280, and after standing fifty-six years was broken off below the knees and thrown down by an earthquake: in A. D. 672 it was sold by the Saracens to a Jew of Edessa, who loaded nine hundred camels with the bronze. During the Byzantine period Rhodes was the Queen of the Ægean. It was the last city to oppose the Saracens. The Knights of St. John held it from 1308 to 1522, when they capitulated to Solymán the Magnificent. It now contains about fifteen thousand inhabitants, eight thousand of them being Turks, and three thousand Jews. The island, which covers an area of four hundred and twenty square miles, contains some thirty thousand inhabitants. It is governed by a pashaw, whose jurisdiction extends over the Turkish Sporades, and Marmarice. The old Greek geographers made their reckonings from Rhodes, and it is still a place of considerable maritime importance.]

The patents and orders of these princes were sealed with their rings or signets, an impression from which was their confirmation. The ring was one mark of sovereign authority. The Benjamites took shelter in the rock Rimmon. Judges xx. 47. Samson kept garrison in the rock of Etham. Judges xv. 8. David found shelter in the rocks of Maon, En-gedi, etc. 1 Sam. xxii. 1; xxiii. 25, 28; xxiv. 2-5. Jerome says that the southern parts of Judea were full of caves under ground, and of caverns in the mountains, to which the people retired in time of danger. The Kenites dwelt in the hollow places of the rocks. Num. xxiv. 21. Even at this day the villages of this country are subterraneous, or in the rocks. Josephus in several places speaks of hollow rocks, where thieves and robbers had their haunts; and travellers still find a great number of them in Palestine, and in the adjoining provinces. Toward Lebanon the mountains are high, but covered in many places with as much earth as fits them for cultivation. Among the crags of the rocks the beautiful and far-famed cedar waves its lofty top, and extends its powerful arms, surrounded by the fir and the oak, the fig and the vine. On the road to Jerusalem the mountains are not so lofty nor so rugged, but become fitter for tillage. They rise again to the south-east of Mount Carmel, are covered with woods, and afford very picturesque views; but advancing toward Judea, they lose their verdure, the valleys become narrow, dry, and stony, and terminate at the Dead Sea in a pile of desolate rocks, precipices, and caverns. These vast excavations, some of which will contain fifteen hundred men, are the grottoes of En-gedi, which have been a refuge to the oppressed or the discontented in all ages. Westward of Jordan and the Lake Asphaltites, another chain of rocks, still loftier and more rugged, presents a yet more gloomy aspect, and announces the distant entrance of the desert, and the termination of the habitable regions.

The name of rock is also given to God, by way of metaphor, because God is the strength, the refuge, and defence of Israel, as those places were to the people who resided among them. Psalm xviii. 2, 31; xxxi. 2, 3: Deut. xxxii. 15, 18, 30, 31: Psalm lxi. 2, etc.

ROD. This word is used sometimes for the branches of a tree: "And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chestnut tree," Gen. xxx. 37: sometimes for a staff or wand: "And thou shalt take this rod in thine hand, wherewith thou shalt do signs. And Moses took the rod of God in his hand," Exod. iv. 17, 20: or for a shepherd's crook: "And concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord," Lev. xxvii. 32: or for a rod, properly so called, which God makes use of to correct men: "If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men." 2 Sam. vii. 14. "Let him take his rod away from me." Job ix. 34. The empire of the Messiah is sometimes represented by a rod of iron, to show its power and its might. Psalm ii. 9: Rev. ii. 27; xii. 5; xix. 15. Rod is sometimes put to signify a tribe or a people: "Remember thy congregation which thou hast purchased of old, the rod of thine inheritance which thou hast redeemed." Psalm lxxiv. 2. "Israel is the rod of his inheritance." Jer. x. 16. The rod of Aaron is the staff commonly used by the high-priest. This is the rod that budded and blossomed like an almond tree. Num. xvii. See AARON.

[ROGATION-DAYS.] Three days of fasting before Ascension-day, first set apart by Mamercus, Bishop of Vienne, in the fifth century, to avert certain calamities with which his diocese was threatened. In some places the Rogationes were not observed till after Whitsuntide. The word comes from rogare, to pray.]

ROMAN CATHOLICS, or members of the Church of Rome, otherwise called Papists, from the pope being considered by them as the supreme head of the universal Church, the successor of St. Peter, and the fountain of theological truth and ecclesiastical honors. He keeps his court in great state at the palace of the Vatican, and is attended by seventy cardinals as his privy counsellors, in imitation of the seventy disciples of our Lord. The pope's authority in other kingdoms is merely spiritual, but in Italy he is a temporal sovereign, Louis XVIII. and the allies having, in 1814, restored him to his throne, and to those temporalities of which he was deprived by Buonaparte and the French Revolution. On resuming his government, Pope Pius VII. soon restored the order of Jesuits and the inquisition; so that the Roman Catholic religion is now reinstated in its ancient splendor and authority. [See POPE.] The principal dogmas of this religion are as follows: 1. That St. Peter was deputed by Christ to be his vicar, and the head of the Catholic Church; and that the bishops of Rome, being his successors, have the same apostolical authority; for our Saviour declares, in Matt. xvi. 18, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my Church;" by which rock they understand St. Peter himself, as the name signifies, and not his confession, as the Protestants explain it. And a succession in the Church being now supposed necessary under the New Testament, as Aaron had his succession under the old dispensation, which was a figure of the new, this succession can now, they contend, be shown only in the chair of St. Peter at Rome, where, it is asserted, he presided twenty-five years previous to his death; therefore the bishops of Rome are his true successors. 2. That the Roman Catholic Church is the mother and mistress of all Churches, and cannot possibly err in matters of faith; for the Church has the promise of the Spirit of God to lead it into all truth, John xvi. 13; "and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Matt. xvi. 18. Christ also, who is himself the truth, has promised to the pastors and teachers of the Church to be with them "always, even to the end of the world." Matt. xxviii. 20. "It is from the testimony and authority of the Church, therefore," say they, "that we receive the Scriptures as the word of God." 3. That the Scriptures thus received on the authority of the Church are not sufficient to our faith without apostolical traditions, which are of equal authority with the Scriptures; for St. Peter assures us, that in St. Paul's Epistles there "are some things hard to be understood, which they who are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction." 2 Peter iii. 16. We are directed by St. Paul to "stand fast, and hold the traditions which we have been taught, whether by word or by epistle." 2 Thess. ii. 15. 4. That seven sacraments were instituted by Jesus Christ, namely, baptism, confirmation, eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony; and that they confer grace. To prove that confirmation, or imposition of hands, is a sacrament, they quote Acts viii. 17: "They," the apostles, "laid their hands on them," believers, "and they received the Holy Ghost." Penance is a sacrament in which the sins we commit after baptism, duly repented of, and confessed to a priest, are forgiven; and which they think was instituted by Christ himself, when he breathed upon his apostles, after his resurrection, and said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose sins ye remit, are remitted; and whose sins ye retain, are retained." John xx. 23. In favor of extreme unction, or anointing the sick with oil, they argue from James i. 14, 15, which is thus rendered in the Vulgate: "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the priests of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil," etc. The sacrament of holy orders is inferred from 1 Tim. iv. 14: "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on the hands of the presbytery," or priesthood, as they render it. That marriage is a sacrament, they think evident from Ephes. v. 32: "This is a great mystery;" representing the mystical union of Christ and his Church. "Matrimony," say they, "is here the sign of a holy thing, and therefore it is a sacrament." Notwithstanding this, they enjoin celibacy upon the clergy, because they do not think it proper that those who, by their office and function, ought to be wholly devoted to God, should be diverted from those duties by the distractions of a married life. 1 Cor. vii. 32, 33. 5. That in the mass, or public service, there is offered unto God a true and propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and dead; and that in the sacrament of the eucharist, under the forms of bread and wine, are really and substantially present the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is a conversion made of the whole substance of the bread into his body, and of the wine into his blood, which is called transubstantiation, according to our Lord's words to his disciples, "This is my body," etc., Matt. xxvi. 26; wherefore it becomes with them an object of adoration. Further: it is a matter of discipline, not of doctrine, in the Roman Church, that the laity receive the eucharist in one kind, that is, in bread only. This sacrifice of the mass was, they think, predicted by the prophet Malachi, (i. 11,) who says, "In every place incense shall be offered unto my name, and a pure offering." 6. That there is a purgatory; and that souls kept prisoners there do receive help by the suffrages of the faithful. For it is said, in 1 Cor. iii. 15, "If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire;" which they understand of the flames of purgatory. They also believe that souls are released from purgatory by the prayers and alms which are offered for them, principally by the holy sacrifice of the mass. They call purgatory a middle state of souls, into which those enter who depart this life in God's grace; yet not without some less stains of guilt, which retard them from entering heaven, where nothing unclean can enter. 7. That the saints reigning with Christ (and especially the Blessed Virgin) are to be honored and invoked; that they offer prayers unto God for us; and that their relics are to be had in veneration. These honors, however, are not divine, but relative, and redound to the Divine glory, Rev. v. 8; viii. 4, etc. 8. That the image of Christ, of the Blessed Virgin the mother of God, and of other saints, ought to be retained in churches, and honor and veneration ought to be given unto them. And as the images of cherubim were allowed in the temples, so images should be placed in churches, and had in veneration. 9. That the power of indulgences was left by Christ to the Church, and that the use of them is very beneficial to Christian people, according to Matt. xvi. 19: "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." By indulgences they do not mean leave to commit sin, nor pardon for sins to come; but only releasing, by the power of the keys committed to the Church, the debt of temporal punishment which may remain due upon account of our sins, after the sins themselves, as to their guilt and eternal punishment, have been already remitted through repentance and confession, and by virtue of the merit of Christ, and of all the saints. By their indulgences they assert that they apply to their souls the merits of Christ, and of the saints and martyrs through him.

The ceremonies of this Church are numerous and splendid: as, 1. They make use of the sign of the cross in all their sacraments, to give us to understand that they have their whole force and efficacy from the cross. 2. Holy water, sprinkled by the priest on solemn days, is used likewise by every one going in or coming out of church. 3. The ceremony of blessing bells is, by the Catholics, called christening them, because the name of some saint is ascribed to them, by virtue of whose invocation they are presented, in order that they may obtain his favor and protection. 4. They always bow at the name Jesus, (which is also done as regularly in the Church of England,) and they found the practice on Phil. ii. 10: "That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow." 5. They keep a number of lamps and wax candles continually burning before the shrines and images of the saints. 6. They make use of incense, and have lighted candles upon the altar at the celebration of the mass. 7. The practice of washing the poor's feet, in imitation of our Lord's washing the feet of his disciples, is solemnized on Holy Thursday by all the princes of the Romish religion in Europe. The Church of Rome also professes to keep the fast of Lent with great strictness, and observes a much greater number both of fasts and festivals than the Church of England.

The Church of Rome assumes the title of Catholic, or universal, as answering to that article in the Apostles' Creed, "I believe in the holy Catholic Church." The above is perhaps a sufficient account of the Roman Catholic faith; but as the creed of Pope Pius IV. is universally admitted to be the true standard of that faith, it would be decidedly wrong to conclude without inserting it. Mr. Butler says it contains a succinct and explicit summary of the canons of the Council of Trent, and was published in the form of a papal bull, in 1564. He adds, "It is received throughout the whole Roman Catholic Church; every one who is admitted into that Church, publicly reads and professes his assent to it." This document commences with reciting the Nicene Creed, which, as it is admitted by the Protestant Church of England, and inserted in the Common Prayer Book, need not be here repeated. It then proceeds with the twelve following articles, in addition to those of the Apostles' Creed, which they also reckon twelve: "13. I most firmly admit and embrace apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions, and all other constitutions and observances of the same Church. I also admit the Sacred Scriptures according to the sense which the holy mother Church has held, and does hold, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures; nor will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers. 14. I profess also that there are truly and properly seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and for the salvation of mankind, (though all are not necessary for every one,) namely, baptism, confirmation, eucharist, penance, extreme unction, order, and matrimony; and that they confer grace; and of these, baptism, confirmation, and order cannot be reiterated without sacrilege. 15. I also receive and admit the ceremonies of the Catholic Church, received and approved in the solemn administration of all the above said sacraments. 16. I receive and embrace all and every one of the things which have been defined and declared in the holy Council of Trent, concerning original sin and justification. 17. I profess, likewise, that in the mass is offered to God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead; and that in the most holy sacrament of the eucharist there is truly, really, and substantially the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is made a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, which conversion the Catholic Church calls transubstantiation. 18. I confess, also, that under either kind alone, Christ whole and entire, and a true sacrament, is received. 19. I constantly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls detained therein are helped by the suffrages of the faithful. 20. Likewise, that the saints reigning together with Christ are to be honored and invoked; that they offer prayers to God for us, and that their relics are to be venerated. 21. I most firmly assert, that the images of Christ, and of the mother of Christ, ever a virgin, and also of the other saints, are to be had and retained, and that due honor and veneration are to be given to them. 22. I also affirm, that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the Church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people. 23. I acknowledge the holy Catholic and apostolic Roman Church, the mother and mistress of all Churches; and I promise and swear true obedience to the Bishop of Rome, the successor of St. Peter, prince of the apostles, and vicar of Jesus Christ. 24. I also profess, and undoubtedly receive, all other things, delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and general councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent; and likewise, I also condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto; and all heresies whatsoever, condemned and anathematized by the Church. This true catholic faith, out of which none can be saved, which I now freely profess and truly hold, I, N., promise, vow, and swear most constantly to hold and profess the same, whole and entire, with God's assistance, to the end of my life. Amen."

Such is the avowed and accredited faith of the Church of Rome; but it seems a most extraordinary circumstance, that, while this Church has so enlarged the creed, it has reduced the number of the commandments, omitting altogether the second, "Thou shalt not make unto thee a graven image," etc., Exod. xx. 3-6; as if the Catholics were conscious it could by no means be reconciled with the twenty-first article of the above-recited creed. And then, to prevent alarm, as everybody must know there should be ten commandments, the last is divided into two, to make up the number. This is said to have been done even before the Reformation. It was done in the French National Catechism, published in 1806, and sanctioned by Pope Pius VII., by the Archbishop of Paris, and by the Emperor Napoleon. It is remarkable, also, that in Dr. Challoner's "Garden of the Soul," printed in London by Coglan, in 1787, in a form of self-examination for the penitent upon each commandment, there is no reference to the one omitted; nor is there any reference to it in Bossuet's famous "Exposition of the Doctrines of the Catholic Church," when treating upon images, and the manner in which they are directed to be honored. Lastly, in Butler's Catechism, the eighth edition, printed at Dublin in 1811, and sanctioned by four Roman Catholic archbishops, the commandments stand literally as follows: "1. I am the Lord thy God; thou shalt have no strange gods before me. 2. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. 3. Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day. 4. Honor thy father and thy mother. 5. Thou shalt not kill. 6. Thou shalt not commit adultery. 7. Thou shalt not steal. 8. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor. 9. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife. 10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods." Here it may be added that by omitting the second command, the others are numbered differently from what they are by us. Thus, the third is brought in for the second, the fourth is made the third, etc., till they come to the last, which is divided in two for the purpose above mentioned. The gross and antisciptural errors, leading to superstition, idolatry, and many other evils, which are contained in the peculiarities of the papistical faith, are abundantly pointed out and refuted by the leading Protestant writers.

[The total number of Romanists in the world is estimated at 164,500,000, distributed as follows: Rome and the Papal States, 8,000,000; Italian States: Tuscany, Modena, and Parma, 2,750,000;—Naples and Sicily, 8,750,000;—Sardinia, 5,000,000;—Austrian Empire: German States, 11,000,000; Hungary, 10,000,000; Italy, 5,000,000; Poland, 4,000,000;—Spain, 14,000,000; Portugal, 3,500,000; France, 33,000,000; Belgium and Holland, 4,500,000; Prussia, 6,000,000; Switzerland, 1,000,000; Russian Empire, 2,000,000; Great Britain and Ireland, 5,000,000; Turkish Empire, 3,000,000; India and China, 3,000,000; Central and South America, Mexico and West Indies 31,500,000; United States and British America 3,500,000. There has recently been a great decrease of Romanists in Ireland, occasioned partly by emigration and partly by Protestant missionary operations. There has been an increase in England and Scotland, occasioned chiefly by the developments of Puseyism. The reestablishment of the hierarchy by the pope produced much discussion, both in and out of Parliament, but the papal diocesans, at the head of whom is Cardinal Wiseman, are suffered to exercise their functions. According to the census of 1853, there were in England and Wales six hundred and sixteen Romish chapels, eleven colleges, eighty-eight religious houses, eight hundred and seventy-five priests. The increase of the Romish Church in the United States is attributed principally to immigration, as from Ireland and Germany, and annexation, as of Louisiana, in 1803, Florida, 1821, New Mexico and California, 1848. Maryland, founded by Lord Baltimore in 1634, was a Roman Catholic colony, though, as its charter was obtained from a Protestant government, of course all Christian sects were tolerated by it. According to the census of 1850, only sixty-five of the nine hundred and nine churches of that State belonged to the Papists. Their cathedral in Baltimore cost three hundred thousand dollars. By the aid of the Propaganda Society in France, and the Leopold Society in Austria, they are able to build from fifty to eighty churches in the United States every year. Some estimate the Romish population at three millions. According to the Catholic Almanac for 1856, they had in this country forty-one dioceses, two apostolic vicariates, seven archbishops, thirty-three bishops, seventeen hundred and eighty priests—sixteen hundred and eleven being employed in the ministry and one hundred and sixty-nine in colleges—nineteen hundred and ten churches, eight hundred and ninety-five other “stations,” thirty-seven ecclesiastical seminaries, four hundred and sixty clerical students, forty-nine literary institutions for young men, two hundred and thirty-six female “religious” institutions, one hundred and thirty female academies, and nineteen weekly papers.]

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE. This Epistle was written from Corinth, A. D. 58, being the fourth year of the Emperor Nero, just before St. Paul set out for Jerusalem with the contributions which the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia had made for the relief of their poor brethren in Judea. Acts xx. 1: Rom. xv. 25, 26. It was transcribed or written as St. Paul dictated it, by Tertius; and the person who conveyed it to Rome was Phoebe, a deaconess of the Church of Cenchrea, which was the eastern port of the city of Corinth. Rom. xvi. 1, 22. It is addressed to the Church at Rome, which consisted partly of Jewish and partly of heathen converts; and throughout the Epistle it is evident that the apostle has regard to both these descriptions of Christians. St. Paul, when he wrote this Epistle, had not been at Rome—Rom. i. 13; xv. 23—but he had heard an account of the state of the Church in that city from Aquila and Priscilla, two Christians who were banished from thence by the edict of Claudius, and with whom he lived during his first visit to Corinth. Whether any other apostle had at this time preached the gospel at Rome, cannot now be ascertained. Among those who witnessed the effect of the first effusion of the Holy Ghost are mentioned “strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes,” Acts ii. 10; that is, persons of the Jewish religion, who usually resided at Rome, but who had come to Jerusalem to be present at the feast of pentecost. It is highly probable that these men, upon their return home, proclaimed the gospel of Christ; and we may further suppose that many Christians who had been converted at other places afterward settled at Rome, and were the cause of others embracing the gospel. But, by whatever means Christianity had been introduced into Rome, it seems to have flourished there in great purity; for we learn from the beginning of this Epistle that the faith of the Roman Christians was at this time much celebrated. Rom. i. 8. To confirm them in that faith, and to guard them against the errors of Judaizing Christians, was the object of this letter, in which St. Paul takes occasion to enlarge upon the nature of the Mosaic institution; to explain the fundamental principles and doctrines of Christianity; and to show that the whole human race, formerly divided into Jews and Gentiles, were now to be admitted into the religion of Jesus, indiscriminately, and free from every other obligation. The apostle, after expressing his affection to the Roman Christians, and asserting that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to all who believe, takes a comprehensive view of the conduct and condition of men under the different dispensations of Providence: he shows that all mankind, both Jews and Gentiles, were equally “under sin,” and liable to the wrath and punishment of God; that, therefore, there was a necessity for a universal propitiation and redemption, which were now offered to the whole race of men, without any preference or exception, by the mercy of him who is the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews; that faith in Jesus Christ, the universal Redeemer, was the only means of obtaining this salvation, which the deeds of the law were wholly incompetent to procure; that as the sins of the whole world originated from the disobedience of Adam, so the justification from those sins was to be derived from the obedience of Christ; that all distinction between Jew and Gentile was now abolished, and the ceremonial law entirely abrogated; that the unbelieving Jews would be excluded from the benefits of the gospel, while the believing Gentiles would be partakers of them; and that this rejection of the Jews, and call of the Gentiles, were predicted by the Jewish prophets Hosea and Isaiah. He then points out the superiority of the Christian over the Jewish religion, and earnestly exhorts the Romans to abandon every species of wickedness, and to practice the duties of righteousness and holiness, which were now enjoined upon higher sanctions, and enforced by more powerful motives. In the latter part of the Epistle, St. Paul gives some practical instructions, and recommends some particular virtues; and he concludes with a salutation and a doxology. This Epistle is most valuable, on account of the arguments and truths which it contains, relative to the necessity, nature, and universality of the gospel dispensation.

[ROME. The ancient capital of the Roman empire was founded by Romulus, cir. 753. B. C. It first occupied only the Palatine Hill, but afterward took in six other hills. In the time of its glory its walls were nearly twenty miles in circuit. It had thirty-seven gates, and thirty-one roads radiated from it to all the provinces of the empire. It is situated in latitude 41° 54' north, and longitude 12° 27' east, on both sides the Tiber, fifteen miles from its mouth in the Mediterranean. There were formerly eight principal bridges over the river, relics of three of which still remain. The city was adorned with magnificent buildings, among which was the Capitol, on the Capitoline Hill, which enclosed the temples of Jupiter, Minerva, and Juno. On the Vatican Hill was a temple consecrated to Apollo and Mars, on the site of which a church dedicated to St. Peter was built, A. D. 324. This was substituted by the present edifice, which was begun in 1506 and dedicated in 1626. It cost forty-eight millions of dollars, a large amount of which was raised by the sale of indulgences. The Vatican adjoining it is a palace containing four thousand four hundred and twenty-two halls, chapels, etc.: it has a library of one hundred thousand printed books and twenty-five thousand MSS. There are more than sixty splendid private palaces and three hundred and sixty-four churches in the city; these, with the splendid remains of antiquity, are in juxtaposition with the most wretched hovels, the bulk of the population being in a deplorable state of poverty, ignorance, and vice. The Ghetto, or Jews' quarter, in particular, is a scandal to humanity. In ancient times the Jews had a part of the city appropriated to them; but in the reign of Tiberius, and again in that of Claudius, they were banished from Rome, Acts xviii. 2; but as soon as possible they returned, and many of them have continued to reside there, though subject to great disabilities and persecutions. It is not known when and by whom Christianity was introduced into Rome—most likely by the "strangers of Rome," who returned from Jerusalem after the great pentecost, A. D. 33. Paul visited it, cir. 62, and suffered martyrdom there under Nero, cir. 66. Tradition says Peter was crucified there at the same time; but it is not certain that this apostle ever visited the great metropolis. See PAUL and ROMANS. The first Christians at Rome were fearfully persecuted by some of the emperors: the catacombs, near the city, are impressive mementoes of their sufferings. These persecutions, of course, ceased when Constantine came to the throne. In 410 the city was taken by Alaric, and in 455 by Genseric: it fell under the power of the Ostrogoths and the emperors of the east, and in the eighth century passed into the hands of the popes, and became the capital of the States of the Church. From 1809 to 1814, it was the capital of the department of Rome in the French empire. In 1848, the pope was expelled, and in 1849 a republican form of government was inaugurated; but the papal authority was reinstated by the French, and the pope returned to the Vatican in 1850. In 1846, there were in Rome thirty-two cardinals, one hundred and fifty-three prelates, seventeen hundred and thirty-eight secular and two thousand four hundred and eighty-eight regular clergy, and seventeen hundred and forty-three nuns. The support of such a hierarchy, and the observance of so many costly superstitions as they impose upon the people, will account for their degradation. The population in 1852 was one hundred and seventy-five thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight. A Plan of Rome, exhibiting a comparative view of the ancient and modern sites, with a graphic description of the city as it appeared in the times of the apostles, may be found in Conybeare and Howson's "Life and Epistles of St. Paul." See POPE.]

[ROOD. Anglo-Saxon for cross. Hence rood-loft, the loft on which the cross was kept: rood-screen, that part of the decoration of the altar where the crucifix was placed. The rood of grace was an image at Bexley which hung its lip when silver was offered it, but shook its beard merrily when gold was presented; the people attributing to miracle the motions which the priest produced by wires. Holy-rood at Edinburgh was supposed to contain a part of the true cross.]

ROOFS. The letting down of the paralytic through the roof of the house where Jesus was, is satisfactorily explained by the following extract from Shaw's Travels: "The houses throughout the east are low, having generally a ground-floor only, or one upper story, and flat-roofed, the roof being covered with a strong coat of plaster of terrace. They are built round a paved court, into which the entrance from the street is through a gateway or passage-room furnished with benches, and sufficiently large to be used for receiving visits or transacting business. The stairs which lead to the roof are never placed on the outside of the house in the street, but usually in the gateway, or passage-room to the court, sometimes at the entrance within the court. This court is now called, in Arabic, el woost, or 'the middle of the house,' literally answering to τὸ μέσον of St. Luke, v. 19. It is customary to fix cords from the parapet walls (Deut. xxii. 8) of the flat roofs across this court, and upon them to expand a veil or covering, as a shelter from the heat. In this area, probably, our Saviour taught. The paralytic was brought on to the roof by making a way through the crowd to the stairs in the gateway, or by the terraces of the adjoining houses. They rolled back the veil, and let the sick man down over the parapet of the roof into the area or court of the house, before Jesus." The windows of the eastern houses being chiefly within, facing the court, in order to see what was going on without in the streets of the city, the only way was to run up to the flat roof. Hence the frequent expression in Scripture, when allusion is made to sudden tumults and calamities, to get up to "the house-top." See HOUSES.

[ROSARY. A string of beads on which Papists count their prayers. Its use can be traced to A. D. 1100, though its invention is usually attributed to Dominic. It consists of a series of beads, fifteen large and one hundred and fifty small, the large ones being used for the Pater-Nosters, the small for the Ave-Marias. Some vary the number and order of the gaudia, or calculi, as the beads are called.]

ROSE, דובלע, Cant. ii. 1: Isaiah xxxv. 1. The rose, so much and so often sung by the poets of Persia, Arabia, Greece, and Rome, is, indeed, the pride of the garden for elegance of form, for glow of color, and fragrance of smell. Tournefort mentions fifty-three kinds, of which the Damascus rose and the rose of Sharon are the finest. The beauty of these flowers is too well known to be insisted on; and they are at this day much admired in the east, where they are extremely fragrant. In what esteem the rose was among the Greeks, may be learned from the fifth and fifty-third odes of Anacreon. Among the ancients it occupied a conspicuous place in every chaplet; it was a principal ornament in every festive meeting, and at every solemn sacrifice; and the comparisons in Ecclesiasticus xxiv. 14, and l. 8, show that the Jews were likewise much delighted with it. The rose-bud, or opening rose, seems in particular a favorite ornament. The Jewish sensualists, in Wisdom ii. 8, are introduced saying, "Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments; and let no flower of the spring pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they are withered." [The LXX., Luther, and others, render Cant. ii. 1, the "flower of the field." Dr. Good thinks the "bride means to delineate her person with extreme modesty," and compares herself accordingly to a flower not remarkable for its beauty. Some suggest the cistus, which abounds in Sharon, and has petals like those of the wild rose. Kimchi renders the word lily in Isaiah xxxv. 1; and many think the Hebrew word must mean a bulbous plant, as the asphodel, meadow-saffron, or narcissus, which last grows plentifully in Sharon. Dr. Royle and others think that the flower alluded to in the passages cited from the Apocrypha was the oleander, which abounds in Palestine. The climate of that country does not appear to be peculiarly adapted to the rose, though pink and white varieties are found growing wild; and roses are cultivated with success in the gardens of Mount Sinai, Damascus, and other places.]

ROSH. The Hebrew speaks of a people called Rosh. Ezek. xxxviii. 2, 3. "The orientals hold," says D'Herbelot, "that Japheth had a son called Rous, not mentioned by Moses, who peopled Russia, that is, Muscovy." We question not but Rosh, or Ros, signifies Russia, or the people that dwell on the Araxes, called Rosch by the inhabitants; which was the habitation of the Scythians. It deserves notice, that the LXX. render the passage in Ezekiel, Ῥῶς, ἀρχοῦρα Ῥῶς, Μεσὸς, καὶ Θοβέλ, Gog, the chief of Ros, Mesoch, and Thobel; and Jerome, not absolutely to reject this name, inserts both renderings: Gog, terram Magog, principem capitibus (sive Ros) Mosoch, et Thubal. Symmachus and Theodotus also perceived Ros to be in this place the name of a people; and this is now the prevailing judgment of interpreters. Bochart, about A. D. 1640, contended that Russia was the nation meant by the term Ros; and this opinion is supported by the testimony of various Greek writers, who describe "the Ros as a Scythian nation, bordering on the northern Taurus." Mosok, or Mesech, appears to be the same as the Moskwa, or Moscow, of the moderns; and we know that not only is this the name of the city, but also of the river on which it stands. See Gog.

[RÔSICRUCIANS. Philosophers who arose in Germany in the fourteenth century, who professed among other secrets to have found out that of the philosopher's stone. They believed in astrology, magic, etc. Their name is derived from ros and cruz—the former, dev, being according to them the most powerful solvent of gold, and the latter, the cross, being the emblem of light. Believing that God governs the kingdom of grace by the same laws by which he governs the kingdom of nature, they used chemical terms by which to designate the truths of religion. They were bound by oath to secrecy and to the observance of certain rules.]

in regard to the service, formerly printed in red letters.]

RUBY, a beautiful gem, whose color is red, with an admixture of purple, and is, in its most perfect state, a gem of extreme value. In hardness it is equal to the sapphire, and second only to the diamond. It is mentioned in Job xxviii. 18, and Prov. viii. 11, etc. [But see PEARL.]

RUE, ῥήγανον, Luke xi. 42, a small shrubby plant, common in gardens. It has a strong, unpleasant smell, and a bitterish, penetrating taste.

[RUFUS. An excellent Christian at Rome, whose mother appears to have treated Paul with motherly kindness. Rom. xvi. 13. See PUDENS. Some identify him with Rufus, son of Simon the Cyrenian, who bore the cross for Christ, Mark xv. 21, and with the Rufus of Antioch, mentioned by Polycarp as a model of patience.]

[RULE OF FAITH. To the Protestant standard, the Bible, Papists add the Apocrypha, Tradition, Unanimous Consent of the Fathers, and Acts and Decrees of Councils and Popes.]

[RULING ELDERS. Presbyterians derive the name and office of these lay-functionaries from 1 Tim. v. 17. Others think that this text refers exclusively to preaching elders, ruling, or presiding, being one of their functions. The τιμὴν, as the context shows, was the "reward" which they were to receive, in due proportion, for their pastoral services. Compare Acts xx. 17, 28; Phil i. 1; 1 Tim. iii.: Titus i. 5-9. See ELDERS.]

[RURAL DEAN. A clergyman who superintends a district in a diocese under the bishop.]

RUSH, ῥῶς, Exodus ii. 3: Job viii. 11: Isaiah xviii. 2; xxxv. 7: a plant growing in the water at the sides of rivers, and in marshy grounds. [See BULRUSH and PAPER REED.]

RUSSIAN CHURCH. The Russians, like other nations, were originally pagans, and worshipped fire, which they considered as the cause of thunder, under the name of Perun, and the earth, under the name Volata; at the same time having some notions of a future state of rewards and punishments. Christianity was first professed by the Princess Olga, who was baptized at Constantinople. She recommended it to her grandson Vladimir, on whose baptism, in 988, it was adopted by the nation generally; and from that time the Greek Church has been the established religion throughout Russia, and Greek literature greatly encouraged. During the middle ages, however, the doctrine of transubstantiation, and some other popish peculiarities, were covertly introduced; and, by the irruption of the Mongol Tartars, in the fifteenth century, a stop was put to learning and civilization for full two centuries; but, on the accession of the present dynasty, in 1613, civilization and Christianity were restored, and schools established for the education of the clergy. The Russian clergy are divided into regular and secular; the former are all monks, and the latter are the parochial clergy. The superior clergy are called archbishops; but the title of metropolitan, or bishop, is personal, and not properly attached to the see, as in the western Church. Next after the archbishops rank the black clergy, including the chiefs of monasteries and convents, and after them the monks. The secular priests are called the white clergy, including the protoires, or proto-popes, priests, and deacons, together with the readers and sacristans. These amounted, in 1805, throughout the empire, to ninety-eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-six. The white clergy must be married before they can be ordained, but must not marry a second time; they are at liberty then to enter among the black clergy, and a way is thus opened for their accession to the higher orders. The whole empire is divided into thirty-six dioceses, or eparchies, in which are four hundred and eighty-three cathedrals, and twenty-six thousand five hundred and ninety-eight churches. The churches are divided into three parts: 1. The altar, where stands the holy table, crucifix, etc., which is separated from the body of the church by a large screen, on which are painted our Saviour, the virgin, the apostles, and other saints. Upon a platform before this are placed the readers and singers, and here the preacher generally stands behind a movable desk. 2. The nave, or body of the church, which may be called the inner court. 3. The trapeza, or outer court. The last two are designed for the congregation, but neither has any seats. The walls of the church are highly embellished with Scripture paintings, ornamented with gold, silver, and precious stones, but no images.

The Church service is contained in twenty-four volumes, folio, in the Slavonian language, which is not well understood by the common people. Parts of the Scriptures are read in the service; but few, even of the ecclesiastics, possess a complete Bible. The patriarch of Russia was formerly almost equal in authority with the czar himself; but Peter the Great, on the death of the patriarch in 1700, abolished his office, and appointed an exarch. In 1721 he abolished this office also, and appointed a "holy legislative Synod" for the government of the Church, at the head of which is always placed a layman of rank and eminence. The monastic life was once so prevalent in this country, that there were four hundred and seventy-nine convents for men, and seventy-four for women, in which there were about seventy thousand monks and nuns, etc.; but this kind of life was so much discouraged by Peter the Great and the Empress Catherine, that the religious are now reduced to about five thousand monks and seventeen hundred nuns. Great part of their revenues has also been alienated, and appropriated to the support of hospitals and houses for the poor. [See GREEK CHURCH.]

RUTH. The book of Ruth is so called from the name of the person, a native of Moab, whose history it contains. It may be considered as a supplement to the book of Judges, to which it was joined in the Hebrew canon, and the latter part of which it greatly resembles, being a detached story belonging to the same period. Ruth had a son called Obed, who was the grandfather of David, which circumstance probably occasioned her history to be written, as the genealogy of David, from Pharez, the son of Judah, from whom the Messiah was to spring, is here given; and some commentators have thought that the descent of our Saviour from Ruth, a Gentile woman, was an intimation of the comprehensive nature of the Christian dispensation. We are nowhere informed when Ruth lived; but as King David was her great-grandson, we may place her history about B. C. 1250. This book was certainly written after the birth of David, and probably by the prophet Samuel, though some have attributed it to Hezekiah, and others to Ezra. The story related in this book is extremely interesting: the widowed distress of Naomi, her affectionate concern for her daughters, the reluctant departure of Orpah, the dutiful attachment of Ruth, and the sorrowful return to Bethlehem, are very beautifully told. The simplicity of manners, likewise, which is shown in Ruth's industry and attention to Naomi, the elegant charity of Boaz, and his acknowledgment of his kindred with Ruth, afford a pleasing contrast to the turbulent scenes described in the book of the Judges. The respect, likewise, which the Israelites paid to the law of Moses, and their observance of ancient customs, are represented in a very lively and animated manner. Ruth iv. It is a pleasing digression from the general thread of the sacred history.

[SABACTHANI. A Syro-Chaldaic word, corresponding to the Hebrew azabthani, forsaken me. It was a part of Christ's exclamation on the cross, which some render, "My God! my God! to whom hast thou left me?" See A. Clarke on Matt. xxvii. 46.]

SABAOTH, or rather ZABAOTH, a Hebrew word signifying hosts, or armies, יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת, Jehovah Sabaoth, The Lord of Hosts. By this phrase we may understand the host of heaven, or the angels and ministers of the Lord; or the stars and planets, which, as an army ranged in battle array, perform the will of God; or, lastly, the people of the Lord, both of the old and new covenant, which is truly a great army, of which God is the Lord and commander. [The phrase occurs frequently in the later prophets—it is found also in Rom. ix. 29: James v. 4.]

[SABBATARIANS. Those who keep the seventh day as the Sabbath. They hold that the command to keep the seventh day holy is of universal and perpetual obligation—that the Scripture does not recognize the change to the first day, which, they say, was effected by Constantine. They are generally, if not exclusively, Baptists. The "Seventh-day Baptists" have two very small churches in England, one of which dates back as far as 1678. In the United States they have seventy-one churches, seventy-seven ministers, seventeen licentiates, six thousand five hundred members. They have Sabbath-schools, and tract and missionary societies.—The name is sometimes given to those who strictly observe the Christian Sabbath. See SABBATH.]

SABBATH. The obligation of a sabbatical institution upon Christians, as well as the extent of it, have been the subjects of much controversy. Christian Churches themselves have differed; and the theologians of the same Church. Much has been written upon the subject on each side, and much research and learning employed, sometimes to darken a very plain subject. The question respects the will of God as to this particular point—whether one day in seven is to be wholly devoted to religion, exclusive of worldly business and worldly pleasures. Now there are but two ways in which the will of God can be collected from his word: either by some explicit injunction upon all, or by incidental circumstances. Let us then allow, for a moment, that we have no such explicit injunction; yet we have certainly none to the contrary: let us allow that we have only for our guidance, in inferring the will of God in this particular, certain circumstances declarative of his will; yet this important conclusion is inevitable, that all such indicative circumstances are in favor of a sabbatical institution, and that there is not one which exhibits any thing contrary to it. The seventh day was hallowed at the close of the creation; its sanctity was afterward marked by the withholding of the manna on that day, and the provision of a double supply on the sixth, and that previous to the giving of the law from Sinai: it was then made a part of that great epitome of religious and moral duty, which God wrote with his own finger on tables of stone; it was a part of the public political law of the only people to whom Almighty God ever made himself a political Head and Ruler; its observance is connected throughout the prophetic age with the highest promises, its violations with the severest maledictions; it was among the Jews in our Lord's time a day of solemn religious assembling, and was so observed by him. When changed to the first day of the week, it was the day on which the first Christians assembled; it was called, by way of eminence, "the Lord's day;" and we have inspired authority to say, that both under the Old and New Testament dispensations, it is used as an expressive type of the heavenly and eternal rest. Now, against all these circumstances, so strongly declarative of the will of God as to the observance of a sabbatical institution, what circumstance or passage of Scripture can be opposed, as bearing upon it a contrary indication? Certainly not one; for those passages in St. Paul in which he speaks of Jewish Sabbaths, with their Levitical rites, and of a distinction of days, the observance of which marked a weak or a criminal adherence to the abolished ceremonial dispensation, touch not the Sabbath as a branch of the moral law, or as it was changed by the authority of the apostles to the first day of the week. If, then, we were left to determine the point by inference, the conclusion must be irresistibly in favor of the institution.

It may also be observed, that those who will so strenuously insist upon the absence of an express command as to the Sabbath in the writings of the evangelists and apostles, as explicit as that of the decalogue, assume that the will of God is only obligatory when manifested in some one mode, which they judge to be most fit. But this is a dangerous hypothesis; for, however the will of God may be manifested, if it is with such clearness as to exclude all reasonable doubt, it is equally obligatory as when it assumes the formality of legal promulgation. Thus the Bible is not all in the form of express and authoritative command; it teaches by examples, by proverbs, by songs, by incidental allusions and occurrences, and yet is, throughout, a manifestation of the will of God as to morals and religion in their various branches, and if disregarded, it will be so at every man's peril. But strong as this ground is, we quit it for a still stronger. It is wholly a mistake that the Sabbath, because not reenacted with the formality of the decalogue, is not explicitly enjoined upon Christians, and that the testimony of Scripture to such an injunction is not unequivocal and irrefragable. The Sabbath was appointed at the creation of the world, and sanctified, or set apart for holy purposes, "for man," for all men, and therefore for Christians, since there was never any repeal of the original institution. To this we add, that if the moral law be the law of Christians, then is the Sabbath as explicitly enjoined upon them as upon the Jews. But that the moral law is our law, as well as the law of the Jews, all but Antinomians must acknowledge; and few, we suppose, will be inclined to run into the fearful mazes of that error, in order to support lax notions as to the obligation of the Sabbath, into which, however, they must be plunged, if they deny the law of the decalogue to be binding. That it is so bound upon us, a few passages of Scripture will prove as well as many. Our Lord declares, that he "came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil." Take it, that by "the law" he meant both the moral and the ceremonial: ceremonial law could only be fulfilled in him by realizing its types; and moral law by upholding its authority. For "the prophets," they admit of a similar distinction: they either enjoin morality, or utter prophecies of Christ, the latter of which were fulfilled in the sense of accomplishment, the former by being sanctioned and enforced. That the observance of the Sabbath is a part of the moral law is clear from its being found in the decalogue, the doctrine of which our Lord sums up in the moral duties of loving God and our neighbor; and for this reason the injunctions of the prophets on the subject of the Sabbath are to be regarded as a part of their moral teaching. Some divines have, it is true, called the observance of the Sabbath a positive and not a moral precept. If it were so, its obligation is precisely the same in all cases where God himself has not relaxed it; and if a positive precept only, it has surely a special eminence given to it by being placed in the list of the ten commandments, and being capable, with them, of an epitome which resolves them into the love of God and our neighbor. The truth seems to be, that it is a mixed precept, and not wholly positive, but intimately, perhaps essentially connected with several moral principles of homage to God and mercy to men; with the obligation of religious worship, of public religious worship, and of undistracted public worship; and this will account for its collocation in the decalogue with the highest duties of religion, and the leading rules of personal and social morality. The passage from our Lord's sermon on the mount, with its context, is a sufficiently explicit enforcement of the moral law, generally, upon his followers; but when he says, "The Sabbath was made for man," he clearly refers to its original institution as a universal law, and not to its obligation upon the Jews only, in consequence of the enactments of the law of Moses. It "was made for man," not as he may be a Jew, or a Christian; but as man, a creature bound to love, worship, and obey his God and Maker, and on his trial for eternity.

Another explicit proof that the law of the ten commandments, and, consequently, the law of the Sabbath, is obligatory upon Christians, is found in the answer of the apostle to an objection to the doctrine of justification by faith: "Do we then make void the law through faith?" Rom. iii. 31; which is equivalent to asking, Does Christianity teach that the law is no longer obligatory on Christians, because it teaches that no man can be justified by it? To this he answers, in the most solemn form of expression, "God forbid; yea, we establish the law." Now, the sense in which the apostle uses the term, "the law," in this argument, is indubitably marked in Rom. vii. 7: "I had not known sin but by the law; for I had not known lust except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet;" which, being a plain reference to the tenth command of the decalogue, as plainly shows that the decalogue is "the law" of which he speaks. This, then, is the law which is established by the gospel; and this can mean nothing else but the establishment and confirmation of its authority, as the rule of all inward and outward holiness. Whoever, therefore, denies the obligation of the Sabbath on Christians, denies the obligation of the whole decalogue; and there is no real medium between the acknowledgment of the Divine authority of this sacred institution, as a universal law, and that gross corruption of Christianity generally designated Antinomianism.

Nor is there any force in the dilemma into which the Anti-sabbatarians would push us, when they argue, that if the case be so, then are we bound to the same circumstantial exactitude of obedience with regard to this command, as to the other precepts of the decalogue; and, therefore, that we are bound to observe the seventh day, reckoning from Saturday, as the Sabbath day. But as the command is partly positive and partly moral, it may have circumstances which are capable of being altered in perfect accordance with the moral principles on which it rests, and the moral ends which it proposes. Such circumstances are not indeed to be judged of on our own authority. We must either have such general principles for our guidance as have been revealed by God, and cannot therefore be questioned; or some special authority from which there can be no just appeal. Now, though there is not on record any Divine command issued to the apostles to change the Sabbath from the day on which it was held by the Jews to the first day of the week, yet, when we see that this was done in the apostolic age, and that St. Paul speaks of the Jewish Sabbaths as not being obligatory upon Christians, while he yet contends that the whole moral law is obligatory upon them, the fair inference is that this change of the day was made by Divine direction. It is indeed more than inference that the change was made under the sanction of inspired men, and those men the appointed rulers in the Church of Christ, whose business it was "to set all things in order" which pertained to its worship and moral government. We may, therefore, rest well enough satisfied with this, that as a Sabbath is obligatory upon us, we act under apostolic authority for observing it on the first day of the week, and thus commemorate at once the creation and the redemption of the world.

Thus, even if it were conceded that the change of the day was made by the agreement of the apostles, without express directions from Christ, which is not probable, it is certain that it was not done without that general authority which was confided to them by Christ; but it would not follow, even from this change, that they did in reality make any alteration in the law of the Sabbath, either as it stood at the time of its original institution at the close of the creation, or in the decalogue of Moses. The same portion of time which constituted the seventh day from the creation could not be observed in all parts of the earth; and it is not probable, therefore, that the original law expresses more than that a seventh day, or one day in seven, the seventh day after six days of labor, should be thus appropriated, from whatever point the enumeration might set out, or the hebdomadal cycle begin; for if more had been intended, then it would have been necessary to establish a rule for the reckoning of days themselves, which has been different in different nations; some reckoning from evening to evening, as the Jews now do; others from midnight to midnight, etc.: so that those persons in this country and in America who hold their Sabbath on Saturday, under the notion of exactly conforming to the Old Testament, and yet calculate the days from midnight to midnight, have no assurance at all that they do not desecrate a part of the original Sabbath, which might begin, as the Jewish Sabbath now, on Friday evening; and, on the contrary, hallow a portion of a common day by extending the Sabbath beyond Saturday evening. Even if this were ascertained, the differences of latitude and longitude would throw the whole into disorder; and it is not probable that a universal law should have been fettered with that circumstantial exactness which would have rendered difficult and sometimes doubtful astronomical calculations necessary, in order to its being obeyed according to the intention of the Lawgiver. Accordingly we find, says Mr. Holden, that in the original institution it is stated, in general terms, that God blessed and sanctified the seventh day, which must undoubtedly imply the sanctity of every seventh day; but not that it is to be subsequently reckoned from the first demiurgic day. Had this been included in the command of the Almighty, something, it is probable, would have been added declaratory of the intention; whereas expressions the most undefined are employed; not a syllable is uttered concerning the order and number of the days; and it cannot reasonably be disputed that the command is truly obeyed by the separation of every seventh day from common to sacred purposes, at whatever given time the cycle may commence. The difference in the mode of expression here, from that which the sacred historian has used in the first chapter, is very remarkable. At the conclusion of each division of the work of creation, he says, "The evening and the morning were the first day," and so on; but at the termination of the whole he merely calls it the seventh day; a diversity of phrase which, as it would be inconsistent with every idea of inspiration to suppose it undesigned, must have been intended to denote a day, leaving it to each people as to what manner it is to be reckoned. The term obviously imports the period of the earth's rotation round its axis, while it is left undetermined whether it shall be counted from evening or morning, from noon or midnight. The terms of the law are, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it." With respect to time, it is here mentioned in the same indefinite manner as at its primeval institution, nothing more being expressly required than to observe a day of sacred rest after every six days of labor. The seventh day is to be kept holy; but not a word is said as to what epoch the commencement of the series is to be referred; nor could the Hebrews have determined from the decalogue what day of the week was to be kept as their Sabbath. The precept is not, Remember the seventh day of the week to keep it holy, but "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy;" and in the following explication of these expressions, it is not said that the seventh day of the week is the Sabbath, but, without restriction, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God;" not the seventh according to any particular method of computing the septenary cycle, but in reference to the six before mentioned, every seventh day in rotation after six of labor.

Thus that part of the Jewish law, the decalogue, which, on the authority of the New Testament, we have shown to be obligatory upon Christians, leaves the computation of the hebdomadal cycle undetermined, and, after six days of labor, enjoins the seventh as the Sabbath, to which the Christian practice as exactly conforms as the Jewish. It is not, however, left to every individual to determine which day should be his Sabbath, though he should fulfil the law so far as to abstract the seventh part of his time from labor. It was ordained for worship, for public worship; and it is therefore necessary that the Sabbath should be uniformly observed by a whole community at the same time. The Divine Legislator of the Jews interposed for this end by special direction, as to his people. The first Sabbath kept in the wilderness was calculated from the first day in which the manna fell, and with no apparent reference to the creation of the world. By apostolic authority it is now fixed to be held on the first day of the week; and thus one of the great ends for which it was established, that it should be a day of "holy convocation," is secured.

forth of the law of Moses, have been found by the learned in the tradition which universally prevailed of the sacredness of the number seven, and the fixing of the first period of time to the revolution of seven days. The measuring of time by a day and night is pointed out to the common sense of mankind by the diurnal course of the sun. Lunar months and solar years are equally obvious to all rational creatures; so that the reason why time has been computed by days, months, and years, is readily given. But how the division of time into weeks of seven days, and this from the beginning, came to obtain universally among mankind, no man can account for, without having respect to some impressions on the minds of men from the constitution and law of nature, with the tradition of a sabbatical rest from the foundation of the world. Yet plain intimations of this weekly revolution of time are to be found in the earliest Greek poets, Hesiod, Homer, Linus, as well as among the nations of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans. It deserves consideration, too, on this subject, that Noah, in sending forth the dove out of the ark, observed the septenary revolution of days, Gen. viii. 10, 12; and at a subsequent period, in the days of the Patriarch Jacob, a week is spoken of as a well-known period of time. Gen. xxix. 27: Judges xiv. 12, 15, 17. These considerations are surely sufficient to evince the futility of the arguments which are sometimes plausibly urged for the first institution of the Sabbath under the law; and the design of which, in most cases, is to set aside the moral obligation of appropriating one day in seven to the purposes of the public worship of God, and the observation of Divine ordinances. But the truth is, that the seventh day was set apart from the beginning as a day of rest; and it was also strictly enjoined upon the Israelites in their law, both on the ground of its original institution, Exod. xx. 8-11, and also to commemorate their deliverance from the bondage of Egypt. Deut. v. 15.

"A Sabbath day's journey" was reckoned to be two thousand cubits, or one mile. Acts i. 12. The Sabbatical year was celebrated among the Jews every seventh year, when the land was left without culture. Exod. xxii. 10. God appointed the observation of the Sabbatical year to preserve the remembrance of the creation of the world, to enforce the acknowledgment of his sovereign authority over all things, and in particular over the land of Canaan, which he had given to the Israelites, by delivering up the fruits to the poor and the stranger. It was a sort of tribute, or small rent, by which they held the possession. Besides, he intended to inculcate humanity upon his people, by commanding that they should resign to the slaves, the poor, and the strangers, and to the brutes, the produce of their fields, of their vineyards, and of their gardens. In the Sabbatical year all debts were remitted, and the slaves were liberated. Exodus xxi. 2: Deut. xv. 2.

[By Sabbath, the fathers mean Saturday, which, as many of the primitive Christians were converts from Judaism, they regarded with religious veneration. The Christians in the east observed every Saturday as a festival except the Saturday before Easter, which they called Sabbatum magnum, and kept as a fast, because, as they said, "the Bridegroom was taken from them." The western Church observed every Saturday as a fast. To clear themselves from the charge of Judaizing, they declared that they did not observe it as a Jewish Sabbath. The Council of Laodicea decreed that "Christians should not Judaize, and rest from all labor on the Sabbath, (Saturday,) but follow their ordinary work, (so far as consistent with attendance at public worship,) and should not entertain such thoughts of it as not to prefer the Lord's day before it, and on that day rest as Christians." The general custom of the early Christians seems to have been in keeping with this decree. The ordinary question put by the persecutors to the martyrs was, "Dominicum servasti?" "Hast thou kept the Lord's day?" They answered, "Christianus sum: intermittere non possum." "I am a Christian: I cannot omit it." They observed it by an attendance on public, social, family, and private devotions, with abstinence from worldly pleasures and vocations, no works but those of necessity, piety, and mercy being allowed on this holy day.]

SABEANS, or "men of stature." Isa. xlv. 14. These men were probably the Sabeans of Arabia Felix, or of Asia. They submitted to Cyrus. The Sabeans of Arabia were descended from Seba; but as there are several of this name who were all heads of peoples, or of tribes, we must distinguish several kinds of Sabeans. 1. Those Sabeans who seized the flocks of Job (i. 15) were probably a people of Arabia Deserta, about Bozra; or, perhaps, a flying troop of Sabeans which infested that country. 2. Sabeans, descendants from Sheba, [Seba,] son of Cush, Gen. x. 7, are probably of Arabia Felix: they were famous for spices. The poets gave them the epithet of soft and effeminate, and say they were governed by women:

*Medis, levibusque Sabeis

[This sex governs the Medes, and the gentle Sabeans.]

Several are of opinion that from them came the Queen of Sheba, 1 Kings x. 1, 2; and that of these Sabeans the Psalmist speaks, Psalm lxxii. 10: "The kings of Arabia and Sheba shall give gifts," and Jeremiah, vi. 20: "What are the perfumes of Sheba to me?" and Isaiah, lx. 6: "All who come from Sheba shall offer gold and perfumes." 3. Sabeans, sons of Sheba, son of Raamah, Gen. x. 7, probably dwelt in Arabia Felix. Probably it is of these Ezekiel speaks, xxvii. 22, who came with their merchandise to the fairs of Tyre; and Joel, iii. 18: "I will deliver up your children to the tribe of Judah, who shall sell them to the Sabeans, a very distant nation." 4. Sabeans, descendants from Joktan, may very well be those mentioned by Ezekiel, xxvii. 23: "Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad, thy dealers." They are thought to have inhabited beyond the Euphrates, whence they are connected with Asshur and Chilmad. Gen. x. 28: 1 Chron. i. 22. 5. Sabeans are also placed in Africa, in the isle of Meroë. Josephus brings the Queen of Sheba from thence, and pretends that it had the name of Sheba, or Saba, before that of Meroë. [See SEBA and SHEBA.]

SABELLIANS were so called from Sabellius, a presbyter, or, according to others, a bishop, of Upper Egypt, who was the founder of the sect. As, from their doctrine, it follows that God the Father suffered, they were hence called by their adversaries, PATRIPASSIANS; and as their idea of the trinity was by some called a modal trinity, they have likewise been called MODALISTS. Sabellius having been a disciple of Noëtius, NOETIANS is another name by which his followers have sometimes been known; and as, from their fears of infringing on the fundamental doctrine of all true religion, the unity of God, they neglected all distinctions of persons, and taught the notion of one God with three names, they may hence be also considered as a species of UNITARIANS. Sabellius flourished about the middle of the third century, and his doctrine seems to have had many followers for a short time. Its growth, however, was soon checked by the opposition made to it by Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, and the sentence of condemnation pronounced upon its author by Pope Dionysius, in a council held at Rome, A. D. 263. Sabellius taught that there is but one person in the Godhead; and, in confirmation of this doctrine, he made use of this comparison: As man, though composed of body and soul, is but one person, so God, though he is Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is but one person. Hence the Sabellians reduced the three persons in the trinity to three characters or relations, and maintained that the Word and Holy Spirit are only virtues, emanations, or functions of the Deity; that he who is in heaven is the Father of all things; that he descended into the Virgin, became a child, and was born of her as a son; and that, having accomplished the mystery of our redemption, he effused himself upon the apostles in tongues of fire, and was then denominated the Holy Ghost. This they explain by resembling God to the sun, the illuminative virtue or quality of which was the Word, and its quickening virtue the Holy Spirit. The Word, according to their doctrine, was darted, like a divine ray, to accomplish the work of redemption; and having re-ascended to heaven, the influences of the Father were communicated, after a like manner, to the apostles. They also attempted to illustrate this mystery by one light kindled by another; by the fountain and stream, and by the stock and branch. With respect to the sentiments of Sabellius himself, the accounts are various. According to some, he taught that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were one subsistence, and one person, with three names; and that, in the Old Testament, the Deity delivered the law as the Father; in the New Testament dwelt among men as the Son; and descended on the apostles as the Holy Spirit.

According to Mosheim, his sentiments differed from those of Noëtius, in this, that the latter was of opinion that the person of the Father had assumed the human nature of Christ; whereas Sabellius maintained that a certain energy only proceeded from the Supreme Parent, or a certain portion of the Divine nature was united to the Son of God, the man Jesus; and he considered, in the same manner, the Holy Ghost as a portion of the everlasting Father.

Between the system of Sabellianism and what is termed the Indwelling Scheme, there appears to be a considerable resemblance, if it be not precisely the same, differently explained. The Indwelling Scheme is chiefly founded on that passage in the New Testament where the apostle, speaking of Christ, says, "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Dr. Watts, toward the close of his life, adopted this opinion, and wrote several pieces in its defence. His sentiments on the trinity appear to have been, that the Godhead, the Deity itself, personally distinguished as the Father, was united to the man Christ Jesus; in consequence of which union or indwelling of the Godhead, he became properly God. Mr. Palmer observes, that Dr. Watts conceived this union to have subsisted before the Saviour's appearance in the flesh, and that the human soul of Christ existed with the Father from before the foundation of the world: on which ground he maintains the real descent of Christ from heaven to earth, and the whole scene of his humiliation, which he thought incompatible with the common opinion concerning him.

[SACCOPHORI. Persons in the fourth century who always wore sackcloth. They are identified with the Apotactici, or Renouncers, a sect of Ascetics.]

[SACK, BRETHREN OF THE. An order established in the thirteenth century. They wore a sack over their shoulders, and went bare-legged, with wooden sandals. They abstained from flesh and wine. They had monasteries in England, France, Germany, and Italy.]

SACKCLOTH, a sort of mourning worn at the death of a friend or relation. In great calamities, in penitence, in trouble also, they wore sackcloth about their bodies. "Gird yourselves with sackcloth, and mourn for Abner." 2 Sam. iii. 31. "Let us gird ourselves with sackcloth; and let us go and implore the clemency of the King of Israel." 1 Kings xx. 31. Ahab rent his clothes, put on a shirt of haircloth next to his skin, fasted, and lay upon sackcloth. 1 Kings xxi. 27. When Mordecai was informed of the destruction threatened to his nation, he put on sackcloth and covered his head with ashes. Esther iv. On the contrary, in time of joy, or on hearing good news, those who were clad in sackcloth tore it from their bodies, and cast it from them. Psalm xxx. 11. The prophets were often clothed in sackcloth, and generally in coarse clothing. The Lord bids Isaiah to put off the sackcloth from about his body, and to go naked, that is, without his upper garment. Isaiah xx. 2. Zechariah says that false prophets shall no longer prophesy in sackcloth, to deceive the simple. Zech. xiii. 1.

SACRAMENT. There is no word in the Bible which corresponds to the word sacrament. It is a Latin word; and, agreeably to its derivation, it was applied by the early writers of the western Church to any ceremony of our holy religion, especially if it were figurative or mystical. But a more confined signification of this word by degrees prevailed, and in that stricter sense it has been always used by the divines of modern times. Sacraments, says Dr. Hill, are conceived in the Church of Rome to consist of matter, deriving, from the action of the priest in pronouncing certain words, a Divine virtue, by which grace is conveyed to the soul of every person who receives them. It is supposed to be necessary that the priest, in pronouncing the words, has the intention of giving to the matter that Divine virtue; otherwise it remains in its original state. On the part of those who receive the sacrament, it is required that they be free from any of those sins called in the Church of Rome mortal; but it is not required of them to exercise any good disposition, to possess faith, or to resolve that they shall amend their lives; for such is conceived to be the physical virtue of a sacrament administered by a priest with a good intention, that, unless when it is opposed by the obstacle of a mortal sin, the very act of receiving it is sufficient. This act was called, in the language of the schools, opus operatum, the work done independently of any disposition of mind attending the deed; and the superiority of the sacraments of the New Testament over the sacraments of the Old was thus expressed, that the sacraments of the Old Testament were effectual ex opere operantis, from the piety and faith of the persons to whom they were administered; while the sacraments of the New Testament convey grace, ex opere operato, from their own intrinsic virtue, and an immediate physical influence upon the mind of him who receives them. This notion represents the sacraments as a mere charm, the use of which, being totally disjoined from every mental exercise, cannot be regarded as a reasonable service. It gives men the hope of receiving, by the use of a charm, the full participation of the grace of God, although they continue to indulge that very large class of sins to which the accommodating morality of the Church of Rome extends the name of venial; and yet it makes this high privilege entirely dependent upon the intention of another, who, although he performs all the outward acts which belong to the sacrament, may, if he chooses, withhold the communication of that physical virtue without which the sacrament is of none avail.

The Socinian doctrine concerning the nature of the sacraments is founded upon a sense of the absurdity and danger of the popish doctrine, and a solicitude to avoid any approach to it, and runs into the opposite extreme. It is conceived that the sacraments are not essentially distinct from any other rites or ceremonies; that as they consist of a symbolical action, in which something external and material is employed to represent what is spiritual and invisible, they may by this address to the senses be of use in reviving the remembrance of past events, and in cherishing pious sentiments; but that their effect is purely moral, and that they contribute, by their moral effect, to the improvement of the individual in the same manner with reading the Scriptures, and many other exercises of religion. It is admitted, indeed, by the Socinians, that the sacraments are of further advantage to the whole society of Christians, as being the solemn badges by which the disciples of Jesus are discriminated from other men, and the appointed method of declaring that faith in Christ, by the public profession of which Christians minister to the improvement of one another. But in these two points, the moral effect upon the individual, and the advantage to society, is contained all that a Socinian holds concerning the general nature of the sacraments. This doctrine, like all other parts of the Socinian system, represents religion in the simple view of being a lesson of righteousness, and loses sight of that character of the gospel which is meant to be implied in calling it a covenant of grace. The greater part of Protestants, therefore, following an expression of the apostle, Rom. iv. 11, when he is speaking of circumcision, consider the sacraments as not only signs, but also seals, of the covenant of grace. Those who apply this phrase to the sacraments of the New Testament, admit every part of the Socinian doctrine concerning the nature of sacraments, and are accustomed to employ that doctrine to correct those popish errors upon this subject which are not yet eradicated from the minds of many of the people. But although they admit that the Socinian doctrine is true as far as it goes, they consider it as incomplete. For, while they hold that the sacraments yield no benefit to those upon whom the signs employed in them do not produce the proper moral effect, they regard these signs as intended to represent an inward invisible grace, which proceeds from him by whom they are appointed, and as pledges that that grace will be conveyed to all in whom the moral effect is produced. The sacraments, therefore, in their opinion, constitute federal acts, in which the persons who receive them with proper dispositions, solemnly engage to fulfil their part of the covenant, and God confirms his promise to them in a sensible manner; not as if the promise of God were of itself insufficient to render any event certain, but because this manner of exhibiting the blessings promised gives a stronger impression of the truth of the promise, and conveys to the mind an assurance that it will be fulfilled. According to this account of the sacraments, the express institution of God is essentially requisite to constitute their nature; and in this respect sacraments are distinguished from what may be called the ceremonies of religion. Ceremonies are in their nature arbitrary; and different means may be employed by different persons with success, according to their constitution, their education, and their circumstances, to cherish the sentiments of devotion, and to confirm good purposes. But no rite which is not ordained by God can be conceived to be a seal of his promise, or the pledge of any event that depends upon his good pleasure. Hence, that any rite may come up to our idea of a sacrament, we require in it, not merely a vague and general resemblance between the external matter which is the visible substance of the rite, and the thing thereby signified, but also words of institution, and a promise by which the two are connected together; and hence we reject five of the seven sacraments that are numbered in the Church of Rome, because in some of the five we do not find any matter without which there is not that sign which enters into our definition of a sacrament; and in others we do not find any promise connecting the matter used with the grace said to be thereby signified, although upon this connection the essence of a sacrament depends.

[SACRIFICATI. See Lapsed.]

SACRIFICE, properly so called, is the solemn infliction of death on a living creature, generally by the effusion of its blood, in a way of religious worship; and the presenting of this act to God, as a supplication for the pardon of sin, and a supposed means of compensation for the insult and injury thereby offered to his majesty and government. Sacrifices have, in all ages, and by almost every nation, been regarded as necessary to placate the Divine anger, and render the Deity propitious. Though the Gentiles had lost the knowledge of the true God, they still retained such a dread of him, that they sometimes sacrificed their own offspring for the purpose of averting his anger. Unhappy and bewildered mortals, seeking relief from their guilty fears, hoped to atone for past crimes by committing others still more awful: they gave their first-born for their transgression, the fruit of their body for the sin of their soul. The Scriptures sufficiently indicate that sacrifices were instituted by Divine appointment, immediately after the entrance of sin, to prefigure the sacrifice of Christ. Accordingly, we find Abel, Noah, Abraham, Job, and others, offering sacrifices in the faith of the Messiah; and the Divine acceptance of their sacrifices is particularly recorded. But, in religious institutions, the Most High has ever been jealous of his prerogative. He alone prescribes his own worship; and he regards as vain and presumptuous every pretence of honoring him which he has not commanded. The sacrifice of blood and death could not have been offered to him without impiety, nor would he have accepted it, had not his high authority pointed the way by an explicit prescription.

Under the law, sacrifices of various kinds were appointed for the children of Israel: the paschal lamb, Exod. xii. 8; the holocaust, or whole burnt-offering, Lev. vii. 8; the sin-offering, or sacrifice of expiation, Lev. iv. 8, 4; and the peace-offering, or sacrifice of thanksgiving, Lev. vii. 11, 12; all of which emblematically set forth the sacrifice of Christ, being the instituted types and shadows of it. Heb. ix. 9-15; x. 1. Accordingly, Christ abolished the whole of them when he offered his own sacrifice. "Above, when he said, Sacrifice, and offering, and burnt-offerings, and offering for sin, thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein, which are offered by the law; then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Christ once for all." Heb. x. 8-10: 1 Cor. v. 7. In illustrating this fundamental doctrine of Christianity, the Apostle Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, sets forth the excellency of the sacrifice of our great High Priest above those of the law in various particulars. The legal sacrifices were only brute animals, such as bullocks, heifers, goats, lambs, etc.; but the sacrifice of Christ was himself, a person of infinite dignity and worth. Heb. ix. 12, 13; i. 3; ix. 14, 26; x. 10. The former, though they cleansed from ceremonial uncleanness, could not possibly expiate sin, or purify the conscience from the guilt of it; and so it is said that God was not well pleased in them. Heb. x. 4, 5, 8, 11. But Christ, by the sacrifice of himself, hath effectually, and for ever, put away sin, having made an adequate atonement unto God for it, and by means of faith in it he also purges the conscience from dead works to serve the living God. Heb. ix. 10-26: Ephes. v. 2. The legal sacrifices were steadily offered, year after year, by which their insufficiency was indicated, and an intimation given that God was still calling sins to his remembrance, Heb. x. 3; but the last required no repetition, because it fully and at once answered all the ends of sacrifice, on which account God hath declared that he will remember the sins and iniquities of his people no more.

The term sacrifice is often used in a secondary or metaphorical sense, and applied to the good works of believers, and to the duties of prayer and praise, as in the following passages: "But to do good and to communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Heb. xiii. 16. "Having received of Epaphroditus the things which ye sent, an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God." Phil. iv. 18. "Ye are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." 1 Peter ii. 5. "By him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually; that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name." Heb. xiii. 15. "I beseech you, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." Rom. xii. 1. "There is a peculiar reason," says Dr. Owen, "for assigning this appellation to moral duties; for in every sacrifice there was a presentation of something unto God. The worshipper was not to offer that which cost him nothing: part of his substance was to be transferred from himself unto God. So it is in these duties; they cannot be properly observed without the alienation of something that was our own, our time, ease, property, etc., and a dedication of it to the Lord. Hence they have the general nature of sacrifices." The ceremonies used in offering the Jewish sacrifices require to be noticed as illustrative of many texts of Scripture, and some points of important doctrine.

[SACRILEGE. ἱεροσυλία, Rom. ii. 22, means to appropriate to one's own private use what is consecrated to God. ἱεροσύλους, Acts xix. 37, is rendered "robbers of churches," meaning temples of the gods. Compare Mal. iii. 8-10, and Josephus, Wars, vi. 26; Ant., xx. 8.]

[SACRISTAN. One who keeps the utensils of the church. The place where they are kept is called a sacristy.]

SADDUCEES, a sect among the Jews. It is said that the principles of the Sadducees were derived from Antigonus Sochæus, president of the sanhedrim, about B. C. 250, who, rejecting the traditionary doctrines of the scribes, taught that man ought to serve God out of pure love, and not from hope of reward or fear of punishment; and that they derived their name from Sadoc, one of his followers, who, mistaking or perverting this doctrine, maintained that there was no future state of rewards and punishments. Whatever foundation there may be for this account of the origin of the sect, it is certain that in the time of our Saviour the Sadducees denied the resurrection of the dead, and the existence of angels and spirits, or souls of departed men; [Matt. xxii. 23-34:] Acts xxiii. 8; though, as Mr. Hume observes, it is not easy to comprehend how they could at the same time admit the authority of the law of Moses. They carried their ideas of human freedom so far as to assert that men were absolutely masters of their own actions, and at full liberty to do either good or evil. Josephus even says that they denied the essential difference between good and evil; and, though they believed that God created and preserved the world, they seem to have denied his particular providence. These tenets, which resemble the Epicurean philosophy, led, as might be expected, to great profligacy of life; and we find the licentious wickedness of the Sadducees frequently condemned in the New Testament; yet they professed themselves obliged to observe the Mosaic law, because of the temporal rewards and punishments annexed to such observance; and hence they were always severe in their punishment of any crimes which tended to disturb the public tranquillity. The Sadducees rejected all tradition, and some authors have contended that they admitted only the books of Moses; but there seems no ground for that opinion, either in the Scriptures or in any ancient writer. Even Josephus, who was himself a Pharisee, and took every opportunity of reproaching the Sadducees, does not mention that they rejected any part of the Scriptures; he only says that "The Pharisees have delivered to the people many institutions as received from the fathers which are not written in the law of Moses. For this reason the Sadducees reject these things, asserting that those things are binding which are written, but that the things received by tradition from the fathers are not to be observed." Besides, it is generally believed that the Sadducees expected the Messiah with great impatience, which seems to imply their belief in the prophecies, though they misinterpreted their meaning. Confining all their hopes to this present world, enjoying ds riches, and devoting themselves to its pleasures, they might well be particularly anxious that their lot of life should be cast in the splendid reign of this expected temporal king, with the hope of sharing in his conquests and glory; but this expectation was so contrary to the lowly appearance of our Saviour, that they joined their inveterate enemies, the Pharisees, in persecuting him and his religion. Josephus says that the Sadducees were able to draw over to them the rich only, the people not following them; and he elsewhere mentions that this sect spread chiefly among the young. The Sadducees were far less numerous than the Pharisees, but they were in general persons of greater opulence and dignity. The council before whom our Saviour and St. Paul were carried consisted partly of Pharisees and partly of Sadducees.

[SAFFRON. כרכם, from roots signifying to cut and to be hot, suggests the cordial, aperient properties of the saffron, when used medicinally. The orientals use it very freely as a perfume, and also to flavor wine. It is the crocus sativus, whose petals are of a purple color. The LXX. and Vulgate render the word, Cant. iv. 14, crocus. Its Arabic name is zafran—hence saffron.]

[SAINTS. קדושים, kadushim. The word is supposed to indicate angels in Deut. xxxiii. 2; but Kennicott renders, "came from Meribah-kadesh." In Job xv. 15, and Dan. viii. 13, it appears to mean angels. Compare Job iv. 18: Zech. xiv. 5. It is supposed to designate the Trinity, in Prov. ix. 10: Dan. iv. 14, (17, Eng.) Compare Prov. xxx. 3: Hos. xii. 1, (xi. 12, Eng.) It is rendered saints, in Psalm xvi. 3; but some render the passage: "As to the profane idols which are in the land, and all the great who delight in them, multiplied shall be their sorrows, backward shall they hasten." See Kennicott and Boothroyd, in loc. It is used in a bad sense—a horribly bad one—in 1 Kings xv. 12; xxii. 46: 2 Kings xxiii. 7: Hos. iv. 14. The degraded wretches alluded to seem to have been set apart to the impure divinities in honor of which they practiced their abominations. Some think the word refers to tutelar divinities in Job v. 1. It seems to indicate those who were set apart to the service of Jehovah, as the congregation of Israel, and especially the priests, in Deut. xxxiii. 3: Psalm cvi. 16: Dan. vii. 18-27. 'Αγιοι, having the same etymological import, is applied to Christians in Acts ix. 14, and in the New Testament passim, indicating what they are, or ought to be, holy persons. Compare Deut. xiv. 2: 1 Peter ii. 9. חסידים, chesidim, is the word rendered saints in Prov. ii. 8, and in the Psalms passim. It comes from a root denoting to be good or benevolent.—The word saints is familiarly used as a compellation in speaking of apostles and evangelists: the Romanists extend it to all who have been canonized, whom they invoke in religious worship. Special days, called saints' days, are set apart in commemoration of them. The superstitious invocation of the saints can be traced to an early period, and seems to have been introduced into the Church by converts from heathenism. Apostrophes to the martyrs in sermons and hymns opened the way to formal prayers for their intercession. *See IDOLATRY,

LATRIA, and MARTYRS.—The followers of Hans Neilson Houghe, of Norway, are called "Saints:" their principles are said to be like those of the Quakers, only they observe the ordinances.—The word saints, like kadushim, has also a bad appropriation, as the MORMONS call themselves "Latter-Day Saints."]

[SALAH, SALA. Son or grandson of Arphaxad. Gen. xi. 24: Luke iii. 35, 36.]

SALAMIS, once a famous city in the isle of Cyprus, opposite to Seleucia, on the Syrian coast; and as it was the first place where the gospel was preached, it was in the primitive times made the see of the primate of the whole island. It was destroyed by the Saracens, and from the ruins was built Famagusta, which was taken by the Turks in 1570. Here St. Paul preached, A. D. 44. Acts xiii. 5.

[The city is said to have derived its name from the Grecian Salamis. Teucer having been driven from the latter by his father, Telamon, went to Cyprus and founded this place, which became the principal city of the island. A great many Jews appear to have been at Salamis when Paul visited it. Some suggest they may have been attracted thither by the farming of the copper mines of Cyprus by Augustus to Herod. In the reign of Trajan, the Jews rose and massacred two hundred and forty thousand of the inhabitants of the island, and the city of Salamis was nearly destroyed. Hadrian suppressed the insurrection, banished the Jews, and forbade their return on pain of death. In the days of Constantine it was overthrown by an earthquake, rebuilt, and called Constantia. The wretched modern town of Famagusta is some five miles south of the old site, which is covered with ruins.]

[SALATHIEL, SHEALTIEL. Son of Jehoniah and father of Zerubbabel. 1 Chron. iii. 17 Neh. xii. 1: Matt. i. 12: Luke iii. 27. Luke says he was a descendant of Neri—a legal son of Neri, either by marrying an heiress of Neri's family; or as issue of his widow, he having died childless; or as his grandson. The Jews have a tradition that Salathiel's mother was Susannah; and as Neri, or Neriah, was at that time an elderly person of distinction among the captives, he may have well been her father. Jer. xxxii. 12; li. 59. The name of Salathiel—of course not that of his mother—was inscribed in the records, thus uniting the line of Nathan with that of Solomon. This reconciles Luke with Matthew.]

SALOME, the wife of Zebedee, and mother of St. James the Greater, and St. John the Evangelist, Matthew xxvii. 56; and one of those holy women who used to attend upon our Saviour in his journeyings, and to minister to him. She was the person who requested of Jesus Christ that her two sons, James and John, might sit on his right and left hand when he should enter upon his kingdom, having then but the same obscure views as the rest of the disciples; but she gave proof of her faith when she followed Christ to Calvary, and did not forsake him even at the cross. Mark xv. 40: Matt. xxvii. 55, 56. She was also one of the women that brought perfumes to embalm him, and who came, for this purpose, to the sepulchre "early in the morning." Mark xvi. 1, 2. At the tomb they saw two angels, who informed them that Jesus was risen. Returning to Jerusalem, Jesus appeared to them on the way, and said to them, "Be not afraid: go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me."

SALT. God appointed that salt should be used in all the sacrifices that were offered to him. Leviticus ii. 13. Salt is esteemed the symbol of wisdom and grace, Colossians iv. 6: Mark ix. 50; also of perpetuity and incorruption, Numbers xviii. 19: 2 Chronicles xiii. 5. The orientals were accustomed also to ratify their federal engagements by salt. This substance was, among the ancients, the emblem of friendship and fidelity, and therefore used in all their sacrifices and covenants. It was a sacred pledge of hospitality which they never ventured to violate. Numerous instances occur of travellers in Arabia, after being plundered and stripped by the wandering tribes of the desert, claiming the protection of some civilized Arab, who, after receiving them into his tent, and giving them salt, instantly relieves their distress, and never forsakes them till he has placed them in safety. An agreement, thus ratified, is called, in Scripture, "a covenant of salt." The obligation which this symbol imposes on the mind of an oriental, is well illustrated by the Baron du Tott in the following anecdote: One who was desirous of his acquaintance promised in a short time to return. The baron had already attended him half way down the staircase, when stopping, and turning briskly to one of his domestics, "Bring me directly," said he, "some bread and salt." What he requested was brought; when, taking a little salt between his fingers, and putting it with a mysterious air on a bit of bread, he ate it with a devout gravity, assuring du Tott he might now rely on him.

Although salt, in small quantities, may contribute to the communicating and fertilizing of some kinds of stubborn soil, yet, according to the observations of Pliny, "all places in which salt is found are barren and produce nothing." The effect of salt, where it abounds, on vegetation, is described by burning, Deut. xxix. 23: "The whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt of burning." Thus Volney, speaking of the borders of the Asphaltic Lake, or Dead Sea, says, "The true cause of the absence of vegetables and animals is the acrid saltiness of its waters, which is infinitely greater than that of the sea. The land surrounding the lake, being equally impregnated with that saltiness, refuses to produce plants; the air itself, which is by evaporation loaded with it, and which moreover receives vapors of sulphur and bitumen, cannot suit vegetation; whence that dead appearance which reigns around the lake." So a salt land, Jer. xvii. 6, is the same as the "parched places of the wilderness," and is descriptive of barrenness, as saltiness also is. Job xxxix. 6: Psalm cvii. 34: Ezek. xlvii. 11: Zech. ii. 9. Hence the ancient custom of sowing an enemy's city, when taken, with salt, in token of perpetual desolation, Judges iv. 45; and thus in after times the city of Milan was burned, razed, sown with salt, and ploughed by the exasperated emperor, Frederic Barbarossa. The salt used by the ancients was what we call rock or fossil salt; and also that left by the evaporation of salt lakes. Both these kinds were impure, being mixed with earth, sand, etc., and lost their strength by deliquescence. Maundrell, describing the Valley of Salt, says, "On the side toward Gibul there is a small precipice, occasioned by the continual taking away of the salt; and in this you may see how the veins of it lie. I broke a piece of it, of which that part that was exposed to the sun, rain, and air, though it had the sparks and particles of salt, yet it had perfectly lost its savor; the inner part, which was connected with the rock, retained its savor, as I found by proof" Christ reminds his disciples, Matt. v. 13, "Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men." This is spoken of the mineral salt as mentioned by Maundrell, a great deal of which was made use of in offerings at the temple: such of it as had become insipid was thrown out to repair the road. The existence of such a salt, and its application to such a use, Schoetgenius has largely proved in his "Horæ Hebraicæ." The salt unfit for the land, Luke xvi. 34, Le Clerc conjectures to be that made of wood-ashes, which easily loses its savor, and becomes no longer serviceable.

[SALT IN BAPTISM. Augustin speaks of being "signed with the sign of the cross, and seasoned with its salt." The Sacramentary of Gregory the Great gives a form for the consecration of the salt, and says, "This benediction being finished, let the priest take a portion of the same salt, and put it in the mouth of the infant, saying, Take the salt of wisdom to eternal life." There may have been an allusion to Mark ix. 49, 50: Col. iv. 6; and particularly to Ezek. xvi. 4, where there is a reference to the ancient custom, of which Galen speaks, of rubbing the bodies of new-born infants with salt, to give them hardness. They also gave milk and honey, in reference, perhaps, to Exod. iii. 8, 17, xxxiii. 3, baptism introducing persons into the spiritual land of promise. The milk seems also to refer to 1 Pet. ii. 2. Tertullian speaks of this superstitious use of oil, milk, and honey: it is quite likely salt was introduced along with them: they are all classed among the necessities of life, Ecclus. xxxix. 31. Compare Ezra vi. 9; vii. 22: Job vi. 6.]

[SALT, VALLEY OF. This is identified with the Ghôr, south of the Dead Sea, adjacent to a mountain of salt. The immense amount of salt in that region will partly account for the saltiness of the Dead Sea, which is called "the salt sea," Gen. xiv. 3: Josh. iii. 16; xii. 3. In this plain the Israelites conquered the Edomites. In 2 Sam. viii. 13 they are called Syrians, but Edomites in 1 Chron. xviii. 12: אֲדֹמִים being written, perhaps, by mistake for אַרְבִּים. Compare 2 Kings xiv. 7. "This valley separates Judah from Edom. The City of Salt, Josh. xv. 62, was probably in its neighborhood.]

SALUTATIONS at meeting are not less common in the east than in the countries of Europe, but are generally confined to those of their own nation or religious party. When the Arabs salute each other, it is generally in these terms: Salum aleikum, "Peace be with you;" laying, as they utter the words, the right hand on the heart. The answer is, Aleikum essalum, "With you be peace;" to which aged people are inclined to add, "and the mercy and blessing of God.*" The Mohammedans of Egypt and Syria never salute a Christian in these terms: they content themselves with saying to them, "Good day to you;" or, "Friend, how do you do?" Niebuhr's statement is confirmed by Mr. Bruce, who says that some Arabs to whom he gave the salam, or salutation of peace, either made no reply, or expressed their astonishment at his impudence in using such freedom. Thus it appears that the orientals have two kinds of salutations—one for strangers, and the other for their own countrymen, or persons of their own religious profession. The Jews in the days of our Lord seem to have generally observed the same custom; they would not address the usual compliment of, "Peace be with you," to either heathens or publicans; the publicans of the Jewish nation would use it to their countrymen who were publicans, but not to heathens, though the more rigid Jews refused to do it either to publicans or heathens. Our Lord required his disciples to lay aside the moroseness of Jews, and cherish a benevolent disposition toward all around them: "If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Do not even the publicans so?" They were bound by the same authority to embrace their brethren in Christ with a special affection, yet they were to look upon every man as a brother, to feel a sincere and cordial interest in his welfare, and at meeting to express their benevolence in language corresponding with the feelings of their hearts. This precept is not inconsistent with the charge which the prophet Elisha gave to his servant

Gehazi, not to salute any man he met, nor return his salutation, for he wished him to make all the haste in his power to restore the child of the Shunammite, who had laid him under so many obligations. The manners of the country rendered Elisha's precautions particularly proper and necessary, as the salutations of the east often take up a long time. For a similar reason our Lord himself commanded his disciples on one occasion to salute no man by the way: it is not to be supposed that he would require his followers to violate or neglect an innocent custom, still less one of his own precepts; he only directed them to make the best use of their time in executing his work. This precaution was rendered necessary by the length of time which their tedious forms of salutation required. They begin their salutations at a considerable distance, by bringing the hand down to the knees, and then carrying it to the stomach. They express their devotedness to a person by holding down the hand, as they do their affection by raising it afterward to the heart. When they come close together, they take each other by the hand in token of friendship. The country-people at meeting clap each other's hands very smartly twenty or thirty times together, without saying any thing more than, "How do ye do? I wish you good health." After this first compliment, many other friendly questions about the health of the family, mentioning each of the children distinctly whose names they know. To avoid this useless waste of time, our Lord commanded them to avoid the customary salutations of those whom they might happen to meet by the way. All the forms of salutation now observed appear to have been in general use in the days of our Lord; for he represents a servant as falling down at the feet of his master when he had a favor to ask; and an inferior servant as paying the same compliment to the first, who belonged, it would seem, to a higher class: "The servant, therefore, fell down and worshipped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. And his fellow-servant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all." Matt. xviii. 26, 29. When Jairus solicited the Saviour to go and heal his daughter, he fell down at his feet: the Apostle Peter, on another occasion, seems to have fallen down at his knees, in the same manner as the modern Arabs fall down at the knees of a superior. The woman who was afflicted with an issue of blood touched the hem of his garment, and the Syrophenician woman fell down at his feet. In Persia, the salutation among intimate friends is made by inclining the neck over each other's neck, and then inclining cheek to cheek; which Mr. Morier thinks is most likely the falling upon the neck and kissing, so frequently mentioned in Scripture. Gen. xxxiii. 4; xlv. 14: Luke xv. 20.

SALVATION imports, in general, some great deliverance from any evil or danger. Thus, the conducting the Israelites through the Red Sea, and delivering them out of the hands of the Egyptians, is called a great salvation. But salvation, by way of eminence, is applied to that wonderful deliverance which our blessed Saviour procured for mankind, by saving them from the punishment of their sins; and in the New Testament is the same as our redemption by Christ. This is that salvation referred to by St. Paul: "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" The salvation which Christ purchased, and the gospel tenders to every creature, comprehends the greatest blessings which God can bestow; a deliverance from the most dreadful evils that mankind can suffer. It contains all that can make the nature of man perfect or his life happy, and secures him from whatever can render his condition miserable. The blessings of it are inexpressible, and beyond imagination. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." For, to be saved as Christ saves, is to have all our innumerable sins and transgressions forgiven and blotted out; all those heavy loads of guilt which oppressed our souls, perfectly removed from our minds. It is to be reconciled to God, and restored to his favor, so that he will be no longer angry, terrible, and retributive, but a most kind, compassionate, and tender Father. It is to be at peace with him and with our consciences; to have a title to his peculiar love, care, and protection all our days; to be rescued from the bondage and dominion of sin, and the tyranny of the devil. It is to be translated from the power of darkness into the kingdom of Christ, so that sin shall reign no longer in our mortal bodies, but we shall be enabled to serve God in newness of life. It is to be placed in a state of true freedom and liberty; to be no longer under the control of blind passions, and hurried on by our impetuous lusts to do what our reason condemns. It is to have a new principle of life infused into our souls; to have the Holy Spirit resident in our hearts, whose comfortable influence must ever cheer and refresh us, and by whose counsels we may be always advised, directed, and governed. It is to be transformed into the image of God, and to be made like him in wisdom, righteousness, and all other perfections of which man's nature is capable.

Finally, to be saved as Christ came to save mankind, is to be translated, after this life is ended, into a state of eternal felicity, never more to die or suffer, never more to know pain and sickness, grief and sorrow, labor and weariness, disquiet or vexation, but to live in perfect peace, freedom, and liberty, and to enjoy the greatest good after the most perfect manner for ever. It is to have our bodies raised again, and reunited to our souls; so that they shall be no longer gross, earthly, corruptible bodies, but spiritual, heavenly, immortal ones, fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, in which he now sits at the right hand of God. It is to live in the city of the great King, the heavenly Jerusalem, where the glory of the Lord fills the place with perpetual light and bliss. It is to spend eternity in the most noble and hallowed employments, in viewing and contemplating the wonderful works of God, admiring the wisdom of his providence, adoring his infinite love to the sons of men, reflecting on our own inexpressible happiness, and singing everlasting hymns of praise, joy, and triumph to God and our Lord Jesus Christ for vouchsafing all these blessings. It is to dwell for ever in a place where no objects of pity or compassion, of anger or envy, of hatred or distrust, are to be found; but where all will increase the happiness of each other by mutual love and kindness. It is to converse with the most perfect society, to be restored to the fellowship of our friends and relations who have died in the faith of Christ, and to be with Jesus Christ, to behold his glory, to live for ever in seeing and enjoying the great God, in "whose presence is fulness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore." This is the salvation that Christ has purchased for us, and which his gospel offers to all mankind.

SAMARIA, one of the three divisions of the Holy Land, having Galilee on the north, Judea on the south, the river Jordan on the east, and the Mediterranean Sea on the west. It took its name from its capital city, Samaria, and formed, together with Galilee and some cantons on the east of Jordan, during the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah, the kingdom of the former. The general aspect and produce of the country are nearly the same as those of Judea. But Mr. Buckingham observes, that "while in Judea the hills are mostly as bare as the imagination can paint them, and a few of the narrow valleys only are fertile, in Samaria the very summits of the eminences are as well clothed as the sides of them. These, with the luxuriant valleys which they enclose, present scenes of unbroken verdure in almost every point of view, which are delightfully variegated by the picturesque forms of the hills and vales themselves, enriched by the occasional sight of wood and water, in clusters of olive and other trees, and rills and torrents running among them."

SAMARIA, the capital city of the kingdom of the ten tribes that revolted from the house of David. It was built by Omri, King of Israel, who began to reign A. M. 3079, and who died 3086. He bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, or for the sum of £684 7s. 6d. It took the name of Samaria from Shemer, the owner of the hill. 1 Kings xvi. 24. Some think, however, that there were before this some beginnings of a city in that place; because, antecedent to the reign of Omri, there is mention made of Samaria. 1 Kings xiii. 32, A. M. 3030. But others take this for a prolepsis, or an anticipation in the discourse of the man of God. However this may be, it is certain that Samaria was no considerable place, and did not become the capital of the kingdom till after the reign of Omri. Before him the kings of Israel dwelt at Shechem or at Tirzah. Samaria was advantageously situated upon an agreeable and fruitful hill, twelve miles from Dothaim, twelve from Merrom, and four from Atharath. Josephus says it was a day's journey from Jerusalem. The kings of Samaria omitted nothing to make this city the strongest, the finest, and the richest that was possible. Ahab built there a palace of ivory, 1 Kings xxii. 39, that is, in which there were many ivory ornaments; and, according to Amos, (iii. 15; iv. 1, 2,) it became the seat of luxury and effeminacy. Benhadad, King of Syria, built public places called "streets," in Samaria, 1 Kings xx. 34; probably bazaars for trade, and quarters where his people dwelt to pursue commerce. His son Benhadad besieged this place under the reign of Ahab. 1 Kings xx., A. M. 3103. It was besieged by Shalmaneser, King of Assyria, in the ninth year of the reign of Hoshea, King of Israel, 2 Kings xvii. 6, etc., which was the fourth of Hezekiah, King of Judah. It was taken three years after, A. M. 3283. The prophet Hosea (x. 4, 8, 9) speaks of the cruelties exercised by Shalmaneser against the besieged; and Micah (i. 6) says that the city was reduced to a heap of stones. The Cuthites that were sent by Esar-haddon to inhabit the country of Samaria did not think it worth their while to repair the ruined city: they dwelt at Shechem, which they made the capital city of their state. They were in this condition when Alexander the Great came into Phenicia and Judea. However, the Cuthites had rebuilt some of the houses of Samaria, even from the time of the return of the Jews from the captivity, since the inhabitants of Samaria are spoken of, Ezra iv. 17: Neh. iv. 2. And the Samaritans being jealous of the Jews on account of the favors that Alexander the Great had conferred on them, revolted from him while he was in Egypt, and burned Andromachus alive, whom he had left governor of Syria. Alexander soon marched against them, took Samaria, and appointed Macedonians to inhabit it, giving the country round it to the Jews; and to encourage them in the cultivation, he exempted them from tribute. The kings of Egypt and Syria who succeeded Alexander, deprived them of the property of this country. But Alexander Balas, King of Syria, restored to Jonathan Maccabeus the cities of Lydda, Ephrem, and Ramatha, which he cut off from the country of Samaria. 1 Macc. x. 30, 38; xi. 28, 34. Lastly, the Jews reentered into the full possession of this whole country under John Hircanus, the Asmonean, who took Samaria, and, according to Josephus, made the river run through its ruins. It continued in this state till A. M. 3947, when Aulus Gabinius, the proconsul of Syria, rebuilt it, and gave it the name of Gabiniana. Yet it remained very inconsiderable till Herod the Great restored it to its ancient splendor.

The sacred authors of the New Testament speak but little of Samaria; and when they do mention it, the country is rather to be understood than the city. Luke xvii. 11: John iv. 4, 5. After the death of Stephen, Acts viii. 1, 2, 3, when the disciples were dispersed through the cities of Judea and Samaria, Philip made several converts in this city. There it was that Simon Magus resided, and thither Peter and John went to communicate the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

Travellers give the following account of its present state: Sebaste is the name which Herod gave to the ancient Samaria, the imperial city of the ten tribes, in honor of Augustus (Sebastos) Cæsar, when he rebuilt and fortified it, converting the greater part of it into a citadel, and erecting here a noble temple. "The situation," says Dr. Richardson, "is extremely beautiful, and strong by nature; more so, I think, than Jerusalem. It stands on a fine, large, insulated hill, compassed all around by a broad, deep valley; and when fortified, as it is stated to have been by Herod, one would have imagined that, in the ancient system of warfare, nothing but famine could have reduced such a place. The valley is surrounded by four hills, one on each side, which are cultivated in terraces up to the top, sown with grain and planted with fig and olive trees, as is also the valley. The hill of Samaria likewise rises in terraces to a height equal to any of the adjoining mountains. The present village is small and poor, and, after passing the valley, the ascent to it is very steep. Viewed from the station of our tents, it is extremely interesting, both from its natural situation, and from the picturesque remains of a ruined convent, of good Gothic architecture. Having passed the village, toward the middle of the first terrace, there is a number of columns still standing. I counted twelve in one row, besides several that stood apart, the brotherless remains of other rows. The situation is extremely delightful, and my guide informed me that they belonged to the serai, or palace. On the next terrace there are no remains of solid building, but heaps of stone and lime and rubbish mixed with the soil in great profusion. Ascending to the third or highest terrace, the traces of former building were not so numerous, but we enjoyed a delightful view of the surrounding country. The eye passed over the deep valley that encompasses the hill of Sebaste, and rested on the mountains beyond, that retreated as they rose with a gentle slope, and met the view in every direction, like a book laid out for perusal on a reading-desk. This was the seat of the capital of the short-lived and wicked kingdom of Israel; and on the face of these mountains the eye surveys the scene of many bloody conflicts and many memorable events. Here those holy men of God, Elijah and Elisha, spoke their tremendous warnings in the ears of their incorrigible rulers, and wrought their miracles in the sight of all the people. From this lofty eminence we descended to the south side of the hill, where we saw the remains of a stately colonnade that stretches along this beautiful exposure from east to west. Sixty columns are still standing in one row. The shafts are plain; and fragments of Ionic volutes, that lie scattered about, testify the order to which they belonged. These are probably the relics of some of the magnificent structures with which Herod the Great adorned Samaria. None of the walls remain." Mr. Buckingham mentions a current tradition, that the avenue of columns formed a part of Herod's palace. According to his account, there were eighty-three of these columns erect in 1816, besides others prostrate; all without capitals. Josephus states that, about the middle of the city, Herod built "a sacred place, of a furlong and a half in circuit, and adorned it with all sorts of decorations; and therein erected a temple, illustrious for both its largeness and beauty." It is probable that these columns belonged to it. On the eastern side of the same summit are the remains, Mr. Buckingham states, of another building, "of which eight large and eight small columns are still standing, with many others fallen near them. These also are without capitals, and are of a smaller size and of an inferior stone to the others." "In the walls of the humble dwellings forming the modern village, portions of sculptured blocks of stone are perceived, and even fragments of granite pillars have been worked into the masonry."

[Dr. Olin, in 1840, counted eighty-two standing columns, and supposes that the fallen ones must be more numerous. He says a few of them are of granite and white marble. Those measured by Robinson were sixteen feet high, two feet in diameter at the base, and one foot eight inches at the top. The width of the colonnade was fifty feet. Its curvilinear course may be traced for three thousand feet: if it originally extended to the magnificent entrance of the city on that side, it must have been more than half a mile long. The ruins at the end of the colonnade are supposed by Olin to be the relics of a heathen temple or a triumphal arch, built by Herod in honor of Augustus. Two rows of smaller columns connect the colonnade with the cluster of columns on the east, fifteen of which Dr. Olin found erect: they measure seven and a half feet in circumference. He thinks they are the remains of the temple built by Herod. He found another colonnade in a deep ravine north of the city. It is a quadrangle, one hundred and ninety-six paces long and sixty-four wide—the columns, some of which are standing, being three paces apart from centre to centre. He suggests that it may have been an amphitheatre or hippodrome. Jerome says John the Baptist was buried at Samaria; and it is said that in the reign of Julian the Apostate, the pagans broke open the tomb, burnt the bones, and scattered the ashes. Phocas, in 1185, speaks of the Church of John the Baptist at Samaria, which tradition affirms was built by Helena. The walls of the church, now standing—built apparently by the Crusaders—enclose a mosque and the reputed tomb of the Baptist. Josephus says John was beheaded in the castle of Macherus, east of the Dead Sea: it is not likely that the disciples carried his body to Samaria for interment. Sebaste appears to have been laid in ruins before the fourth century. It continued, however, to be of some importance, as an episcopal see, one of its bishops being present at the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, and another at the Synod of Jerusalem, A. D. 536. It fell into the hands of the Mohammedans during the siege of Jerusalem. The Crusaders established a Latin bishopric here, the title of which continued till the fourteenth century. A titular Greek bishop of Sebaste resides in the convent at Jerusalem, and in Sebastieh, as the modern village is called, there are still a few Greek Christians.]

SAMARITANS, an ancient sect among the Jews, still subsisting in some parts of the Levant, under the same name. Its origin was in the time of Rehoboam, under whose reign a division was made of the people of Israel into two distinct kingdoms. One of these kingdoms, called Judah, consisted of such as adhered to Rehoboam and the house of David; the other retained the ancient name of Israelites, under the command of Jeroboam. The capital of the state of these latter was Samaria; and hence it was that they were denominated Samaritans. Some affirm that Shalmaneser, King of Assyria, having conquered Samaria, led the whole people captive into the remotest parts of his empire, and filled their places with colonies of Babylonians, Cuthceans, and other idolaters. These finding themselves daily destroyed by wild beasts, it is said, desired an Israelitish priest to instruct them in the ancient laws and customs of the land they inhabited. This was granted them; and they thenceforth ceased to be incommoded with any beasts. However, with the law of Moses, they still retained somewhat of their ancient idolatry. The rabbins say, they adored the figure of a dove on Mount Gerizim. As the revolted tribes had no more of the Scriptures than the five books of Moses, so the priest could bring no others with him beside those books written in the old Phœnician letters.

Upon the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple, the religion of the Samaritans received another alteration on the following occasion: one of the sons of Jehoiada, the high-priest, whom Josephus calls Manasseh, married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite; but the law of God having forbidden the intermarriages of the Israelites with any other nation, Nehemiah set himself to reform this corruption, which had spread into many Jewish families, and obliged all that had taken strange wives immediately to part with them. Neh. xiii. 23-30. Manasseh, unwilling to surrender his wife, fled to Samaria; and many others in the same circumstances, and with similar disposition, went and settled under the protection of Sanballat, governor of Samaria. Manasseh brought with him some other apostate priests, with many other Jews, who disliked the regulations made by Nehemiah at Jerusalem; and now the Samaritans, having obtained a high-priest, and other priests of the descendants from Aaron, were soon brought off from the worship of the false gods, and became as much enemies to idolatry as the best of the Jews. However, Manasseh gave them no other Scriptures beside the Pentateuch, lest, if they had the other Scriptures, they should then find that Jerusalem was the only place where they should offer their sacrifices. From that time the worship of the Samaritans came much nearer to that of the Jews, and they afterward obtained leave of Alexander the Great to build a temple on Mount Gerizim, near the city of Samaria, in imitation of the temple at Jerusalem, where they practiced the same forms of worship. To this mountain and temple the Samaritan woman of Sychar refers in her discourse with our Saviour. John iv. 20. The Samaritans soon after revolted from Alexander, who drove them out of Samaria, introduced Macedonians in their room, and gave the province of Samaria to the Jews. This circumstance contributed in no small degree to increase the hatred and animosity between those two people. When any Israelite deserved punishment on account of the violation of some important point of the law, he presently took refuge in Samaria or Shechem, and embraced the worship at the temple of Gerizim. When the affairs of the Jews were prosperous, the Samaritans did not fail to call themselves Hebrews, and of the race of Abraham. But when the Jews suffered persecution, the Samaritans disowned them, and alleged that they were Phenicians originally, or descended from Joseph, or Manasseh his son. This was their practice in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. It is certain the modern Samaritans are far from idolatry; some of the most learned among the Jewish doctors own that they observe the law of Moses more rigidly than the Jews themselves. They have a Hebrew copy of the Pentateuch, differing in some respects from that of the Jews, and written in different characters, commonly called Samaritan characters; which Origen, Jerome, and other fathers and critics, ancient and modern, take to be the primitive character of the ancient Hebrews, though others maintain the contrary. The point of preference, as to purity, antiquity, etc., of the two Pentateuchs, is also much disputed by modern critics.

The Samaritans are now few in number; though it is not very long since they pretended to have priests descended directly from the family of Aaron. They were chiefly found at Gaza, Neapolis or Shechem, (the ancient Sychem or Naplouse,) Damascus, Cairo, etc. They had a temple, or chapel, on Mount Gerizim, where they performed their sacrifices. They have also synagogues in other parts of Palestine, and also in Egypt. Joseph Scaliger, being curious to know their usages, wrote to the Samaritans of Egypt, and to the high-priest of the whole sect, who resided at Neapolis. They returned two answers, dated in the year 998 of the Hegira of Mohammed. These answers never came to the hands of Scaliger. They are now in the library at Paris, and have been translated into Latin by Father Morin, priest of the oratory; and printed in the collection of letters of that father in England, 1662, under the title of "Antiquitates Ecclesie Orientalis." M. Simon has inserted a French translation in the first edition of "Ceremonies et Coutumes des Juifs," in the manner of a supplement to Leo de Modena. In the first of these answers, written in the name of the assembly of Israel, in Egypt, they declare that they celebrate the passover every year, on the fourteenth day of the first month, on Mount Gerizim, and that he who then filled the office of high-priest was called Eleazar, a descendant of Phinehas, son of Aaron. In the second answer, which is in the name of the high-priest Eleazar, and the synagogue of Shechem, they declare that they keep the Sabbath in all the rigor with which it is enjoined in the book of Exodus; none among them stirring out of doors, but to the synagogue. They add, that they begin the feast of the passover with the sacrifice appointed for that purpose in Exodus; that they sacrifice nowhere else but on Mount Gerizim; that they observe the feasts of harvest, the expiation, the tabernacles, etc. They add further, that they never defer circumcision beyond the eighth day; never marry their nieces, as the Jews do; have but one wife; and, in fine, do nothing but what is commanded in the law; whereas the Jews frequently abandon the law to follow the inventions of their rabbins. At the time when they wrote to Scaliger, they reckoned one hundred and twenty-two high-priests; affirmed that the Jews had no high-priests of the race of Phinehas; and that the Jews belied them in calling them Cutheans; for that they are descended from the tribe of Joseph by Ephraim. [See SHECHEM.]

[SAMOS. An island forty-two miles south-west of Smyrna. It covers an area of one hundred and sixty-five square miles, and, at present, has a population of some fifty thousand. Strabo says it derived its name from the chain of mountains by which it is traversed. It was and is very fertile. As one of the twelve Ionian states, it was remarkable for its commerce and maritime enterprise. After the death of Polycrates, it fell into the hands of the Persians, regained its freedom, but subsequently passed under the power of the Romans. Antony and Cleopatra kept court here with great splendor. Augustus spent a winter on the island. Pythagoras and Theodorus were born here. The capital, Samos, was built on the south-eastern extremity; in its suburbs was a magnificent temple of Juno, to whom the island was consecrated. The ruins of the city are to be seen near Megalochora, the modern capital. The Samiotes were among the foremost in the late Greek war of independence, and successfully held the island against the Turks. In his journey to Jerusalem, Paul "arrived at Samos," though he "tarried at Trogyllium," which was a port on the opposite coast. He passed through Little Bosphaz, a strait about a mile wide, between Samos and the promontory of Mycale—famous for the defeat of Xerxes—in order to reach Miletus. The vessel came to anchor at Trogyllium, at night, so as to have daylight to run into the harbor of Miletus, the two ports being about eighteen miles apart Acts xx. 15.]

[SAMOTHRACIA. An island in the Ægean sea, near the Hellespont. It has an area of thirty square miles, and a population of fifteen hundred persons, principally fishermen. Its name, Thracian Samos, is said to have been given it by colonists from the Ionian Samos, though Strabo doubts this. It has borne various names, as Dardania, Electris, and Melite, and is called at present, Samothraki, and by the Turks, Semendrek. It gained great celebrity in ancient times by the worship of the Cabiri, which was introduced by the Phenicians. Herodotus says the Pelasgians lived in Samothracia, and taught the Samothracians the mysteries of Ceres and Proserpine, which were there celebrated. Euterge, ii. 51. Homer says Neptune sat on the highest summit of the woody Thracian Samos, admiring the Trojan war, for from thence all Ida was visible, with the city of Priam, and the ships of the Greeks. Il. xiii. 10-14. The highest summit of the mountains, called Saoce by Pliny, is five thousand two hundred and forty-eight feet above the sea. Perseus, King of Macedonia, was seized on this island by the Romans; by whom, in the reign of Vespasian, it, with the other Ægean isles, was reduced to the form of a province. The ruins of the ancient town of Samothracia are on the north side. In going from Troas to Macedonia, Paul went "with a straight course to Samothracia." Acts xvi. 11. The vessel sailed before the wind, which blew from the south, counteracting the current which sets to the southward from the mouth of the Dardanelles. She passed through the strait between Tenedos and the main-land, and then near the eastern shore of Imbros, which is twelve miles south by east of Samothracia, which having reached, she dropped anchor for the night.]

[SAMPSEANS. Elcesaites of Peræa, so called, according to Epiphanius, from a word signifying the sun; and according to Basnage, from Sampsā, in Arabia.]

SAMSON, son of Manoah, of the tribe of Dan. Judges xiii. 2, etc. We are nowhere acquainted with the name of his mother. He was born A. M. 2849, and was a Nazarite from his infancy, by the Divine command. He was brought up in a place called the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaal. Judges xiii. 25. His extraordinary achievements are particularly recorded in Judges xiv.-xvi. "Faith" is attributed to him by St. Paul, though whether he retained it to the end of his life may be doubted. He is not inaptly called by an old writer, "a rough believer."

SAMUEL, the son of Elkanah and of Hannah, of the tribe of Levi and family of Kohath, was born A. M. 2848. He was an eminent inspired prophet, historian, and the seventeenth and last Judge of Israel; and died in the ninety-eighth year of his age, two years before Saul, A. M. 2947. 1 Sam. xxv. To Samuel are ascribed the book of Judges, that of Ruth, and the first book of Samuel. There is, indeed, great probability that he composed the first twenty-four chapters of the first book of Samuel; since they contain nothing but what he might have written, and such transactions as he was chiefly concerned in. However, in these chapters there are some small additions, which seem to have been inserted after his death. Samuel began the order of the prophets, which was never discontinued till the death of Zechariah and Malachi. Acts iii. 24. From early youth to hoary years, the character of Samuel is one on which the mind rests with veneration and delight.

SANBALLAT, the governor of the Cuthites or Samaritans, and an enemy to the Jews. He was a native of Horon, a city beyond Jordan, in the country of the Moabites. Neh. ii. 10, 19; iv.; vi.

SANCTIFICATION, that work of God's grace by which we are renewed after the image of God, set apart for his service, and enabled to die unto sin and live unto righteousness. Sanctification is either of nature, whereby we are renewed after the image of God, in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness, Eph. iv. 24, Col. iii. 19, or of practice, whereby we die unto sin, have its power destroyed in us, cease from the love and practice of it, hate it as abominable, and live unto righteousness, loving and studying good works. Tit. ii. 11, 12. Sanctification comprehends all the graces of knowledge, faith, repentance, love, humility, zeal, patience, etc., and the exercise of them in our conduct toward God or man. Gal. v. 22-24: 1 Peter i. 15, 16: Matt. v., vi., vii. Sanctification in this world must be complete; the whole nature must be sanctified, all sin must be utterly abolished, or the soul can never be admitted into the glorious presence of God; Heb. xii. 14: 1 Peter i. 15: Rev. 21, 27; yet the saints, while here, are in a state of spiritual warfare with Satan and his temptations, with the world and its influence. 2 Cor. ii. 11: 1 John ii. 15, 16.

SANCTIFY. In the Old Testament, to sanctify often denotes to separate from a common to a holy purpose; to set apart or consecrate to God as his special property, and for his service. Our Lord also uses this term, when he says, "For their sakes I sanctify myself," John xvii. 19; that is, I separate and dedicate myself to be a sacrifice to God for them, "that they also may be sanctified through the truth;" that is, that they may be cleansed from the guilt of sin. Under the law of Moses, there was a church purity, or ceremonial sanctification, which might be obtained by the observance of external rites and ordinances, while persons were destitute of internal purity or holiness. Every defiled person was made "common," and excluded from the privilege of a right to draw nigh to God in his solemn worship; but in his purification he was again separated to him, and restored to his sacred right. Hence St. Paul speaks of "the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, as sanctifying unto the purifying of the flesh." Heb. ix. 13. These things were in reality of no moral worth or value; they were merely typical institutions, intended to represent the blessings of the new and better covenant, those "good things that were to come;" and therefore God is frequently spoken of in the prophets as despising them, namely, in any other view than that for which his wisdom had ordained them. Isaiah i. 11-15: Psalm i. 8, 9; li. 6. But that dispensation is now at an end: under the New Testament, the state of things is changed, for now "neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature." The thing signified, namely, internal purity and holiness, is no less necessary to a right to the privileges of the gospel, than the observance of those external rites was unto the privileges of the law.

SANCTUARY. See TEMPLE.

[מקדש, Makdash, is not only applied to the tabernacle or temple, that is, the division next to the sanctum sanctorum, Lev. iv. 6: Num. iv. 5-16; x. 21: 2 Chron. xxvi. 18, but also to any place of worship, Psalm lxxiii. 17: compare Exod. xv. 17: Psalm lxxviii. 54, 69; to heaven, Psalm cii. 19: compare Heb. ix. 1, 2, where the sanctuary in the tabernacle is called "worldly," as contrasted with the heavenly sanctuary, verses 11, 23, 24. It means an asylum, Isa. viii. 14: compare 1 Kings i. 50-53; ii. 28-30.—The bema, or chancel of a church, is called the sanctuary. Formerly the privilege of sanctuary, or protection from justice, was assigned to the precincts of a church; but as it encouraged the commission of crime, it was abolished at the Reformation in Protestant states, and has since become obsolete in nearly all Romish countries.]

SANDALS, at first, were only soles tied to the feet with strings or thongs; afterward they were covered; and at last they called even shoes sandals. When Judith went to the camp of Holofernes, she put sandals on her feet; and her sandals ravished his eyes. Judith x. 4; xvi. 9. They were a magnificent kind of buskins proper only to ladies of condition, and such as dressed themselves for admiration. But there were sandals also belonging to men, and of mean value. We read, "If the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother will not perform the duty of a husband's brother; then shall his brother's wife come unto him, in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face; and shall say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him who hath had his shoe loosed." Deut. xxv. 7. A late writer observes that the word rendered "shoe," usually means "sandal," that is, a mere sole fastened on the foot in a very simple manner; and that the primary and radical meaning of the word rendered face is surface, the superficies of any thing. Hence he would submit that the passage may be to the following purpose: The brother's wife shall loose the sandal from off the foot of her husband's brother; and shall spit upon its face or surface, (that is, of the shoe,) and shall say, etc. This ceremony is coincident with certain customs among the Turks. We are told that in a complaint against her own husband, for withholding himself from her intimacy, the wife when before the judge takes off her own shoe, and spits upon it; but in case of complaint against her husband's brother, she takes off his shoe and spits upon it.

The business of untying and carrying the sandals being that of a servant, the expressions of the Baptist, "whose shoes I am not worthy to bear," "whose shoe latchet I am not worthy to unloose," were an acknowledgment of his great inferiority to Christ, and that Christ was his Lord. To pull off the sandals on entering a sacred place, or the house of a person of distinction, was the usual mark of respect. They were taken care of by the attendant servant. At the doors of an Indian pagoda, there are as many sandals and slippers hung up as there are hats in our places of worship.

[SANDEMANIANS. See GLASITES.]

SANHEDRIM, SANHEDRIN, or SYNEDRIUM, among the ancient Jews, the supreme council or court of judicature of that republic; in which were dispatched all the great affairs both of religion and policy. The word is derived from the Greek συνέδριον, a council, assembly, or company of people, sitting together; from σύν, together, and ἔδρα, a seat. Many of the learned agree that it was instituted by Moses, Numbers xi.; and consisted at first of seventy elders, who judged finally of all causes and affairs; and that they subsisted, without intermission, from Moses to Ezra. Deut. xxvii. 1; xxxi. 9: Josh. xxiv. 1, 31: Judg. ii. 7: 2 Chron. xix. 8: Ezek. viii. 11. Others will have it that the council of seventy elders established by Moses was temporary, and did not hold after his death; adding, that we find no sign of any such perpetual and infallible tribunal throughout the whole Old Testament; and that the sanhedrim was first set up in the time when the Maccabees, or Asmoneans, took upon themselves the administration of the government under the title of high-priests, and afterward of kings, that is, after the persecution of Antiochus. This is by far the most probable opinion. The Jews, however, contend strenuously for the antiquity of their great sanhedrim: M. Simon strengthens and defends their proofs, and M. Le Clerc attacks them. Whatever may be the origin and establishment of the sanhedrim, it is certain that it was subsisting in the time of our Saviour, since it is spoken of in the Gospels—Matt. v. 21: Mark xiii. 9; xiv. 55; xv. 1—and since Jesus Christ himself was arraigned and condemned by it; that it was held at Jerusalem; and that the decision of all the most important affairs among the Jews belonged to it. The president of this assembly was called nasi, or prince; his deputy was called abbeth-din, father of the house of judgment; and the sub-deputy was called chacan, the wise: the rest were denominated tzekanim, elders or senators. The room in which they sat was a rotunda, half of which was built without the temple, and half within; that is, one semicircle of the room was within the compass of the temple; and as it was never allowed to sit down in the temple, they tell us this part was for those who stood up; the other half, or semicircle, extended without the holy place, and here the judges sat. The nasi, or prince, sat on a throne at the end of the hall, having his deputy at his right hand, and his sub-deputy at his left; the other senators were ranged in order on each side.

The sanhedrim subsisted until the destruction of Jerusalem, but its authority was almost reduced to nothing, from the time in which the Jewish nation became subject to the Roman empire. The rabbins pretend that the sanhedrim has always subsisted in their nation from the time of Moses to the destruction of the temple by the Romans; and they maintain that it consisted of seventy counsellors, six out of each tribe, and Moses as president; and thus the number was seventy-one; but six senators out of each tribe make the number seventy-two, which, with the president, constitute a council of seventy-three persons; and therefore it has been the opinion of some authors that this was the number of the members of the sanhedrim. As to the personal qualifications of the judges of this court, it was required that they should be of untainted birth; and they were often of the race of the priests or Levites, or of the number of inferior judges, or of the lesser sanhedrim, which consisted of twenty-three judges. They were to be skilful in the written and traditional law, and they were obliged to study magic, divination, fortune-telling, physic, astrology, arithmetic, and languages. It was also required that none of them should be eunuchs, usurers, decrepit or deformed, or gamesters; and that they should be of mature age, rich, and of good countenance and body. Thus say the rabbins.

The authority of the sanhedrim was very extensive. This council decided causes brought before it by appeal from inferior courts. The king, high-priest, and prophets were subject to its jurisdiction. The general officers of the nation were brought before the sanhedrim. How far their right of judging in capital cases extended, and how long it continued, have been subjects of controversy. Among the rabbins it has been a generally received opinion, that about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, their nation had been deprived of the power of life and death; and most authors assert, that this privilege was taken from them ever since Judea was made a province of the Roman empire; that is, after the banishment of Archelaus. Others, however, maintain that the Jews had still the power of life and death; but that this privilege was restricted to crimes committed against their law, and depended upon the governor's will and pleasure. In the time of Moses this council was held at the door of the tabernacle of the testimony. As soon as the people were in possession of the land of promise, the sanhedrim followed the tabernacle, and it continued at Jerusalem, whither it was removed, till the captivity. During the captivity it was kept at Babylon. After the return from Babylon, it remained at Jerusalem, as it is said, to the time of the sicarii or assassins; afterward it was removed to Jamnia, thence to Jericho, to Uzzah, to Sepharvaim, to Bethsamia, to Sephoris, and last of all to Tiberias, where it continued till its utter extinction. Such is the account which the Jews give of their sanhedrim; but, as stated above, much of this is disputed. Petau fixes the beginning of the sanhedrim to the period when Gabinus was governor of Judea, by whom were erected tribunals in the five cities of Judea, namely, Jerusalem, Gadara, Amathus, Jericho, and Sephoris. Grotius agrees in the date of its commencement with the rabbins, but he fixes its termination at the beginning of Herod's reign. Basnage places it under Judas Maccabæus, and his brother Jonathan. Upon the whole it may be observed, that the origin of the sanhedrim has not been satisfactorily ascertained; and that the council of the seventy elders established by Moses was not what the Hebrews understood by the name of sanhedrim.

Before the death of our Saviour two very famous rabbins had been presidents of the sanhedrim, namely, Hillel and Schammai, who entertained very different opinions on several subjects, and particularly that of divorce. This gave occasion to the question which the Pharisees put to Jesus Christ upon that head. Matt. xix. 3. (See DIVORCE.) Hillel had Menahem for his associate in the presidency of the sanhedrim; but the latter afterward deserted that honorable post, and joined himself, with a great number of his disciples, to the party of Herod Antipas, who promoted the levying of taxes for the use of the Roman emperors with all his might. These were probably the Herodians mentioned in the Gospel. Matt. xxii. 16. To Hillel succeeded Simeon his son, who by some is supposed to have been the person who took Jesus Christ in his arms, Luke ii. 28, and publicly acknowledged him to be the Messiah. If this be the case, the Jewish sanhedrim had for president a person that was entirely disposed to embrace Christianity. Gamaliel, the son and successor of Simeon, seems to have been also of a candid disposition and character. There were several inferior sanhedrims in Palestine, all depending on the great sanhedrim at Jerusalem. The inferior sanhedrims consisted each of twenty-three persons; and there was one in each city and town. Some say, that to have a right to hold a sanhedrim, it was requisite there should be one hundred and twenty inhabitants in the place. Where the inhabitants came short of the number of one hundred and twenty, they only established three judges. In the great as well as the inferior sanhedrim were two scribes: the one to write down the suffrages of those who were for condemnation, the other to take down the suffrages of those who were for absolution.

[SAPPHIRE. See ANANIAS.]

SAPPHIRE, ספיר, Exod. xxiv. 10; xxviii. 18; Job xxviii. 6, 16; Cantic. v. 14; Isa. liv. 11; Ezek. i. 26; x. 1; xxviii. 13, σάπφειρος: Rev. xxi. 19, only. That this is the sapphire, there can be no doubt. The Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the general run of commentators, ancient and modern, agree in this. The sapphire is a pellucid gem. In its finest state it is extremely beautiful and valuable, and second only to the diamond in lustre, hardness, and value. Its proper color is pure blue; in the choicest specimens it is of the deepest azure, and in others varies into paleness, in shades of all degrees between that and a pure crystal brightness without the least tinge of color, but with a lustre much superior to the crystal. The oriental sapphire is the most beautiful and valuable. It is transparent, of a fine sky color, sometimes variegated with veins of a white sparry substance, and distinct separate spots of a gold color; whence it is that the prophets describe the throne of God like unto sapphire. Ezek. i. 26; x. 1. Isaiah, (liv. 11, 12,) prophesying the future grandeur of Jerusalem, says,

"Behold, I lay thy stones in cement of vermilion,
And thy foundations with sapphires;
And I will make thy battlements of rubies,
And thy gates of carbuncles;
And the whole circuit of thy walls shall be of precious stones."

"These seem," says Bishop Lowth, "to be general images to express beauty, magnificence, purity, strength, and solidity, agreeably to the ideas of the eastern nations, and to have never been intended to be strictly scrutinized, or minutely and particularly explained, as if they had each of them some precise moral or spiritual meaning." Tobit, (xiii. 16, 17,) in his prophecy of the final restoration of Israel, describes the New Jerusalem in the same oriental manner: "For Jerusalem shall be built up with sapphires, and emeralds, and precious stones; thy walls, and towers, and battlements with pure gold. And the streets of Jerusalem shall be paved with the beryl and carbuncle, and with stones of Ophir." Rev. xxi. 18-21.

[SARABAITES. Strolling monks, who appeared in the fourth century. They were called in Egypt Remboth. They lived chiefly in cities, where they pretended to work miracles, etc.]

SARAH, the wife of Abraham, and his sister, as he himself informs us, by the same father, but not the same mother. Gen. xx. 12. See ABRAHAM.

SARDIS, a city of Asia Minor, and formerly the capital of Croesus, King of the Lydians. The Church of Sardis was one of the seven churches of Asia, to which the writer of the Apocalypse was directed to send an epistle. Rev. iii. 1-3. [Sardis was situated fifty miles north-east of Smyrna, at the northern slope of Mount Tmolus. The Pactolus flowed through it. After the conquest of Lydia by Cyrus, the Persian satrap resided there, as the chief city in that part of Asia. The burning of it by the Greeks led to the war between them and the Persians. After it fell to the Romans, it declined. It was destroyed by an earthquake in the time of Tiberius, but was afterward rebuilt. Sart, as the modern place is called, consists of a few miserable cottages in the midst of sepulchral hillocks, and ruins of the stadium, theatre, acropolis, churches, etc. In 1811, the Christians of Sart built a little church within sight of the ancient city, in which the Turkish governor would not allow them to build one. The congregation consisted of about forty, seven of whom, "a few names," resided in Sardis, the rest in the vicinity.]

SARDIUS, סַרְדִּיּוֹס, so called from its redness, Exod. xxviii. 17; xxxix. 10: Ezek. xxviii. 13: σάρδιος, Rev. xxi. 20: a precious stone of a blood-red color. It took its Greek name from Sardis, where the best of them were found. [In Rev. iv. 3, it is called σάρδιος, "a sardine stone." Some derive the name from Sardinia, where, they say, the best sardines, or carnelians, are found.]

SARDONYX, σαρδόνυξ. Rev. xxi. 20. A precious stone which seems to have its name from its resemblance partly to the sardius and partly to the onyx. It is generally tinged with black and blood color, which are distinguished from each other by circles or rows, so distinct that they appear to be the effect of art.

[SAREPTA. See ZAREPHATH.]

[SARGON. The name of an Assyrian king, occurring only in Isa. xx. 1. Some think he was Esar-haddon. By comparing 2 Kings xviii. 13, 17, Lowth, Rollin, and others were led to identify Sargon with Sennacherib. Vitranga and others make him Shalmaneser, the predecessor of Sennacherib. 2 Kings xvii.; xviii. 9-12. Rosenmüller places him between these two. Dr. Hincks first thought he was the father of Shalmaneser, but afterward conjectured that he might be Shalmaneser's successor. It appears from the inscriptions at Nineveh, that the father of the king who built the palace of Kouyunjik was the founder of the palace at Khorsabad. The Kouyunjik king was Sennacherib; hence the Khorsabad king must be Shalmaneser. Layard says the name of the Khorsabad king was generally admitted to be Sargon, even before his relationship to the Kouyunjik king was known. Col. Rawlinson (who reads the name "Sargina") states, that this king bears in other inscriptions the name of Shalmaneser, by which he was better known to the Jews. Layard says there are events mentioned in the inscriptions at Khorsabad which lead to the identification of its founder with the Shalmaneser of Scripture, and the ruins of the palace itself were known even at the time of the Arab conquest by the name of "Sarghun." One of the inscriptions states that he carried into captivity twenty-seven thousand two hundred and eighty Israelites from Samaria and the adjoining district. There is no proof that the Tartan of Sargon, Isa. xx. 1, was identical with the Tartan of Sennacherib, 2 Kings xviii. 17, as Tartan, according to the inscriptions, was the common title of the commanders of the Assyrian armies.]

[SARON. Acts ix. 35. See SHARON.]

SATAN signifies an adversary or enemy, and is commonly applied in the Scriptures to the devil, or the chief of the fallen angels. By collecting the passages where Satan, or the devil, is mentioned, it may be concluded that he fell from heaven with his company; that God cast him down from thence for the punishment of his pride; that by his envy and malice, sin, death, and all other evils came into the world; that, by the permission of God, he exercises a sort of government in the world over subordinate apostate angels like himself; that God makes use of him to prove good men, and chastise bad ones; that he is a lying spirit in the mouth of false prophets and seducers; that it is he, or his agents, that torment or possess men, and inspire them with evil designs, as when he suggested to David the numbering of the people, to Judas to betray his Lord and Master, and to Ananias and Sapphira to conceal the price of their field; that he is full of rage like a roaring lion, and of subtlety like a serpent, to tempt, to betray, to destroy, and involve us in guilt and wickedness; that his power and malice are restrained within certain limits, and controlled by the will of God; in a word, that he is an enemy to God and man, and uses his utmost endeavors to rob God of his glory, and men of their souls. See DEVIL and DEMONIACS.

[סָטָן, is rendered ὁ διάβολος, by the LXX., in Job i.; ii.: Zech. iii. 1. Compare Matt. iv. 8-10: Rev. xii. 9, 10. It is applied to any adversary, Num. xxii. 22: 1 Sam. xxix. 4: Matt. xvi. 23: Mark viii. 33.]

[SATYRS. שָׂעִירִים, Isa. xlii. 21; xxxiv. 14. The etymology of seirim favors the rendering of the Vulgate, Aquila, and others, hairy or shaggy ones, generally considered wild goats. Compare Gen. xxxvii. 31: Lev. xvii. 7, Heb. Of course there is no reference to the monster of Greek mythology, half man and half goat, any more than to Luther's field-ghost, the French lutin, or hobgoblin, or the monkey of the rabbins.]

[SAUL. A king of Edom. Gen. xxxiii. 37, 38.]

SAUL, the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, the first king of the Israelites, 1 Sam. ix. 1, 2, etc. Saul's fruitless journey when seeking his father's asses; (see ASS;) his meeting the prophet Samuel; the particulars foretold to him, with his being anointed as king, about A. M. 2909; his prophesying along with the young prophets; his appointment by the lot; his modesty in hiding himself; his first victory over the Ammonites; his rash sacrifice in the absence of Samuel; his equally rash curse; his victories over the Philistines and Amalekites; his sparing of King Agag, with the judgment denounced against him for it; his jealousy and persecution of David; his barbarous massacre of the priests and people of Nob; his repeated confessions of his injustice to David, etc., are recorded in 1 Sam. ix.-xxxi. He reigned forty years, but exhibited to posterity a melancholy example of a monarch elevated to the summit of worldly grandeur, who, having cast off the fear of God, gradually became the slave of jealousy, duplicity, treachery, and the most malignant and diabolical tempers. His behavior toward David shows him to have been destitute of every generous and noble sentiment that can dignify human nature; and it is not an easy task to speak with any moderation of the atrocity and baseness which uniformly mark it. His character is that of a wicked man, "waxing worse and worse;" but while we are shocked at its deformity, it should be our study to profit by it, which we can only do by using it as a beacon to warn us, "lest we also be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin."

[SAUL. The Hebrew name of the Apostle Paul. He is not called by it anywhere except in the Acts, and not there till after the conversion of Sergius Paulus, which led Jerome to suggest that as Scipio was called Africanus from the conquest of Africa, so Saul was called Paul from the conversion of the proconsul Paulus. Acts xiii. 7-12. It is likely, however, that Paul was his original Cilician name. Conybeare and Howson are "inclined to conjecture that the appellation came from some connection of his ancestors (perhaps as manumitted slaves) with some member of the Roman family of the Æmilian Pauli." When he went to Jerusalem to receive his education, he seems to have adopted the Jewish name, Saul, from its rhyming with Paul, agreeably to a custom which, as Grotius shows, was common among the ancients. See PAUL.]

[SAVIOUR. This term is applied to God, from whom comes all salvation, Hos. xiii. 4; and, in a subordinate sense, to men who achieve deliverances for others from temporal or spiritual evils. Neh. x. 27: Obadiah 21. Compare 1 Tim. iv. 16: James v. 20. It is applied emphatically to Christ. See JESUS.]

[SCANDAL. See OFFENCE.]

SCARLET, שָׁרִית, Gen. xxxviii. 28: Exod. xxv. 4. This tincture or color, expressed by a word which signifies worm-color, was produced from a worm or insect which grew in a coccus, or excrescence of a shrub of the ilex kind, which Pliny calls "coccus scolicus," the wormy berry, and Dioscorides terms "a small dry twig, to which the grains adhere like lentiles;" but these grains, as a great author observes on Solinus, "are, within, full of little worms or maggots, whose juice is remarkable for dying scarlet, and making that famous color which we admire, and with which the ancients were enraptured." We retain the name in the cochineal, from the opuntia of America; but we improperly call a mineral color "vermilion," which is derived from vermiculus, a little worm. The shrub on which the cochineal insect is found is sometimes called the "kermes oak," from kermes, the Arabic word both for the worm and the color; whence "carmasinus," the French "cramoisi," and the English "crimson."

[Shani, rendered scarlet in our version of Gen. xxxviii. 28-30: Isa. i. 18, and crimson in Jer. iv. 80, means double-dyed, and is so rendered by the LXX., Vulgate, and others. Horace and Pliny speak of African and Tyrian purple double-dyed. Shani is joined with tolath, coming after it, Exod. xxv. 4, xxxvi. 8, and before it, Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 49: shani tolath may mean, double-dyed worm-color, and tolath shani, worm-color double-dyed. Tola is rendered scarlet in Lam. iv. 5; but crimson in Isa. i. 18: compare Nahum ii. 3; (4, Heb.) See CRIMSON and PURPLE.]

SCEPTRE, a word derived from the Greek, properly signifies, a rod of command, a staff of authority, which is supposed to be in the hands of kings, governors of a province; or of the chief of a people. Gen. xlix. 10: Num. xxiv. 17: Isa. xiv. 5. The sceptre is put for the rod of correction, and for the sovereign authority that punishes and humbles, Psalm ii. 9: Prov. xxii. 15. The term sceptre is frequently used for a tribe, probably because the prince of each tribe carried a sceptre, or a wand of command, to show his dignity.

SCEVA, a Jew, and chief of the priests. Acts xix. 14, 15, 16. He was probably a person of authority in the synagogue at Ephesus, and had seven sons. [Olshausen thinks he was chief rabbi of the Ephesian Jews: others think he had been high-priest at Jerusalem, or chief of one of the twenty-four sacerdotal courses. He is not called a Jew in the Codex Bezae, but "a certain priest."]

SCHISM, from σχίσμα, a rent or fissure. In its general meaning, it signifies division or separation; and in particular, on account of religion. Schism is properly a division among those who stand in one connection or fellowship; but when the difference is carried so far that the parties concerned entirely break off all communion and intercourse one with another, and form distinct connections for obtaining the general ends of that religious fellowship which they once cultivated, it is undeniable there is something different from the schism spoken of in the New Testament. This is a separation from the body. Dr. Campbell shows that the word schism in Scripture does not usually signify an open separation, but that men may be guilty of schism by such an alienation of affection from their brethren as violates the internal union in the hearts of Christians, though there be no error in doctrine, nor separation from communion.

[SCHOOL. Σχολή, meaning freedom from labor, is applied to a place where persons free from other engagements have leisure for study. "The school of one Tyrannus," Acts xix. 9, in which Paul preached at Ephesus, does not appear to have been a synagogue, the usual place for Jewish schools. See SYNAGOGUE. The early Christians, whose churches were organized on the model of the synagogues, imitated the Jews in this matter. The sixth general council at Constantinople directed presbyters to establish schools in all towns and villages. They were generally held in the vestries and catechumenia.]

[SCHOOLMASTER. Παιδαγωγός, 1 Cor. iv. 15: Gal. iii. 24, 25, is generally supposed to mean the tutor, magister, who, in an opulent Greek family, had charge of the children between the seventh and fourteenth years of their age, their previous training having been conducted by females. The pedagogue guarded them from evil, accompanied them to the gymnasium, and was held responsible for their conduct. The παιδονόμοι and διδασκαλοὶ formed their morals and instructed them in learning. When Paul says "the law was our pedagogue unto or until, εἰς, Christ," the reference is supposed to be to the severe discipline of the Mosaic dispensation, as the pedagogue, or magister, who was generally a slave, was usually rigorous in the exercise of his brief authority. The law, both moral and ceremonial, conducted us to Christ; the one showing our need of him, and the other typifying his great atonement. But as the pedagogue did teach the children many things, being a tutor, though of a subordinate grade, the reference may be to the elementary training of the law which, succeeding the primary tuition of the patriarchal dispensation, continued until "the fulness of the time was come," when the pupils were placed under the great Teacher himself. This construction agrees with the context, Gal. iv. 1-9.]

[SCHOOLMEN. Divines of the middle ages, so called from the cathedral schools where they lectured. The origin of the scholastic theology is variously attributed to Lanfranc, Abélard, Roscelinus, and Lombard. The most renowned of the schoolmen were Albertus Magnus, Bonaventura, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, William Ockham, and Durandus. Their theology consisted principally of digests of patristic opinions, explained by Aristotelian logic. Some of them maintained that all human knowledge may be spiritualized by allegory and analogy, and transferred to theology. They waged fierce controversies on the metaphysical points connected with Realism and Nominalism.]

[SCHWENKFELDIANS. Followers of Gaspar Schwenkfeldt, a Silesian knight of the sixteenth century. He would not call Christ's glorified humanity a creature—denied that there is any saving power in the written word, but affirmed that it is in the internal word, which is Christ—and inverted the words, "This is my body," etc., thus: "My body is this," "My blood is this;" viz., a real food, nourishing and refreshing like bread and wine.]

[SCIENTIA MEDIA. See PRESCIENCE.]

SCORPION, סַּרְפָּן, Deut. viii. 15: 1 Kings xii. 11, 14: 2 Chron. x. 11, 14: Ezek. ii. 6: σκορπίος, Luke x. 19; xi. 12: Rev. ix. 3: Ecclus. xxvi. 7; xxxix. 30. Parkhurst derives the name from סָק, to press, squeeze, and רַב, much, greatly, or קָרַב, near, close. Calmet remarks, that "it fixes so violently on such persons as it seizes upon, that it cannot be plucked off without difficulty;" and Martinus declares: Habent scorpii forfices seu furcas tanquam brachia, quibus retinent quod apprehendunt, postquam caudæ aculeo punxerunt: "Scorpions have pincers or nippers, with which they keep hold of what they seize, after they have wounded it with their sting."

The scorpion, el-akerb, is generally two inches in length, and resembles so much the lobster in form, that the latter is called by the Arabs akerb d'elbahar, the "sea scorpion." It has several joints or divisions in its tail, which are supposed to be indicative of its age; thus, if it have five, it is considered to be five years old. The poison of this animal is in its tail, at the end of which is a small, curved, sharp-pointed sting, similar to the prickle of a buckthorn tree; the curve being downward, it turns its tail upward when it strikes a blow. The scorpion delights in stony places and in old ruins. Some are of a yellow color, others brown, and some black. The yellow possess the strongest poison, but the venom of each affects the part wounded with frigidity, which takes place soon after the sting has been inflicted. Dioscorides thus describes the effect produced: "Where the scorpion has stung, the place becomes inflamed and hardened; it reddens by tension, and is painful by intervals, being now chilly, now burning. The pain soon rises high, and rages, sometimes more, sometimes less. A sweating succeeds, attended by a shivering and trembling; the extremities of the body become cold; the groin swells; the hair stands on end; the visage becomes pale; and the skin feels, throughout it, the sensation of perpetual pricking, as if by needles." This description strikingly illustrates Revelation ix. 3-5, 10, in its mention of "the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man."

Some writers consider the scorpion as a species of serpent, because the poison of it is equally powerful: so the sacred writers commonly join the scorpion and serpent together in their descriptions. Thus Moses, in his farewell address to Israel, Deut. viii. 15, reminds them that God "led them through the great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents and scorpions." We find them again united in the commission of our Lord to his disciples, Luke x. 19, "I give you power to tread upon serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy;" and in his directions concerning the duty of prayer, Luke xi. 11, 12, "If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion?"

The scorpion is contrasted with an egg, on account of the oval shape of its body. The body of the scorpion, says Lamy, is very like an egg, as its head can scarcely be distinguished; especially if it be a scorpion of the white kind, which is the first species mentioned by Ælian, Avicenna, and others. Bochart has produced testimonies to prove that the scorpions in Judea were about the bigness of an egg. So the similitude is preserved between the thing asked and given. The Greeks have a proverb, ἀντὶ πέρας σκορπίου: instead of a perch, or fish, a scorpion.

[SCOTISTS. Followers of John Scotus, a Franciscan friar, called Duns, from Dunstance, Northumberland, where he was born. He studied at Oxford, became head of the schools at the University of Paris, and died at Cologne about 1305. He differed from Aquinas, the angelical doctor, on the irresistibility of grace, personal identity, and other points. He defended the immaculate conception of the Virgin. His writings make twelve folio volumes. His subtilty in disputation procured him the title of the subtille doctor.]

[SCOTLAND, FREE CHURCH OF. This Church originated in 1843, in a secession from the established kirk, which took place on the principle that the authority of civil courts to suspend the powers of ecclesiastical judicatories is inconsistent with spiritual liberty and the Presbyterian polity. Dr. Hetherington, tracing the steps which led to the disruption, in his History of the Church of Scotland, says, "Kirk-sessions and presbyteries had been prevented from exercising discipline, as in the case of the parish of Inverkeillor, and presbytery of Arbroath. The court of session had assumed the power of determining who were or were not to be rulers and office-bearers, as ministers and elders in the possession of all their due functions, preventing the Church from extending religious instruction to the people, and destroying the principle of Presbyterian equality of ministers, as in the case of Stewarton, affecting all quoad sacra parishes. It had been decided that the minority of a presbytery might supersede the majority, though fewer than the legal number required to constitute a presbytery at all, and might, in defiance of the orders of every superior church court, transact business, and give license, induction, and ordination, as in the case of Auchterarder. The court of session had assumed and exercised the power of removing the sentence of deposition, and restoring deposed persons to their ecclesiastical character as in the case of Strathbogie. Damages had been found due to a rejected presentee, against the majority of a presbytery, because they refused to ordain him, although he was in possession of the fruits of the benefice, and the civil court had empowered the minority to confer ordination as in the case of Leithendy. And, as if to complete the utter prostration of religious liberty, the court of session first interdicted the church courts from ordaining ministers on the call of the people, where no civil interests of other parties could possibly be involved, as in the cases of Marnoch and Stewarton, and then inflicted a fine upon those who had, in a matter so purely and exclusively spiritual, dared to obey God rather than man. And both government and the legislature had distinctly and peremptorily refused to redress these grievous wrongs, to restrain the civil courts within their own proper jurisdiction, and to protect the Church of Scotland from being again exposed to similar violent encroachments upon those sacred rights and privileges which God has given to his Church." A convocation had been held to provide for the exigency, and immediately after the opening of the General Assembly, May 18, 1843, Dr. Walch read the protest of the seceding party, and withdrew, followed by the protesting ministers, to Tanfield Hall, where the First General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland was organized, Dr. Chalmers being chosen moderator. On the twenty-third of May the Act of Separation and Deed of Demission was read and signed by three hundred and eighty-six ministers, together with one elder from each kirk session, which number was afterward largely increased. They did not secede from the national kirk because they were opposed to the right of patronage and the union of Church and State. Dr. Chalmers had contended earnestly for the principle of a Church establishment, and never abandoned his original ground. In a letter to Professor Sedwick, he says, "The Free Church of Scotland is probably doing more at this moment for the establishment principle than any other Church or community of Christians in the world. We have gone out on the establishment principle, and are so giving that principle all the weight of a disinterested testimony; and are at this moment, I believe, giving, in consequence, the utmost disappointment and offence to many of the voluntaries. Had we remained in and swallowed all the humiliations which the civil power have laid and are still laying on the skeleton establishment of Scotland, the principle of establishments would have been thoroughly brought into utter scorn and contempt, and the triumph of voluntarism would have been complete." Since the disruption the Free Church has displayed an almost unparalleled zeal and liberality in the erection of churches and manse, in the prosecution of missionary enterprises, and in the establishment of literary and theological institutions.]

SCOURGE, or WHIP. This punishment was very common among the Jews. Deut. xxv. 1-3. There were two ways of giving the lash: one with thongs, or whips, made of ropes' ends, or straps of leather; the other with rods, or twigs. St. Paul informs us, that at five different times he received thirty-nine stripes from the Jews, 2 Cor. xi. 24, namely, in their synagogues, and before their courts of judgment. For, according to the law, punishment by stripes was restricted to forty at one beating. Deut. xxv. 3. But the whip, with which these stripes were given, consisting of three separate cords, and each stroke being accounted as three stripes, thirteen strokes made thirty-nine stripes, beyond which they never went. He adds, that he had been thrice beaten with rods, namely, by the Roman lictors, or beadles, at the command of the superior magistrates.

SCRIBES. The scribes are mentioned very early in the sacred history, and many authors suppose that they were of two descriptions, the one ecclesiastical, the other civil. It is said, "Out of Zebulon come they that handle the pen of the writer," Judges v. 14; and the rabbins state that the scribes were chiefly of the tribe of Simeon; but it is thought that only those of the tribe of Levi were allowed to transcribe the Holy Scriptures. These scribes are very frequently called wise men and counsellors; and those of them who were remarkable for writing well were held in great esteem. In the reign of David, Seraiah, 2 Sam. viii. 17, in the reign of Hezekiah, Shebna, 2 Kings xviii. 18, and in the reign of Josiah, Shaphan, 2 Kings xxii. 3, are called scribes, and are ranked with the chief officers of the kingdom; and Elishama the scribe, Jer. xxxvi. 12, in the reign of Jehoiakim, is mentioned among the princes. We read also of the "principal scribe of the host," or army, Jer. lli. 25; and it is probable that there were scribes in other departments of the state. Previous to the Babylonian captivity, the word scribe seems to have been applied to any person who was concerned in writing, in the same manner as the word secretary is with us. The civil scribes are not mentioned in the New Testament.

It appears that the office of the ecclesiastical scribes, if this distinction be allowed, was originally confined to writing copies of the law, as their name imports; but the knowledge, thus necessarily acquired, soon led them to become instructors of the people in the written law, which, it is believed, they publicly read. Baruch was an amanuensis or scribe to Jeremiah; and Ezra is called "a ready scribe in the law of Moses, having prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments," Ezra vii. 6, 10; but there is no mention of the scribes being formed into a distinct body of men till after the cessation of prophecy. When, however, there were no inspired teachers in Israel, no Divine oracle in the temple, the scribes presumed to interpret, expound, and comment upon the law and the prophets in the schools and in the synagogues. Hence arose those numberless glosses, and interpretations, and opinions, which so much perplexed and perverted the text instead of explaining it; and hence arose that unauthorized maxim, which was the principal source of all the Jewish sects, that the oral or traditionary law was of Divine origin, as well as the written law of Moses. Ezra had examined the various traditions concerning the ancient and approved usages of the Jewish Church, which had been in practice before the captivity, and were remembered by the chief and most aged of the elders of the people; and he had given to some of these traditionary customs and opinions the sanction of his authority. The scribes, therefore, who lived after the time of Simon the Just, in order to give weight to their various interpretations of the law, at first pretended that they also were founded upon tradition, and added them to the opinions which Ezra had established as authentic; and in process of time it came to be asserted, that when Moses was forty days on Mount Sinai, he received from God two laws, the one in writing, the other oral; that this oral law was communicated by Moses to Aaron and Joshua, and that it passed unimpaired and uncorrupted from generation to generation, by the tradition of the elders, or great national council, established in the time of Moses; and that this oral law was to be considered as supplemental and explanatory of the written law, which was represented as being in many places obscure, scanty, and defective. In some cases they were led to expound the law by the traditions, in direct opposition to its true intent and meaning; and it may be supposed that the intercourse of the Jews with the Greeks, after the death of Alexander, contributed much to increase those vain subtleties with which they had perplexed and burdened the doctrines of religion. During our Saviour's ministry, the scribes were those who made the law of Moses their particular study, and who were employed in instructing the people. Their reputed skill in the Scriptures induced Herod, Matt. ii. 4, to consult them concerning the time at which the Messiah was to be born. And our Saviour speaks of them as sitting in Moses's seat, Matt. xxiii. 2, which implies that they taught the law; and he foretold that he should be betrayed unto the chief priests and unto the scribes, Matt. xvi. 21, and that they should put him to death, which shows that they were men of great power and authority among the Jews. Scribes, doctors of law, and lawyers, were only different names for the same class of persons. Those who in Luke v. are called Pharisees and doctors of the law, are soon afterward called Pharisees and scribes; and he who in Matt. xxii. 35 is called a lawyer, is in Mark xii. 28 called one of the scribes. They had scholars under their care, whom they taught the knowledge of the law, and who, in their schools, sat on low stools just beneath their seats; which explains St. Paul's expression that he was "brought up at the feet of Gamaliel." Acts xxii. 3. We find that our Saviour's manner of teaching was contrasted with that of those vain disputers; for it is said, when he had ended his sermon upon the mount, "the people were astonished at his doctrine; for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes." Matt. vii. 29. By the time of our Saviour, the scribes had, indeed, in a manner laid aside the written law, having no further regard to that than as it agreed with their traditionary expositions of it; and thus, by their additions, corruptions, and misinterpretations, they had made "the word of God of none effect through their traditions." Matt. xv. 6. It may be observed, that this in a great measure accounts for the extreme blindness of the Jews with respect to their Messiah, whom they had been taught by these commentators upon the prophecies to expect as a temporal prince. Thus, when our Saviour asserts his Divine nature, and appeals to "Moses and the prophets who spake of him, the people sought to slay him," John v.; and he expresses no surprise at their intention. But when he converses with Nicodemus, John iii., who appears to have been convinced by his miracles that he was "a teacher sent from God," when he "came to Jesus by night," anxious to obtain further information concerning his nature and his doctrine, our Lord, after intimating the necessity of laying aside all prejudices against the spiritual nature of his kingdom, asks, "Art thou a master in Israel, and knowest not these things?"—that is, knowest not that Moses and the prophets describe the Messiah as the Son of God?—and he then proceeds to explain in very clear language the dignity of his person and office, and the purpose for which he came into the world, referring to the predictions of the ancient Scriptures. And Stephen, Acts vii., just before his death, addresses the multitude by an appeal to the law and the prophets, and reprobates in the most severe terms the teachers who misled the people. Our Lord, when speaking of "them of old time," classed the "prophets, and wise men, and scribes," together, Matt. xxiii. 34; but of the later scribes he uniformly speaks with censure and indignation, and usually joins them with the Pharisees, to which sect they in general belonged. St. Paul asks, 1 Cor. i. 20, "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?" with evident contempt for such as, "professing themselves wise above what was written, became fools."

SCRIPTURE, a term most commonly used to denote the writings of the Old and New Testaments, which are sometimes called the Scriptures, sometimes the sacred or holy writings, and sometimes canonical Scripture. See BIBLE [and LESSONS.]

SEA. The Hebrews gave the name of sea to all great collections of water, to great lakes or pools. Thus the Sea of Galilee, or of Tiberias, or of Cinnereth, is no other than the Lake of Tiberias, or Gennesaret, in Galilee. The Dead Sea, the Sea of the Wilderness, the Sea of the East, the Sea of Sodom, the Sea of Salt, or the Salt Sea, the Sea of Asphaltites, or of bitumen, is no other than the Lake of Sodom. The Arabians, and orientals in general, frequently gave the name of sea to great rivers, as the Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, and others, which, by their magnitude, and by the extent of their overflowings, seemed as little seas, or great lakes. In Isa. xi. 15, these words particularly apply to the Nile at the Delta.

SEAL. The ancient Hebrews wore their seals or signets in rings on their fingers, or in bracelets on their arms, as is now the custom in the east. Haman sealed the decree of King Ahasuerus against the Jews with the king's seal. Esther iii. 12. The priests of Bel desired the king to seal the door of their temple with his own seal. The spouse in the Canticles, viii. 6, wishes that his spouse would wear him as a signet on her arm. Pliny observes, that the use of seals or signets was rare at the time of the Trojan war, and that they were under the necessity of closing their letters with several knots. But among the Hebrews they are much more ancient. Judah left his seal as a pledge with Tamar. Gen. xxxviii. 25. Moses says, Deut. xxxii. 34, that God keeps sealed up in his treasures, under his own seal, the instruments of his vengeance. Job says, ix. 7, that he keeps the stars as under his seal, and allows them to appear when he thinks proper. He says also, "My transgression is sealed up in a bag." Job xiv. 7. When they intended to seal up a letter, or a book, they wrapped it round with flax, or thread, then applied the wax to it, and afterward the seal. The Lord commanded Isaiah to tie up or wrap up the book in which his prophecies were written, and to seal them till the time he should bid him publish them. Isa. viii. 16, 17. He gives the same command to Daniel, xii. 4. The book that was shown to St. John the evangelist, Rev. v. 1; vi. 1, 2, etc., was sealed with seven seals. It was a rare thing to affix such a number of seals, but this insinuated the great importance and secrecy of the matter. In civil contracts they generally made two originals: one continued open, and was kept by him for whose interest the contract was made; the other was sealed, and deposited in some public office. [To seal, John iii. 33, means to vouch or attest; John vi. 27, to confirm, authorize, or commission; 2 Cor. i. 22: Eph. i. 13; iv. 30: Rev. vii. 3, to ascertain, appropriate, secure; Rev. x. 4; xxii. 10, to keep secret. The early Christians called baptism the seal, because it designated the subject as the property of God.]

[SEBA. שֶׁבַּא, Gen. x. 7: 1 Chron. i. 9: Psalm lxxii. 10: Isa. xliii. 3; xlv. 14: Ezek. xxiii. 42, is not the same name as Sheba, Gen. x. 7, 28; xxv. 3: 1 Kings x. 1: 1 Chron. i. 9, 22, 32: Job i. 15: vi. 19: Psalm lxxii. 10, 15: Isa. lx. 6: Jer. vi. 20: Ezek. xxvii. 22, 23; xxxviii. 13: Joel iii. 8; (iv. 8, Heb.) the word in all these passages is שֶׁבַּא. Some think the descendants of Seba, the eldest son of Cush, settled the peninsula formed by the Astapus and Astaboras, now a part of Nubia. Josephus says that the city Saba, on that peninsula, was called Meroë, by Cambyses, in honor of his sister. Numerous remains of pyramids, tombs, temples of Jupiter and Bacchus, who, according to Herodotus, were worshipped there, etc., attest the former magnificence of the place. Jerome and others locate Seba in Arabia Felix. See SABAENS and SHEBA.]

[SE-BAPTISTS. Self-baptizers: followers of John Smith of England, in the seventeenth century, who held that every one may baptize himself. There are a few Se-baptists in Russia.]

[SEBAT. The fifth month of the civil, and eleventh of the ecclesiastical year, answering to January and February. Zech. i. 7.]

SECEDERS, a numerous body of Presbyterians in Scotland, who, in the last century, seceded from the Scotch establishment. They did not, as they have uniformly declared, secede from the principles of the Church of Scotland, as they are represented in her confession of faith, catechisms, longer and shorter, directory for worship, and form of Presbyterian government; but only from her present judicatories, which, they suppose, have departed from her true principles. A sermon preached by Mr. Ebenezer Erskine, of Sterling, at the opening of the synod of Perth and Sterling, in 1732, gave rise to this party. In this discourse, founded on Psalm cxviii. 22, "The stone which the builders refused," etc., he boldly testified against what he supposed corruptions in the national Church, for which freedom the synod voted him censurable, and ordered him to be rebuked at their bar. He and three other ministers protested against this sentence, and appealed to the next assembly. The assembly, which met in May, 1733, approved of the proceedings of the synod, and ordered Mr. Erskine to be rebuked at their bar. He refused to submit to the rebuke; whence he and his brethren were, by the sentence of the assembly, suspended from the ministry. Against this he and his friends protested; and, being joined by many others, both ministers and elders, declaring their secession from the national Church, they did, in 1736, constitute themselves into an ecclesiastical court, which they called the Associate Presbytery, and published a defence of their proceedings. They admit that the people have a right to choose their own pastors; that the Scriptures are the supreme judge by which all controversies must be determined; and that Jesus Christ is the only Head of his Church, and the only King in Zion.

In 1745 the seceding ministers were become so numerous, that they were erected into three different presbyteries under one synod. In 1747, through a difference in civil matters, they were divided into Burghers and Anti-Burghers. Of these two classes, the latter were the most rigid in their sentiments, and associated, therefore, the least with any other body of Christians. But this difference has been lately healed, and no longer subsists, either in Scotland or America.

[In 1822 the Burghers and Anti-Burghers united, under the title of the "United Associate Synod," or "United Secession Church." In 1847 this body united with the "Relief Synod," under the title of the "United Presbyterian Church." About A. D. 1750, some Scotch emigrants in Pennsylvania sent a petition to the Anti-Burgher Synod in Scotland, praying for ministers; and in 1753 or 1754 two were sent over, who organized a presbytery in the eastern part of that State. In 1801 they had increased to four presbyteries, which were that year formed into the "Associate Synod of North America." In 1855 they had twenty presbyteries, one hundred and sixty-four ministers, twenty-one licentiates, thirty-five candidates, and twenty-one thousand five hundred and eighty-eight members. They have a theological school at Xenia, Ohio.—As early as 1752 some congregations of Cameronians, or Covenanters, had been formed in North America; and in 1798, the "Reformed Presbytery of the United States of North America" was constituted in Philadelphia. In 1807 they published their "Testimony," setting forth their principles, and particularly their protest against the Constitution of the United States, because of its recognition of slavery, and non-recognition of Christianity. About 1830 some of their leading men began to advocate the propriety of acknowledging the government of the country, etc., which led to what was called the "New Light Controversy," and resulted in the division of the Church into two parts, nearly equal. Both synods together number thirteen presbyteries, one hundred and eight ministers, fifteen licentiates, twenty-five candidates, and about fourteen thousand members. The old synod has a theological seminary at Alleghany, Pa.—In 1782 some of the Associate and Reformed Presbyterians united and organized the "Associate Reformed Church," which numbered, in 1855, five synods, thirty-four presbyteries; three hundred and fifteen ministers, thirty licentiates, sixty candidates, and about forty thousand members. They have seminaries at Newburgh, N. Y., Alleghany, Pa., Oxford, Ohio, and Due West, S. C. All the Seceders use Rous's version of the Psalms, thinking it unlawful to use human compositions in praising God: they continue the custom of holding fasts before, and thanksgivings after, administering the Lord's Supper, and in observing that ordinance they sit around a table, and do not allow Christians of other denominations to commune with them. The Associate Reformed and one synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church unite with the Old School Presbyterians in the support of foreign missions. Many of the Presbyterians in Nova Scotia, Canada, and other colonies, belong to the various secession Churches.]

[SECT. A religious system, or the party holding it. This seems to be the meaning of αἵρεσις, in Acts v. 17; xv. 5; xxiv. 5, 14; xxvi. 5; xxviii. 22: it appears to be used in a bad sense, as designating a schismatical faction, in 1 Cor. xi. 19: Gal. v. 20: 2 Pet. ii. 1: compare Titus iii. 10. SEEING. To see, in Scripture, is often used to express the sense of vision, knowledge of spiritual things, and even the supernatural knowledge of hidden things, of prophecy, of visions, of ecstasies. Whence it is that formerly those were called seers who afterward were termed nabi, or prophets; and that prophecies were called visions. Moreover, to see, is used for expressing all kinds of sensations. It is said in Exodus xx. 18 that the Israelites saw voices, thunder, lightning, the sounding of the trumpet, and the whole mountain of Sinai covered with clouds, or smoke. And St. Austin observes, that the verb, to see, is applied to all the five natural senses—to see, to hear, to smell, to taste, to touch. "To see goodness," is to enjoy it. "To see the goodness of the Lord," Psalm xxvii. 13; that is, to enjoy the mercy or blessing which God hath promised. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God;" that is, they shall have the perfect and immediate fruition of the glorious presence of God in heaven; or they shall understand the mysteries of salvation; they shall perceive the loving-kindness of God toward them in this life, and shall at length perfectly enjoy him in heaven.

SEIR, the Horite, whose dwelling was to the east and south of the Dead Sea, in the mountains of Seir, Gen. xiv. 6; xxxvi. 20: Deut. ii. 12; where at first reigned the descendants of Seir the Horite, of whom Moses gives us a list in Genesis xxxvi. 20, 21–30: 1 Chron. i. 38, 39, etc. The posterity of Esau afterward were in possession of the mountains of Seir, and Esau himself dwelt there when Jacob returned from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxiii. 3; xxxiii. 14; xxxvi. 8, 9.

SEIR, MOUNT, a mountainous tract extending from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Acaba, or Ezion-geber. The whole of this tract was probably before called Mount Hor, and was inhabited by the Horites, the descendants, as it is thought, of Hor, who is no otherwise known, and whose name is now only retained in that part of the plain where Aaron died. These people were driven out from their country by the Edomites, or the children of Esau, who dwelt there in their stead, and were in possession of this region when the Israelites passed by in their passage from Egypt to the land of Canaan. The country had, however, been previously overrun, and no doubt very much depopulated, by the invasion of Chedorlaomer, King of Elam. At what time the name of Hor was changed to that of Seir, cannot be ascertained. Mount Seir rises abruptly on its western side from the valleys of El Ghor and El Araba; presenting an impregnable front to the strong country of the Edomite mountaineers, which compelled the Israelites, who were unable (if permitted by their leader) to force a passage through this mountain barrier, to skirt its western base, along the great valley of the Ghor and Araba, and so to "compass the land of Edom by the way of the Red Sea;" that is, to descend to its southern extremity at Ezion-geber, as they could not penetrate it higher up. To the southward of this place Burckhardt observed an opening in the mountains, where he supposed the Israelites to have passed. This passage brought them into the high plains on the east of Mount Seir, which are so much higher than the valley on the west, that the mountainous territory of the Edomites was everywhere more accessible; a circumstance which, perhaps, contributed to make them more afraid of the Israelites on this border, whom they had set at defiance on the opposite one. The mean elevation of this chain cannot be estimated at less than four thousand feet. In the summer it produces most of the European fruits, namely, apricots, figs, pomegranates, apples, olives, and peaches; while in winter deep snows occasionally fall, with frosts to the middle of March. The inhabitants, like those of most mountainous regions, are very healthy. Burckhardt says that there was no part of Syria in which he saw so few invalids; a circumstance which did not escape the observation of the ancients, who denominated it Palestina tertia sive salutaris. [Palestine the third, or the healthy. See EDM.—There was also a Mount Seir in Judah, west of Jerusalem. Josh. xv. 10.]

[SELA, SELAH. סֶלָה. In 2 Kings xiv. 7, it is said that Amaziah "slew of Edom in the valley of salt ten thousand, and took Sela by war, and called the name of it Joktheel unto this day." As there was previously a Joktheel in "the tribe of Judah toward the coast of Edom southward," Josh. xv. 21, 38, this may have been the place, the original name being restored on the recovery of the city by the King of Judah. Isaiah (xvi. 1) tells Moab to "send the lamb to the ruler of the land, from Sela" to Jerusalem—

alluding apparently to the tribute in sheep formerly paid by Moab to Judah, 2 Kings iii. 4, 5. From this it would seem that at that time Sela was in the possession of the Moabites. Some identify this place with Bozrah, but it does not correspond with the Bostra of the Romans. See BEZER. Eusebius and Jerome mention a Bozrah in the mountains of Idumæa, which Robinson identifies with the Bozrah of the prophets; but he thinks he has found this Bozrah in el-Busairêh, "a village of about fifty houses, situated on a hill, on the top of which is a small castle," between Petra and Kerak. Others have identified Sela with Kerak—the Crusaders having identified Kerak with Petra, which means in Greek what Sela means in Hebrew, a rock. Compare 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12. Almost all travellers and scholars now identify Sela and Petra with the ruins of a magnificent city in Wady Mûsa. Petra was the ancient capital of Idumæa. Strabo says it was the metropolis of the Nabatheans, and was called Petra because it was shut in by rocks. Pliny says it was in a valley less than two miles in extent, surrounded by inaccessible mountains, with a stream flowing through it. Josephus speaks of it as the capital of Arabia Petraea. With Judea, of course, it came under the Roman power, and the name of Adrian appears on some of its coins, still extant. It is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome; and in the Greek ecclesiastical Notitiæ of the fifth and sixth centuries it appears as the metropolitan see of the Third Palestine. Its bishops were present at the councils of Seleucia, A. D. 359, and Jerusalem, A. D. 536. After that the see was transferred to Rabbah. It then passed out of view till the ruins of Wady Mûsa were discovered by Seetzen, in 1807, and identified by Burckhardt, in 1812, with the ancient capital of Arabia Petraea. The site corresponds with the descriptions of ancient authors. It is near Mount Hor, where Aaron died; and Josephus, Eusebius, and Jerome say that this was near Petra. Since the days of Burckhardt, it has been visited by Irby and Mangles, Laborde, Linant, Stephens, Robinson, Olin, and other travellers. They describe these ruins as wonderful remains of a magnificent city. They are in Wady Mûsa, (the Valley of Moses,) in the district Djebel Shera, (Seir,) two long days' journey north-east of Akaba, and nearly the same distance from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. The area is shut in by red sandstone rocks, of immense height, whose sides are full of excavated sepulchres: they enclose a triumphal arch, an amphitheatre, temples, mausoleums, statues, colonnades, obelisks, reservoirs, aqueducts, all of the most gigantic proportions. One magnificent building, which the Arabs call Pharaoh's house, is still standing. The remains extend through the ravines and recesses which radiate on all sides from the enclosed area, and the excavations are found in the precipitous rocks, which shoot out from the principal mountains to the north and south. They were reached by steps cut in the rocks, some of them being three or four hundred feet above the level of the valley. The stream which flows through it, being frequently raised by the mountain torrents, has undermined many foundations and carried away some of the buildings in the lower part of the city. The various and exquisite colors of the rocks give them a picturesque appearance, producing a most agreeable effect. Dr. Olin appears to have been fascinated by these beautiful pencillings of nature, and pleads guilty to a charge of imprudence in attempting to portray them with his pen. His descriptions of the prodigious and impressive ruins of Petra—accompanied with pictorial illustrations—are full, minute, and satisfactory, and to them the biblical student is referred for further information. See EDM.]

SELAH. This expression is found in the Psalms seventy-four times, and thrice in the prophet Habakkuk. The interpreters Symmachus and Theodotion generally translate selah by diapsalma, which signifies “a rest” or “pause” in singing. Jerome and Aquila translate it “for ever.” Some moderns pretend that selah has no signification, and that it is only a note of the ancient music, whose use is no longer known; and, indeed, selah may be taken away from all the places where it is found without interrupting the sense of the psalm. Calmet says it intimates the end, or a pause, and that is its proper signification; but as it is not always found at the conclusion of the sense, or of the psalm or song, so it is highly probable the ancient musicians put selah in the margin of their psalters, to show where a musical pause was to be made, or where the tune ended.

[Kimchi derives it from שָׁלַח, sal, to elevate, as the voice in music. The Arabic schala means to exalt. “It was most probably,” says Parkhurst, “a note of music, or a direction to the singers to raise their voices or instruments, where it is inserted.” He thinks this view countenanced by the Διάψαλμα of the LXX., which, according to him, means “a variation in singing and melody.” Gesenius and others understand by it a pause in the singing, perhaps while the instruments played an interlude. Others think it is a da capo, or repeat, which nearly corresponds with the derivation from שָׁלַח, salah, to spread out, that is, to consider the subject—nota bene. “But,” says Dr. Donne, “to speak upon the best grounds in the grammar of that language, and upon best authority too, the word signifies a vehement, a pathological, a hyperbolical asseveration, and attestation, and ratification of something said before. Such, in a proportion, as our Saviour’s Amen, Amen, ‘Verily, verily’—St. Paul’s Fidelis sermo, ‘This is a faithful saying’—Coram Domino, ‘Before the Lord’—Vivo ego, and Vivit Dominus, ‘As I live,’ and ‘As the Lord liveth.’”]

It was situated on a rocky height, on the north side of the Bay of Antioch, twelve miles north-north-west of the mouth of the Orontes. It was a fortress as well as a seaport. It was the key of Syria, under the Seleu-cidae, the Ptolomies, and the Romans: Pompey made it a “free city,” because of its bold resistance to Tigranes. Among its remains are an immense excavation leading from the ancient city to the sea; the piers of the outer harbor, which Ali Pashaw spoke of repairing; a large part of the magnificent “gate of Antioch;” and the ruins of houses within the walls, embracing a circumference of four miles.]

SENNACHERIB, King of Assyria, son and successor of Shalmaneser. He began his reign A. M. 3290, and reigned only four years. Hezekiah, King of Judah, having refused to pay him tribute, though he afterward submitted, he invaded Judea with a great army, took several forts, and, after repeated, insolent, and blasphemous messages, besieged Jerusalem; but his army being suddenly smitten with a pestilence, which cut off a hundred and eighty-five thousand in a single night, he returned to Nineveh, where he was murdered in the temple of Nisroch by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer, and was succeeded by his other son, Esar-haddon. 2 Kings xix. 7, 13, 37.

[The name, signet, image, monuments, and palace of Sennacherib, have been found at Nineveh. His annals, as recorded on the bulls and on the walls of his palace at Kouyunjik, strikingly corroborate the scriptural account. They make him say, “Hezekiah, King of Judah, who had not submitted to my authority, forty-six of his principal cities, and fortresses, and villages depending upon them, of which I took no account, I captured and carried away their spoil. I shut up himself within Jerusalem, his capital city. The fortified towns, and the rest of his towns which I spoiled, I severed from his country, and gave to the kings of Askalon, Ekron, and Gaza, so as to make his country small. In addition to the former tribute imposed upon their countries, I added a tribute, the nature of which I fixed.” He says he took from Hezekiah the treasure he had collected in Jerusalem, thirty talents of gold and eight hundred talents of silver, the treasures of his palace, etc., and took them to Nineveh. In 2 Kings xviii. 13–16, where this event is recorded, the amount is stated at thirty talents of gold and three hundred talents of silver. Mr. Layard suggests that this sum did not embrace the silver taken from the house of the Lord, which may have swelled the gross amount to eight hundred talents. See "Discoveries among the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon," chapter vi.]

SEPTUAGINT. Among the Greek versions of the Old Testament, says Mr. Horne, the Alexandrian or Septuagint is the most ancient and valuable, and was held in so much esteem both by the Jews as well as by the first Christians, as to be constantly read in the synagogues and churches. Hence it is uniformly cited by the early fathers, whether Greek or Latin; and from this version all the translations into other languages which were anciently approved by the Christian Church were executed, with the exception of the Syriac; as the Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Gothic, and old Italic or the Latin version in use before the time of Jerome; and to this day the Septuagint is exclusively read in the Greek and most other oriental Churches. This version has derived its name either from the Jewish account of seventy-two persons having been employed to make it, or from its having received the approbation of the sanhedrim or great council of the Jews, which consisted of seventy, or, more correctly, of seventy-two persons. Much uncertainty, however, has prevailed concerning the real history of this ancient version; and while some have strenuously advocated its miraculous and Divine origin, other eminent philologists have labored to prove that it must have been executed by several persons and at different times. According to one account, Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, caused this translation to be made for the use of the library which he had founded at Alexandria, at the request and with the advice of the celebrated Demetrius Phalereus, his principal librarian. For this purpose, it is reported, that he sent Aristæas and Andreas, two distinguished officers of his court, to Jerusalem, on an embassy to Eleazar, then high-priest of the Jews, to request of the latter a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures, and that there might also be sent to him seventy-two persons, six chosen out of each of the twelve tribes, who were equally well skilled in the Hebrew and Greek languages. These learned men were accordingly shut up in the island of Pharos; where, having agreed in a translation of each period after a mutual conference, Demetrius wrote down their version as they dictated it to him; and thus, in the space of seventy-two days, the whole was accomplished. This relation is derived from a letter ascribed to Aristæas himself, the authenticity of which has been greatly disputed. If, as there is every reason to believe is the case, this piece is a forgery, it was made at a very early period; for it was in existence in the time of Josephus, who has made use of it in his Jewish Antiquities. The veracity of Aristæas's narrative was not questioned until the seventeenth or eighteenth century, at which time, indeed, biblical criticism was, comparatively, in its infancy. Vives, Scaliger, Van Dale, Dr. Prideaux, and, above all, Dr. Hody, were the principal writers in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries who attacked the genuineness of the pretended narrative of Aristæas; and though it was ably vindicated by Bishop Walton, Isaac Vossius, Whiston, Brett, and other modern writers, the majority of the learned of our own time are fully agreed in considering it as fictitious. Philo, the Jew, who also notices the Septuagint version, was ignorant of most of the circumstances narrated by Aristæas; but he relates others which appear not less extraordinary. According to him, Ptolemy Philadelphus sent to Palestine for some learned Jews, whose number he does not specify; and these, going over to the island of Pharos, there executed so many distinct versions, all of which so exactly and uniformly agreed in sense, phrases, and words, as proved them to have been not common interpreters, but men prophetically inspired and Divinely directed, who had every word dictated to them by the Spirit of God throughout the entire translation. He adds, that an annual festival was celebrated by the Alexandrian Jews in the isle of Pharos, where the version was made, until his time, to preserve the memory of it, and to thank God for so great a benefit.

It is not a little remarkable that the Samaritans have traditions in favor of their version of the Pentateuch, equally extravagant with these preserved by the Jews. In the Samaritan chronicle of Abul Phatach, which was compiled in the fourteenth century from ancient and modern authors, both Hebrew and Arabic, there is a story to the following effect: that Ptolemy Philadelphus, in the tenth year of his reign, directed his attention to the difference subsisting between the Samaritans and Jews concerning the law, the former receiving only the Pentateuch, and rejecting every other work ascribed to the prophets by the Jews. In order to determine this difference, he commanded the two nations to send deputies to Alexandria. The Jews intrusted this mission to Osar, the Samaritans to Aaron, to whom several other associates were added. Separate apartments in a particular quarter of Alexandria were assigned to each of these strangers, who were prohibited from having any personal intercourse, and each of them had a Greek scribe to write his version. Thus were the law and other Scriptures translated by the Samaritans; whose version being most carefully examined, the king was convinced that their text was more complete than that of the Jews. Such is the narrative of Abul Phatach, divested, however, of numerous marvellous cir-circumstances with which it has been decorated by the Samaritans, who are not surpassed, even by the Jews, in their partiality for idle legends.

A fact buried under such a mass of fables as the translation of the Septuagint has been by the historians who have pretended to record it, necessarily loses all its historical character, which, indeed, we are fully justified in disregarding altogether. Although there is no doubt that some truth is concealed under this load of fables, yet it is by no means an easy task to discern the truth from what is false: the following, however, is the result of our researches concerning this celebrated version:—

It is probable that the seventy interpreters, as they are called, executed their version of the Pentateuch during the joint reigns of Ptolemy Lagus and his son Philadelphus. The pseudo Aristæus, Josephus, Philo, and many other writers whom it were tedious to enumerate, relate that this version was made during the reign of Ptolemy II., or Philadelphus: Joseph Ben Gorion, however, among the rabbins, Theodoret, and many other Christian writers, refer its date to the time of Ptolemy Lagus. Now, these two traditions can be reconciled only by supposing the version to have been performed during the two years when Ptolemy Philadelphus shared the throne with his father; which date coincides with the third and fourth years of the hundred and twenty-third Olympiad, that is, about B. C. 286 and 285. Further, this version was neither made by the command of Ptolemy, nor at the request nor under the superintendence of Demetrius Phalereus; but was voluntarily undertaken by the Jews for the use of their countrymen. It is well known that, at the period above noticed, there was a great number of Jews settled in Egypt, particularly at Alexandria: these, being most strictly observant of the religious institutions and usages of their forefathers, had their sanhedrim or grand council composed of seventy or seventy-two members, and very numerous synagogues, in which the law was read to them on every Sabbath; and as the bulk of the common people were no longer acquainted with biblical Hebrew, the Greek language alone being used in their ordinary intercourse, it became necessary to translate the Pentateuch into Greek for their use. This is a far more probable account of the origin of the Alexandrian version than the traditions above stated. If this translation had been made by public authority, it would unquestionably have been performed under the direction of the sanhedrim, who would have examined and perhaps corrected it, if it had been the work of a single individual, previously to giving it the stamp of their approbation, and introducing it into their synagogues. In either case the translation would probably be denominated the Septuagint, because the sanhedrim was composed of seventy or seventy-two members. It is even possible that the sanhedrim, in order to ascertain the fidelity of the work, might have sent to Palestine for some learned men, of whose assistance and advice they would have availed themselves in examining the version. This fact, if it could be proved, for it is offered as a mere conjecture, would account for the story of the King of Egypt's sending an embassy to Jerusalem: there is, however, one circumstance which proves that, in executing this translation, the synagogues were originally in contemplation, namely, that all the ancient writers unanimously concur in saying that the Pentateuch was first translated. The five books of Moses, indeed, were the only books read in the synagogues until the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, King of Syria; who having forbidden that practice in Palestine, the Jews evaded his commands by substituting for the Pentateuch the reading of the prophetic books. When, afterward, the Jews were delivered from the tyranny of the kings of Syria, they read the law and the prophets alternately in the synagogues; and the same custom was adopted by the Hellenistic or Græcizing Jews.

But, whatever was the real number of the authors of the version, their introduction of Coptic words, such as olôl, âxi, Πευράν, etc., as well as their rendering of ideas purely Hebrew altogether in the Egyptian manner, clearly prove, that they were natives of Egypt. Thus, they express the creation of the world, not by the proper Greek word κτίσις, but by γένεσις, a term employed by the philosophers of Alexandria to express the origin of the universe. The Hebrew word thummim, Exodus xxviii. 30, which signifies "perfections," they render ἀληθεία, truth. The difference of style also indicates the version to have been the work not of one but of several translators, and to have been executed at different times. The best qualified and most able among them was the translator of the Pentateuch, who was evidently master of both Greek and Hebrew: he has religiously followed the Hebrew text, and has, in various instances, introduced the most suitable and best chosen expressions. From the very close resemblance subsisting between the text of the Greek version and the text of the Samaritan Pentateuch, Louis De Dieu, Selden, Whiston, Hassencamp, and Bauer are of opinion that the author of the Alexandrian version made it from the Samaritan Pentateuch. And in proportion as these two correspond, the Greek differs from the Hebrew. This opinion is further supported by the declarations of Origen and Jerome, that the translator found the venerable name of Jehovah, not in the letters in common use, but in very ancient characters; and also by the fact that those consonants in the Septuagint are frequently confounded together, the shapes of which are similar in the Samaritan, but not in the Hebrew alphabet. This hypothesis, however ingenious and plausible, is by no means determinate; and what militates most against it, is the inveterate enmity subsisting between the Jews and Samaritans, added to the constant and unvarying testimony of antiquity, that the Greek version of the Pentateuch was executed by Jews. There is no other way by which to reconcile these conflicting opinions than by supposing either that the manuscript used by the Egyptian Jews approximated toward the letters and text of the Samaritan Pentateuch, or that the translators of the Septuagint made use of manuscripts written in ancient characters. Next to the Pentateuch, for ability and fidelity of execution, ranks the translation of the book of Proverbs, the author of which was well skilled in the two languages. Michaelis is of opinion that, of all the books of the Septuagint, the style of the Proverbs is the best, the translator having clothed the most ingenious thoughts in as neat and elegant language as was ever used by a Pythagorean sage to express his philosophical maxims.

The Septuagint version, though originally made for the use of the Egyptian Jews, gradually acquired the highest authority among the Jews of Palestine, who were acquainted with the Greek language, and subsequently also among Christians. It appears, indeed, that the legend above confuted, of the translators having been Divinely inspired, was invented in order that the LXX. might be held in the greater estimation. Philo the Jew, a native of Egypt, has evidently followed it in his allegorical expositions of the Mosaic law; and though Dr. Hody was of opinion that Josephus, who was a native of Palestine, corroborated his work on Jewish Antiquities from the Hebrew text, yet Salmasius, Bochart, Baner, and others, have shown that he has adhered to the Septuagint throughout that work. How extensively this version was in use among the Jews appears from the solemn sanction given to it by the inspired writers of the New Testament, who have in very many passages quoted the Greek version of the Old Testament. Their example was followed by the earlier fathers and doctors of the Church, who, with the exception of Origen and Jerome, were unacquainted with the Hebrew: notwithstanding their zeal for the word of God, they did not exert themselves to learn the original language of the sacred writings, but acquiesced in the Greek representation of them, judging it, no doubt, to be fully sufficient for all the purposes of their pious labors. The Greek Scriptures were the only Scriptures known to or valued by the Greeks. This was the text commented on by Chrysostom and Theodoret; it was this which furnished topics to Athanasius, Nazianzen, and Basil. From this fountain the stream was derived to the Latin Church, first, by the Italic or Vulgate translation of the Scriptures, which was made from the Septuagint, and not from the Hebrew; and, secondly, by the study of the Greek fathers. It was by this borrowed light that the Latin fathers illumined the western hemisphere; and, when the age of Cyprian, Ambrose, Augustin, and Gregory successively passed away, this was the light put into the hands of the next dynasty of theologians, the schoolmen, who carried on the work of theological disquisition by the aid of this luminary, and none other. So that, either in Greek or in Latin, it was still the Septuagint Scriptures that were read, explained, and quoted as authority, for a period of fifteen hundred years.

SEPTUAGINT CHRONOLOGY is that which is formed from the dates and periods of time mentioned in the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament. It reckons one thousand five hundred years more from the creation to Abraham than the Hebrew Bible. Dr. Kennicott, in the dissertation prefixed to his Hebrew Bible, has shown it to be very probable that the chronology of the Hebrew Scriptures, since the period just mentioned, was corrupted by the Jews between A. D. 175 and 200; and that the chronology of the Septuagint is more agreeable to truth. It is a fact, that, during the second and third centuries, the Hebrew Scriptures were almost entirely in the hands of the Jews, while the Septuagint was confined to the Christians. The Jews had, therefore, a very favorable opportunity for this corruption. The following is the reason which is given by the oriental writers: It being a very ancient tradition that Messiah was to come in the sixth chiliad, because he was to come in the last days, founded on a mystical application of the six days of the creation, the contrivance was to shorten the age of the world from about 5500 to 3760, and thence to prove that Jesus could not be the Messiah. Dr. Kennicott adds, that some Hebrew copies having the larger chronology were extant till the time of Eusebius, and some till the year 700. [See Smith's "Patriarchal Age."]

SEPULCHRES. The descriptions of the eastern sepulchres by travellers, serve to explain several passages of Scripture. Shaw says, "If we except a few persons who are buried within the precincts of some sanctuary, the rest are carried out at a small distance from their cities and villages, where a great extent of ground is allotted for that purpose. Each family has a particular portion of it, walled in like a garden, where the bones of their ancestors have remained undisturbed for many generations; for in these enclosures the graves are all distinct and separate, having each of them a stone placed upright, both at the head and feet, inscribed with the name of the person who lieth there interred, while the intermediate space is either planted with flowers, bordered round with stone, or paved all over with tiles. The graves of the principal citizens are further distinguished by some square chambers or cupolas that are built over them. Mark v. 3. Now, as all these different sorts of tombs and sepulchres, with the very walls likewise of the enclosures, are constantly kept clean, white-washed, and beautified, they continue to this day to be an excellent comment upon that expression of our Saviour, where he mentions the garnishing of the sepulchres, Matt. xxiii. 29; and again, verse 27, where he compares the scribes, Pharisees, and hypocrites to whitened sepulchres." With respect to the demoniacs who are said by St. Matthew to come out of the tombs, Light observes, "I trod the ground celebrated for the miracle of the unclean spirit driven by our Saviour among the swine. The tombs still exist in the form of caverns, on the sides of the hills that rise from the shore of the lake; and from their wild appearance may well be considered the habitation of men exceeding fierce, possessed by a devil; they extend at a distance for more than a mile from the present town." In the account we have of the resurrection of Lazarus, when Mary went suddenly out to meet Jesus, the Jews supposed that she was gone to the grave "to weep there." The following extract from Buckingham illustrates this: "Not far from the spot at which we halted to enjoy this enchanting view, was an extensive cemetery, at which we noticed the custom so prevalent among eastern nations, of visiting the tombs of their deceased friends. These were formed with great care, and finished with extraordinary neatness; and at the foot of each grave was enclosed a small earthen vessel, in which was planted a sprig of myrtle, regularly watered every day by the mourning friend who visited it. Throughout the whole of this extensive place of burial we did not observe a single grave to which this token of respect and sorrow was not attached; and, scattered among the tombs in different quarters of the cemetery, we saw from twenty to thirty parties of females, sitting near the honored remains of some recently lost and deeply regretted relative or friend, and either watering their myrtle plants, or strewing flowers over the green turf that closed upon their heads." See BURIAL.

[The primitive Christians paid great respect to their dead. They conducted their funeral ceremonies with great solemnity, yet with subdued cheerfulness. They called their burial-grounds κοιμητήρια, cemeteries, dormitories, to indicate that their friends were sleeping in Jesus, and would awake on the morning of the resurrection. The custom of burying in churches did not prevail until the ninth century. The catacombs at Rome contain the tombs of many who suffered martyrdom under the persecuting emperors. Churches were frequently built on the graves of martyrs; hence Chrysostom calls certain churches τὰς τοῦ μαρτύρου, tombs of martyrs. God's Acre, or the Lord's Ground, was a beautifully expressive title for a Christian cemetery among our Saxon forefathers.]

[SERAPHIM. Some identify the seraphim, Isa. vi., with the CHERUBIM. Others make them a distinct order of celestial intelligences, the highest in the angelic hierarchy. Each seraph had one face and six wings, whereas the cherub in Ezekiel i. had four faces and four wings. Some identify the seraphim and cherubim with the ζῶα, living ones, in Rev. iv., v., and consider them symbols of glorified humanity; but the living ones are not called cherubim or seraphim; nor is it clear that the words, "Thou hast redeemed us by thy blood," etc., were sung by them: the "elders" alone may have sung this part of the antiphony. The word seraphim means burning ones, and indicates, according to the general view, devotional ardor; though Kimchi says, the angels appeared as flames of fire, to show that the people deserved to be totally burned up for their depravity. SERPENT. In Egypt and other oriental countries, a serpent was the common symbol of a powerful monarch; it was embroidered on the robes of princes, and blazoned on their diadem, to signify their absolute power and invincible might, and that, as the wound inflicted by the basilisk is incurable, so the fatal effects of their displeasure were neither to be avoided nor endured. These are the allusions involved in the address of the prophet to the irreconcilable enemies of his nation: "Rejoice not thou, whole Palestina, because the rod of him that smote thee is broken; for out of the serpent's roots shall come forth a cockatrice, and his fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent." Isa. xiv. 29. Uzziah, the King of Judah, had subdued the Philistines; but, taking advantage of the weak reign of Ahaz, they again invaded the kingdom of Judea, and reduced some cities in the southern part of the country under their dominion. On the death of Ahaz, Isaiah delivers this prophecy, threatening them with a more severe chastisement from the hand of Hezekiah, the grandson of Uzziah, by whose victorious arms they had been reduced to sue for peace; which he accomplished, when "he smote the Philistines even unto Gaza, and the borders thereof." 2 Kings xviii. 8. Uzziah, therefore, must be meant by the rod that smote them, and by the serpent from whom should spring the fiery flying serpent, that is, Hezekiah, a much more terrible enemy than even Uzziah had been. But the symbol of regal power which the oriental kings preferred to all others was the basilisk. This fact is attested by its Arabian name, melecha, from the Hebrew verb malach, "to reign;" from its Greek name, βασιλίσκος, and its Latin name, regulus: all of which, it is asserted, referred to the conspicuous place it occupied among the regal ornaments of the east. The basilisk is of a reddish color, and its head is decorated with a crest in the form of a crown; it is not entirely prostrate, like other serpents, but moves along with its head and half the body erect; the other parts sweep the ground behind,

All the other species of serpents are said to acknowledge the superiority of the real or the fabled basilisk, by flying from its presence, and hiding themselves in the dust. It is also supposed to live longer than any other serpent; the ancient heathens, therefore, pronounced it immortal, and placed it in the number of their deities; and because it had the dangerous power, in general belief, of killing with its pestiferous breath the strongest animals, it seemed to them invested with the power of life and death. It became, therefore, the favorite symbol of kings; and was employed by the prophet to symbolize the great and good Hezekiah, with strict propriety.

2. The cerastes, or horned snake. The only allusion to this species of serpent in the sacred volume occurs in the valedictory predictions of Jacob, where he describes the character and actions of Dan and his posterity: "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder, שׂוּפֵן, in the path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward." Gen. xlix. 17. It is indisputably clear, that the patriarch intended some kind of serpent; for the circumstances will not apply to a freebooter watching for his prey. It only remains to investigate the species to which it belongs. The principal care of the Jewish writers is to ascertain the etymology of the name, about which their sentiments are much divided. The Arabian authors quoted by Bochart inform us that the sephiphon is a most pernicious reptile, and very dangerous to man. It is of a sandy color, variegated with black and white spots. The particulars in the character of Dan, however, agree better with the cerastes, or horned snake, than with any other species of serpent. It lies in wait for passengers in the sand, or in the rut of the wheels on the highway. From its lurking-place it treacherously bites the horse's heels, so that the rider falls backward, in consequence of the animal's hinder legs becoming almost immediately torpid by the dreadful activity of the poison. The cerastes is equally formidable to man and the lower animals; and the more dangerous, because it is not easy to distinguish him from the sand in which he lies; and he never spares the helpless traveller who unwarily comes within his reach. Like the cerastes, Dan was to excel in cunning and artifice, to prevail against his enemies rather by his policy in the cabinet than by his valor in the field.

3. The seraph, or fiery flying serpent, to a biblical student, is one of the most interesting creatures that has yet been mentioned. It bears the name of an order among the hosts of heaven, whom Isaiah beheld in vision, placed above the throne of Jehovah in the temple. The brazen figure of this serpent is supposed to be a type of our blessed Redeemer, who was for our salvation lifted up upon the cross, as the serpent was elevated in the camp of Israel, for the preservation of that people. It is the only species of serpent which the almighty Creator has provided with wings, by means of which, instead of creeping or leaping, it rises from the ground, and leaning upon the extremity of its tail, moves with great velocity. It is a native of Egypt and the deserts of Arabia; and receives its name from the Hebrew verb seraph, which signifies to burn, in allusion to the violent inflammation which its poison produces, or rather to its fiery color, which the brazen serpent was intended to represent. Bochart is of opinion that the seraph is the same as the hydrus, or, as Cicero calls it, the serpent of the waters. For, in the book of Isaiah, the land of Egypt is called the region from whence come the viper and flying seraph, or burning serpent. Ælian says they come from the deserts of Libya and Arabia, to inhabit the streams of the Nile; and that they have the form of the hydrus.

The existence of winged serpents is attested by many writers of modern times. A kind of snakes was discovered among the Pyrenees, from whose sides proceeded cartilages in the form of wings; and Scaliger mentions a peasant who killed a serpent of the same species which attacked him, and presented it to the King of France. Le Blanc, as quoted by Bochart, says, at the head of Lake Chiamay are extensive woods and vast marshes, which it is very dangerous to approach, because they are infested with very large serpents, which, raised from the ground on wings resembling those of bats, and leaning on the extremity of their tails, move with great rapidity. They exist, it is reported, about these places in so great numbers, that they have almost laid waste the neighboring province. And, in the same work, Le Blanc affirms that he had seen some of them of immense size, which, when hungry, rushed impetuously on sheep and other tame animals. But the original term נִסְפָּף does not always signify flying with wings; it often expresses vibration, swinging backward and forward, a tremulous motion, a fluttering; and this is precisely the motion of a serpent, when he springs from one tree to another. Niebuhr mentions a sort of serpent at Bassorah, which they call heie thiare. "They commonly keep upon the date trees; and as it would be laborious for them to come down from a very high tree, in order to ascend another, they twist themselves by the tail to a branch of the former, which, making a spring by the motion they give it, throws them to the branches of the second. Hence it is that the modern Arabs call them flying serpents, heie thiare. Admiral Anson also speaks of the flying serpents that he met with at the island of Quibo, but which were without wings." From this account it may be inferred that the flying serpent mentioned in the prophet was of that species of serpents which, from their swift darting motion, the Greeks call aconitias, and the Romans, jaculus. The original phrase will bear another interpretation, which, perhaps, approaches still nearer the truth. The verb עָרַפ sometimes means to sparkle, to emit coruscations of light. In this sense, the noun רַעַפָּה frequently occurs in the sacred volume; thus Zophar says: "The coruscation, רַעַפָּה, shall be as the morning." The word in the verse under consideration may therefore refer to the ruddy color of that serpent, and express the sparkling of the blazing sunbeams upon its scales, which are extremely brilliant. [Isa. xiv. 29.]

4. The dragon. In Hebrew, the word תַּנִּין signifies either a dragon or a whale. As the name of a serpent, it frequently denotes one of any species; as when the rod of Moses is said to have been turned into a serpent, לִרְמִין. But, in its more strict and appropriate application, it is the proper name of the dragon, which differs from the serpent chiefly in its size. "Three kinds of dragons were formerly distinguished in India. 1. Those of the hills and mountains. 2. Those of the valleys and caves. 3. Those of the fens and marshes. The first is the largest, and covered with scales resplendent as burnished gold. They have a kind of beard hanging from their lower jaw, their aspect is frightful, their cry loud and shrill, their crest bright yellow, and they have a protuberance on their heads, as the color of a burning coal. Those of the flat country are of a silver color, and frequent rivers, to which the former never come. Those of the marshes are black, slow, and have no crest. Their bite is not venomous, though the creatures be dreadful." This description agrees in every particular with the boa, which is justly considered as the proper dragon. But so great is the inconsistency of the human mind, that the creature which is now an object of universal dislike was, in early times, honored with religious worship by every nation of the earth. Rites were devised and temples built to its honor; and priests were appointed to conduct the ceremonies. These miserable idolaters appeared before the altars of their contemptible deity in gorgeous vestments, their heads adorned with serpents, or with the figures of serpents embroidered on their tiaras, when the creatures themselves were not to be had; and in their frantic exclamations cried out, in evident allusion to the triumph which the old serpent obtained over our first mother, Eva! Eva! So completely was Satan permitted to insult our fallen race, that the serpent, his chosen agent in accomplishing our ruin, was actually raised to the first place among the deities of the heathen world, and revered by the most solemn acts of worship. The figure of the serpent adorned the portals of the proudest temples in the east.

The serpent was a very common symbol of the sun; and he is represented biting his tail, and with his body formed into a circle, in order to indicate the ordinary course of this luminary; and under this form it was an emblem of time and eternity. The serpent was also the symbol of medicine, and of the gods which presided over it, as of Apollo and Æsculapius. In most of the ancient rites we find some allusion to the serpent, under the several titles of Ob, Ops, Python, etc. This idolatry is alluded to by Moses, Lev. xx. 27. The woman of Endor, who had a familiar spirit, is called Oub, or Ob, and it is interpreted Pythonissa: the place where she resided, says the learned Mr. Bryant, seems to have been named from the worship then instituted; for Endor is compounded of En-ador, and signifies fons pithonis, the "fountain of light," the oracle of the god Ador; which oracle was probably founded by the Canaanites, and had never been totally suppressed. His pillar was also called Abbadir, or Abadir, compounded of ab and adir, and meaning the serpent deity Addir, the same as Adorus. In the orgies of Bacchus, the persons who partook of the ceremony used to carry serpents in their hands, and with horrid screams called upon Eva! Eva!—Eva being, according to the writer just mentioned, the same as epha, or opha, which the Greeks rendered ophis, and by it denoted a serpent, and containing no allusion to Eve, as above conjectured. These ceremonies, and this symbolic worship, began among the magi, who were the sons of Chus; and by them they were propagated in various parts. Wherever the Ammonians founded any places of worship, and introduced their rites, there was generally some story of a serpent. There was a legend about a serpent at Colchis, at Thebes, and at Delphi; and likewise in other places. The Greeks called Apollo himself Python, which is the same as Oupis, Opis, or Oub. In Egypt there was a serpent named Thermuthis, which was looked upon as very sacred; and the natives are said to have made use of it as a royal tiara, with which they ornamented the statues of Isis. The kings of Egypt wore high bonnets terminating in a round ball, and surrounded with figures of asps; and the priests likewise had the representation of serpents upon their bonnets. Abadon, or Abaddon, mentioned in the Revelation, ix. 11, is supposed by Mr. Bryant to have been the name of the Ophite god, with whose worship the world had been so long infected. This worship began among the people of Chaldea, who built the city of Ophis upon the Tigris, and were greatly addicted to divination, and to the worship of the serpent. From Chaldea the worship passed into Egypt, where the serpent deity was called Canoph, Can-eph, and C'neph; it also had the name of Ob, or Oub, and was the same as the Basiliscus, or royal serpent, the same as the Thermuthis, and made use of by way of ornament to the statues of their gods. The chief deity of Egypt is said to have been Vulcan, who was styled Opas; he was the same as Osiris, the sun, and hence was often called Ob-el, or Pytho, sol; and there were pillars sacred to him, with curious hieroglyphical inscriptions bearing the same name—whence among the Greeks, who copied from the Egyptians, every thing gradually tapering to a point was styled obelos, or obeliscus. As the worship of the serpent began among the sons of Chus, Mr. Bryant conjectures that from thence they were denominated Ethiopians and Aithiopians, from Ath-ope, or Ath-opes, the god whom they worshipped, and not from their complexion: the Ethiopians brought these rites into Greece, and called the island where they first established them, Ellopia, Solis Serpentis insula, the same with Euboea, or Oubaina, that is, the Serpent Island. The same learned writer discovers traces of the serpent-worship among the Hyperboreans, at Rhodes, named Ophiusa, in Phrygia, and upon the Hellespont, in the island Cyprus, in Crete, among the Athenians, in the name of Cecrops, among the natives of Thebes in Boeotia, among the Lacedæmonians, in Italy, in Syria, etc., and in the names of many places, as well as the people where the Ophites settled. One of the most early heresies introduced into the Christian Church was that of the Ophite, who introduced serpents emblematically among their rites. This is seen in many of the medals, the relics of Gnosticism, which are still preserved.

The form assumed by the tempter when he seduced our first parents, has been handed down in the traditions of most ancient nations; and, though animals of the serpent tribe were very generally worshipped by the pagans as symbols of the Agathodemon, they were likewise viewed as types or figures of the evil principle. 1. One of the most remarkable accounts of the primeval tempter under the shape of a serpent, occurs in the Zendavesta of the ancient Persians. 2. To the draconian Ahriman of the Persians, the malignant serpent caliya of Hindoo theology appears to be very closely allied. He is represented, at least, as the decided enemy of the mediatorial god, whom he persecutes with the utmost virulence, though he is finally vanquished by his celestial adversary. 3. The serpent Typhon of the Egyptians, who is sometimes identified with the ocean, because the deluge was esteemed the work of the evil principle; and the serpent Python of the Greeks, who is evidently the same as the monster Typhon, appear to have similarly originated, in the first instance, from some remembrance of the form which Satan assumed when in Paradise. Perhaps, also, the notion that Python was oracular—a notion which caused the so frequent use of serpents in the rites of divination—may have sprung from a recollection of the vocal responses which the tempter gave to Eve under the borrowed figure of that reptile. 4. Wa may still ascribe to the same source that rebellious serpent whose treason seems to have been so well remembered among the inhabitants of Syria. Pherecydes, a native of that country, bestows upon him the Greek name of ophioneus, or the "serpent god;" which, in fact, is a mere translation of the Syriac or Chaldaic nachash. He represents him as being the prince of those evil spirits who contended with the supreme god Cronus, and who in consequence were ejected from heaven. Their happiness being thus justly forfeited, they were henceforth plunged in the depths of Tartarus, hateful and mutually hating each other. From Syria and the east the legend passed into Greece, mingled, however, with allusions to the deluge. 5. The same evil being, in the same form, appears again in the mythology of the Goths or Scythians. We are told by the ancient Scalds that the bad principle, whom they denominate Loke, unites great personal beauty with a malignant and inconstant nature; and he is described as surpassing all creatures in the depth of his cunning and the artfulness of his perfidy. Here the pristine glory and majesty of Satan, before the lineaments of celestial beauty were defaced by his rebellious apostasy, seem not obscurely to be alluded to; while the craft and malevolence which mark his character as a fallen angel are depicted with sufficient accuracy.

The most remarkable corroboration, however, of the Mosaic history is to be found in those fables which involve the mythological serpent, and in the worship which was so generally offered to him throughout the world. The worship of the serpent may be traced in almost every religion throughout ancient Asia, Europe, Africa, and America. But how an object of abhorrence could have been exalted into an object of veneration, must be referred to the subtlety of the arch enemy himself, whose constant endeavor has been rather to corrupt than obliterate the true faith; that, in the perpetual conflict between truth and error, the mind of man might be more surely confounded and debased. Among other devices, that of elevating himself into an object of adoration has ever been the most cherished. It was that which he proposed to our Lord: "All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me." We cannot, therefore, wonder that the same being who had the presumption to make this proposal to the Son of God, should have had the address to insinuate himself into the worship of the children of men. In this he was unhappily but too well seconded by the natural tendency of human corruption. The unenlightened heathen, in obedience to the voice of nature, acknowledged his dependence upon a superior being. His reason assured him that there must be a God; his conscience assured him that God was good; but he felt and acknowledged the prevalence of evil, and attributed it, naturally, to an evil agent. But as the evil spirit, to his unilluminated mind, seemed as omnipotent as the good agent, he worshipped both: the one, that he might propitiate his kindness; the other, that he might avert his displeasure. The great point of devil-worship being gained, namely, the acknowledgment of the evil spirit as God, the transition to idolatry became easy. The mind, once darkened by the admission of an allegiance divided between God and Satan, became gradually more feeble and superstitious, until at length sensible objects were called in to aid the weakness of degraded intellect; and, from their first form as symbols, passed rapidly through the successive stages of apotheosis, until they were elevated into gods. Of these the most remarkable was the serpent; upon the basis of tradition, regarded, first, as the symbol of the malignant being; subsequently, considered talismanic and oracular; and, lastly, venerated and worshipped as divine.

[As Moses simply calls the tempter the serpent, and as Paul and John identify the serpent with the devil, Rom. xvi. 20: 2 Cor. xi. 3, 14: Rev. xii. 9, some think that no animal was employed by the tempter when he seduced Eve: the language in Gen. iii. 1, 14, 15, being applicable to Satan himself. Compare Ps. lxxix. 9: Isa. lxx. 25: Micah vii. 17.]

SERPENT, BRAZEN. This was a figure of a serpent, called above the seraph, which Moses caused to be put on the top of a pole, Num. xxi. 9, that all those bitten by the serpent, who should look upon this image, might be healed. Our Saviour, in the Gospel of St. John, iii. 14, declares, that "as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up;" alluding to his own death, which, through faith, was to give life to the world. The brazen serpent was preserved among the Israelites down to the time of Hezekiah; who, being informed that the people paid a superstitious worship to it, had it broken in pieces, and by way of contempt gave it the name of Nehushtan, that is to say, a brazen bauble or trifle. 2 Kings xviii. 4. See [NEHUSHTAN] TYPE.

[SERPENTINIANS. The Ophites, or Serpentinians, were heretics who held Gnostic and Valentinian opinions, to which they added the absurd notion that the serpent which deceived Eve was Christ, or the æon Sophia, concealed under the reptile form: for this reason they kept serpents and worshipped them. See CAINITES, GNOSTICS, and SERPENT.]

[SERUG. Son of Reu, Gen. xi. 20-23: called Saruch, Luke iii. 35.]

SERVANT. The word generally signifies a slave; for formerly among the Hebrews, and the neighboring nations, the greater part of servants were slaves; that is to say, they belonged absolutely to their masters, who had a right to dispose of their persons, their bodies, goods, and even of their lives in some cases. The Hebrews had two sorts of servants or slaves. Lev. xxv. 44, 45, etc. Some were strangers, either bought or taken in the wars. The others were Hebrew slaves, who, being poor, sold themselves, or were sold to pay their debts; or were delivered up for slaves by their parents in cases of necessity. This sort of Hebrew slaves continued in slavery but to the year of jubilee; then they might return to liberty again, and their masters could not retain them against their wills. If they would continue voluntarily with their masters, they were brought before the judges; there they made a declaration that for this time they disclaimed the privilege of the law, had their ears bored with an awl, by applying them to the door-posts of their master, Exod. xxi. 2, 5-7, etc.; and after that they had no longer any power of recovering their liberty, except at the next year of jubilee. Servant is also taken for a man that dedicates himself to the service of another by the choice of his own will and inclination. Thus Joshua was the servant of Moses, Elisha of Elijah, Gehazi of Elisha; St. Peter, St. Andrew, St. Philip, and the rest, were servants of Jesus Christ.

SETH, son of Adam and of Eve, was born A. M. 130. Gen. v. 3, 6, 10, 11. Seth, at the age of one hundred and five years, begat Enos, A. M. 235. He lived after this eight hundred and seven years, in all nine hundred and twelve years, and died A. M. 1042. Seth was the chief of "the children of God," as the Scripture calls them. Gen. vi. 2; that is, those who before the flood preserved true religion and piety in the world, while the descendants of Cain gave themselves up to wickedness. The invention of letters and writing is by the rabbins ascribed to this patriarch.

[SETHITES. Ophite Gnostics, who held that there were two sorts of men, the material, created by evil genii, and the animal, created by the Demiurge. Abel represented the animal, and being overcome by Cain, the representative of the material, the æon Sophia substituted Seth, to whom she imparted the spiritual principle, and who, after a long contest with the opposite race, appeared in the person of Christ: hence their name. They had the "Seven Books of Seth," and other apocryphal works, which they highly prized. See SERPENTINIANS.]

SEVEN. The number seven is consecrated in the holy books, and in the religion of the Jews, by a great number of events and mysterious circumstances. God created the world in the space of seven days, and consecrated the seventh day to repose. The rest of the seventh day, according to St. Paul, Heb. iv. 4, intimates eternal rest. And not only the seventh day is honored among the Jews by the repose of the Sabbath, but every seventh year is also consecrated to the rest of the earth, by the name of a sabbatical year; as also the seven times seventh year, or forty-ninth year, is the year of jubilee. In the prophetic style, a week often stands for seven years. Dan. ix. 24-26. Jacob served his father-in-law Laban seven years for each of his daughters. Pharaoh's mysterious dream represented to his imagination seven fat oxen, and seven lean ones; seven full ears of corn, and as many that were empty and shrivelled. These stood for seven years of plenty, and seven of scarcity. The number of seven days is observed in the octaves of the great solemnities of the passover, of tabernacles, and of the dedication of the tabernacle and the temple; the seven branches of the golden candlestick, the number of seven sacrifices appointed on several occasions. Numbers xxvii. 11; xxix. 17-21, etc. Seven trumpets, seven priests that sounded them, seven days to surround the walls of Jericho. Joshua vi. 4, 6, 8. In the Revelation are the seven churches, seven candlesticks, seven spirits, seven stars, seven lamps, seven seals, seven angels, seven phials, seven plagues, etc. In certain passages the number seven is put for a great number. Isaiah (iv. 1) says, that seven women should lay hold on one man to ask him to marry them. Hannah, the mother of Samuel, says, 1 Sam. ii. 5, that she who was barren should have seven children. Jeremiah (xv. 9) makes use of the same expression. God threatens his people to smite them seven times for their transgressions, Lev. xxvi. 24, that is to say, several times. The Psalmist, speaking of very pure silver, says, it is "purified seven times," Psalm xii. 6. And elsewhere, "Render unto our neighbors sevenfold into their bosom," Psalm lxxix. 12: punish them severely and as often as they deserve it. The slayer of Cain was to be punished seven times; but of Lamech seventy times seven times. Gen. iv. 15, 24. The slothful man thinks himself wiser than seven men that set forth proverbs, Prov. xxvi. 16: he thinks himself of more worth than many wise men. St. Peter asks our Saviour, Matt. xviii. 21, 22, How many times should he forgive his brother? till seven times? And Christ answers him, I say not only seven times, but seventy times seven; meaning, as often as he may offend, however frequent it may be.

[SHAKERS. The United Society of Believers, or Millennial Church, as they call themselves, originated with James Wardley, in England, A. D.

1747, though they are sometimes traced to the Camisards, or French Prophets. Wardley had been a Quaker, and professed to have received supernatural revelations, which were endorsed by a Mrs. Standley, generally known as Ann Lee, daughter of a blacksmith in Manchester. She spent nine years in convulsions, fastings, etc., and became so emaciated as to have to be fed like an infant. About 1770 she testified against marriage, and called herself "Ann the Word;" hence her followers say, "The man who was called Jesus, and the woman who was called Ann, are verily the two first pillars of the Church, the two anointed ones." In 1774, Ann, three elders, and others of the sect, emigrated to America. In 1776 they went to Albany, N. Y., and subsequently formed a settlement at Niskayuna, eight miles from that city. "Mother Ann" asserted that she would be translated to heaven without dying: she did die, however, viz., on September 8, 1784. From the accounts of Valentine and Reuben Rathbun, the former a Baptist minister, the latter a Quaker, both of whom joined the society and afterward left it, it would seem that the morals of the founders of this sect were not of the highest grade. R. Rathbun represents "Mother Ann" as a drunken, profane, and indecent woman. The sect, however, has continued to spread, and there are now eighteen Shaker settlements located in seven different States, numbering six or eight thousand souls. They maintain a community of goods; and as they condemn marriage as sinful, their proselytes renounce their husbands and wives, and the males and females live apart. They come together for the purpose of worship, when they range themselves in rows, spring upward a few inches, and continue the exercise until they become so excited as to throw off their upper garments, dance, jump, and perform gyrations for hours together, meanwhile singing, shouting, and clapping hands, in token of the happiness of the millennial state, and shuddering and roaring, as they say, in prayer for the wicked. They then sit down and listen to their "elders," and afterwards resume their grotesque exercises. They hold that "Mother Ann" was the woman spoken of, Rev. xii.—that she held communications with the dead in seventy-two languages, none of which were understood by the living—that she was a vessel chosen of God to usher into the world the Divine Spirit of Christ, and to commence the dispensation of his second coming—that this Spirit dwells in his Church—that this Christ, in the completed order of Father and Mother, can be found by every faithful soul "without sin unto salvation"—that Baptism and the Lord's Supper ceased with the apostolic age—that the wicked will be punished for a definite period only, except those who apostatize from them, who will be punished for ever—that the judgment has begun, and that Christ will not appear again in the world, except in the persons of his followers—and other absurd and blasphemous notions. In 1843 they set forth a volume entitled, "A Holy, Sacred, and Divine Roll and Book from the Lord God of Heaven, to the Inhabitants of the Earth, revealed in the United Society of New Lebanon, County of Columbia, State of New York, United States of America. Read and understand, all ye in mortal clay." The contents of this book were professedly revealed by an angel to one Philemon Stewart; and copies of it were sent to all the governments of Europe, Asia, and the United States. It is full of their absurdities, and need not be described.]

[SHAREZER. Son of Sennacherib, Isa. xxxvii. 38.—Also, a man mentioned Zech. vii. 2.]

SHARON, PLAIN OF, a beautiful and spacious plain, extending from Cæsarea to Joppa on the sea-coast, and eastward to the mountains of Judea, and is celebrated for its wines, its flowers, and its pastures. It still preserves some portions of its natural beauty, and is adorned in the spring with the white and red rose, the narcissus, the white and orange lily, the carnation, and other flowers; but for the rest of the year it appears little better than a desert, with here and there a ruined village, and some clumps of olive trees and sycamores. This name was almost become a proverb to express a place of extraordinary beauty and fruitfulness, Isaiah xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 2. But there are three cantons of Palestine known by the name of Sharon. The first, according to Eusebius and St. Jerome, is a canton between Mount Tabor and the Sea of Tiberias. The second, a canton between the city of Cæsarea of Palestine and Joppa. And the third a canton beyond Jordan, in the country of Bashan, and in the division of the tribe of Gad. Modern travellers give this name also to the plain that lies between Ecdippe and Ptolemais. [Sharon always occurs with the article Ha-Sharon, except in 1 Chron. v. 16, where, Stanley suggests, it indicates the Mishor of Gilead and Bashan. Mishor means the same as Sharon, a level plain, and is so rendered in our version.—Lasharon, Josh. xii. 18, was perhaps represented by SARON, Acts ix.

35, which appears to have been on the south-east of the plain. See ROSE.]

SHAVING. In time of mourning the Jews shaved their heads, and neglected to trim their beards. The King of the Ammonites shaved off half the beards of David's ambassadors, which was the greatest insult he could offer. This will appear from the regard which the easterns have ever paid to the beard. D'Arvieux gives a remarkable instance of an Arab who, having received a wound in the jaw, chose to hazard his life rather than to suffer his surgeon to take off his beard. It was one of the most infamous punishments of cowardice in Sparta, that they who turned their backs in the day of battle were obliged to appear abroad with one half of their beard shaved, and the other half unshaved. The easterns considered the beard as venerable, because it distinguished men from women, and was the mark of freemen in opposition to slaves. Shaving was still, in times comparatively modern, the greatest indignity that could be offered in Persia. Shah Abbas, King of that country, enraged that the Emperor of Hindostan had inadvertently addressed him by a title far inferior to that of the great shah-in-shah, or king of kings, ordered the beards of the ambassadors to be shaved off, and sent them home to their master, "One of the buffoons of the bashaw," says Belzoni, "took it into his head one day, for a frolic, to shave his beard, which is no trifle among the Turks; for some of them, I really believe, would sooner have their head cut off than their beard. In this state he went home to his women, who actually thrust him out of the door; and such was the disgrace of cutting off his beard, that even his fellow-buffoons would not eat with him till it was grown again."

SHEAF. After the feast of the passover the Jews brought a sheaf into the temple, as the first fruits of the barley harvest, Lev. xxiii. 10, 12; and these were the ceremonies that were then performed. On the 16th of the month Nisan, in the evening, when the feast-day of the passover was ended, and the second day was begun, which was a working day, the house of judgment deputed three men to go in solemnity, and gather the sheaf of barley. The inhabitants of the neighboring cities came together to be present at the ceremony. The barley was gathered in the territory of Jerusalem. The deputies demanded three times successively if the sun was set; and were as often answered that it was. Then they demanded three times if they might be permitted to cut the sheaf, and permission was as often granted. They reaped it out of three different fields, with three different sickles, and put the ears into three boxes to carry to the temple. This sheaf was threshed in the court; and of the grain they took a full omer, and after it had been winnowed, parched, and bruised, they sprinkled oil over it, and added a handful of incense; then the priest who received the offering waved it before the Lord to the four quarters of the world, crosswise; he cast part of it upon the altar, and the rest was his own. After this every one might begin to reap the harvest.

SHEBA. [שֶׁבָּא.] Of "the queen of Sheba," mention is made 1 Kings x. 1, 2, etc.: 2 Chron.

ix. 1, 2, etc.: Matt. xii. 42: Luke xi. 31. She is called "queen of the south," and was, according to some, a queen of Arabia; and according to others, a queen of Ethiopia. Josephus says that Sheba was the ancient name of the city of Meroë, before Cambyzes gave it that of his sister; and that it was from thence the queen came of whom we are speaking. This opinion has much prevailed. The Abyssinians at this day maintain that this princess was of their country, and that her posterity reigned there a long time. They preserve a catalogue of them, their names and successions. [See SABAENS and SEBA.]

[SHEBA. שֶׁבָּא. A Gadite. 1 Chron. v. 13.]

[SHEBA, SHEBAH. שֶׁבָּא. The name given by Isaac to a well dug by his servants, about thirty miles south-west of Hebron. It was so called because of an oath of friendship sworn at this place between Abimelech and Isaac. Gen. xxvi. 31-33. The incident is nearly a repetition of one which occurred in the history of Abraham, Gen. xxi. 22-34. Robinson found two wells at Bir-es-Seba, the present name of the place. They are walled up, circular, and apparently very ancient. One is twelve and a half feet in diameter, forty-four and a half feet deep to the surface of the water, sixteen feet of which at the bottom is excavated in the rock: the other, fifty-five rods south-west, is five feet in diameter, forty-two feet deep. The water in both is good. Eusebius and Jerome speak of a large village with a Roman garrison at Beer-sheba; and Robinson found ruins of a village, spreading half a mile in length, and extending back a quarter of a mile, north of the walls. There was a town at Beer-sheba after the captivity. Neh. xi. 27, 30. In Josh. xix. 2, Sheba seems to be distinguished from Beer-sheba; but in the parallel place, 1 Chron. iv. 28, Sheba is omitted. It may have been interpolated by a transcriber in Josh. xix. 2, though some render "Beer-sheba, that is, Sheba." It could not have been a distinct place, as that would make fourteen cities, when there were but thirteen. Josh. xix. 6. See BEER-SHEBA.]

[SHECHEM. Son of Hamor. Gen. xxxiv.—Also, a son of Shemidah, 1 Chron. vii. 19.]

SHECHEM, SECHEM, SICHEM, SYCHEM, called also SYCHAR in the New Testament, afterward Neapolis, and in the present day Nablous, Naplous, Napolose, and Naplosa, (for it is thus variously written,) a city of Samaria, near the parcel of ground which Jacob bought of Hamor, the father of Shechem, and gave to his son Joseph. Here Joseph's bones were brought out of Egypt to be interred; and on the same piece of ground was the well called Jacob's well, at which our Saviour sat down when he had the memorable conversation with the woman of Samaria, John iv., which caused her and many other inhabitants of Shechem, or Sychar, as it is there called, to receive him as the Messiah. On contemplating this place and its vicinity, Dr. E. D. Clarke says, "The traveller directing his footsteps toward its ancient sepulchres, as everlasting as the rocks in which they are hewn, is permitted, upon the authority of sacred and indisputable record, to contemplate the spot where the remains of Joseph, of Eleazer, and of Joshua, were severally deposited. If any thing connected with the memory of past ages be calculated to awaken local enthusiasm, the land around this city is preëminently entitled to consideration. The sacred story of events transacted in the field of Sichem, from our earliest years, is remembered with delight; but with the territory before our eyes where those events took place, and in the view of objects existing as they were described above three thousand years ago, the grateful impression kindles into ecstasy. Along the valley, we beheld 'a company of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead,' as in the days of Reuben and Judah, 'with their camels bearing spicery, and balm, and myrrh,' who would gladly have purchased another Joseph of his brethren, and conveyed him as a slave to some Potiphar in Egypt. Upon the hills around, flocks and herds were feeding, as of old; nor in the simple garb of the shepherds of Samaria was there any thing repugnant to the notions we may entertain of the appearance presented by the sons of Jacob." The celebrated well called Jacob's well, but which, with the inhabitants of Shechem, is known by the name of Bir Samaria, or the "Well of Samaria," is situated about half an hour's walk east of the town.

[Nâbulus is seven hundred and fifty feet below the top of Mount Gerizim, which is two thousand five hundred feet above the sea. It is about thirty-four miles north of Jerusalem. The city stretches along the north-east base of the mountain: the houses are of stone, high, with domes on the roofs. The site is a water-summit, the waters on the east flowing to the Jordan, and those on the west to the Mediterranean. The Samaritans have a synagogue with a school in Nâbulus. They have a manuscript of the Pentateuch in the synagogue, written, as they say, by Abishua, son of Phinehas, 1 Chron. vi. 3, 4, which was shown to Doctors Olin and Robinson by a venerable priest, who employs himself in writing out copies of it. They keep the Sabbaths and New Moons with great strictness; and repair four times a year in solemn procession to Gerizim, viz., at the Passover, when they pitch their tents there and stay all night, offering at sunset seven lambs in sacrifice; at Pentecost; at the feast of Tabernacles, when they sojourn there in booths; and on the Day of Atonement. The holiest spot on Gerizim, the Kibleh of the Samaritans, to which they always turn in prayer, is a naked surface of rock, around which are traces of former walls, some think of the ancient temple. Shechem was a very ancient place, but it does not appear to have been a large city in the time of the patriarchs. Gen. xii. 6; xxxiii. 18, 19; xxxvii. 12-14. The city, and the district in which it was situated, seem to have been named after Shechem, "prince of the country." Gen. xxxiv. It fell within the lot of Ephraim, the bones of Joseph, the patriarch of that tribe, being buried there: it was made a Levitical city and city of refuge, and became quite famous. Josh. xx. 7; xxi. 20, 21; xxiv.: Judges viii. 31; ix.: Ps. lx. 6. At Shechem, Rehoboam was made king: there the ten tribes rebelled against him, which gave Jeroboam occasion to develop

it into a royal city. 1 Kings xii. It seems to have been inhabited during the captivity, Jer. xli. 5, and afterward it was the chief city of the Samaritans, who, by permission of Alexander the Great, built a temple on Mount Gerizim, which was destroyed by John Hircanus, B. C. 129. They still, however, clung to their worship on Gerizim, and, like the Jews, expected the Messiah. John iv. John says that Shechem was "called Sychar," which appears to have been a Jewish nickname, derived by some from שָׁכָר, falsehood, as applied to idols, Hab. ii. 18, and by others from שָׁכָר, drunkard, in allusion to Isa. xxviii. 1-8. Stephen, however, before the Sanhedrim, calls it Sychem. Acts vii. 16. It seems to have derived the name Neapolis from Flavius Vespasian, as the coins of the city bear the inscription, Flavia Neapolis. Josephus and Pliny call it Neapolis: the former says it was previously called Mabortha, and the latter, Mamorta. On some of the coins of Neapolis, from Titus to Volusianus, Mount Gerizim is depicted with the temple, though there is no historic record of the rebuilding of that edifice. Neapolis was deprived of its civic rites by Septimius Severus, A. D. 200. It was made a bishop's see at an early date, and the names of several of its bishops appear among the subscriptions to the Councils of Ancyra and Neocæsarea, A. D. 314, and Nice, A. D. 325, and the Synod of Jerusalem, A. D. 536. In consequence of an outrage on the Christians, in the fifth century, Zeno banished the Samaritans from Gerizim, and built a church there to the Virgin. In the reigns of Anastasius and Justinian they renewed their outrages upon the Christians, whereupon the latter deprived them of all their civil and religious rights. Neapolis fell into the hands of the Mohammedans, at the time they were besieging Jerusalem. It passed over to Tancred in the time of the Crusades: in 1113, 1184, 1187, it was laid waste by the Saracens: the abbot and canons of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre held it for a while, but it was finally captured by Abu 'Aty, and has remained ever since in the hands of the Mohammedans. It belonged for a while to the pashalic of Damascus, and then to that of Acre. In 1834 it rose against Ibrahim Pasha, who repaired to the city and reduced it to submission. It now belongs to the pashalic of Acre, and contains about eight thousand inhabitants, all Moslems, except five hundred Greeks, nearly one hundred Jews, and one hundred and fifty Samaritans, "who appear to be," says Dr. Robinson, "the last isolated remnant of a remarkable people clinging now for more than two thousand years around the central spot of their religion and history, and lingering slowly to decay." They perpetuate their ancient enmity toward the Jews, to whom they bear no resemblance in their physiognomy, though they are frequently classed among them. Nâbulus has some trade and manufactures, and exports a considerable amount of cotton and olive-oil soap. There are six mosques, a Greek Church, and several public baths in the city. This was the native place of Justin Martyr.]

cred collectively in a flock, Arabic zain. The sheep is a well-known animal. The benefits which mankind owe to it are numerous. Its fleece, its skin, its flesh, its tallow, and even its horns and bowels, are articles of great utility to human life and happiness. Its mildness and inoffensiveness of temper strongly recommend it to human affection and regard; and have designated it the pattern and emblem of meekness, innocence, patience, and submission. It is a social animal. The flock follow the ram as their leader, who frequently displays the most impetuous courage in their defence: dogs, and even men, when attempting to molest them, have often suffered from his sagacious and generous valor. There are two varieties of sheep found in Syria. The first, called the "Bidoween sheep," differs little from the large breed among us, except that the tail is somewhat longer and thicker. The second is much more common, and is more valued on account of the extraordinary bulk of its tail, which has been remarked by all the eastern travellers. The carcass of one of these sheep, without including the head, feet, entrails, and skin, weighs from fifty to sixty pounds, of which the tail makes up fifteen pounds. Some of a larger size, fattened with care, will sometimes weigh one hundred and fifty pounds, the tail alone composing one-third of the whole weight. It is of a substance between fat and marrow, and is not eaten separately, but mixed with the lean meat in many of their dishes, and often also used instead of butter. A reference to this part is made in Exod. xxix. 22: Lev. iii. 9; where the fat and the tail were to be burnt on the altar of sacrifice. Mr. Sweet considers this precept to have had respect to the health of the Israelites; observing that "bilious disorders are very frequent in hot countries; the eating of fat meat is a great encouragement and excitement to them; and though the fat of the tail is now considered as a delicacy, it is really unwholesome." The conclusion of the seventeenth verse, which is, "Ye shall eat neither fat nor blood," justifies this opinion. The prohibition of eating fat, that is of fat unmixed with the flesh, the omentum or caul, is given also, Lev. vii. 23.

SHEKEL, שֶׁקֶל, signifies weight, money, shekel, siclus, a Hebrew weight and money. Exod. xxx. 23, 24: 2 Sam. xiv. 26. Shekel is used to denote the weight of any thing; as iron, hair, spices, etc. Dr. Arbuthnot makes the weight of the shekel equal to 9 dwt. 24 gr. English troy weight; and the value equal to 2s. 3½d. sterling money; but the golden shekel was worth £1 16s. 6d. English money. Some are of the opinion that the Jews had two kinds of shekels, namely, the common one already noticed, and the shekel of the sanctuary, which last they make double the former. But most authors make them the same, and think that the word sanctuary is added to express a just and exact weight, according to the standards kept in the temple or tabernacle. Moses, Num. xviii. 16, and Ezekiel, xlv. 12, say that the shekel was worth twenty gerahs.

[SHEKINAH. The symbol of the Divine glory, which dwelt in the tabernacle and the temple. The word does not occur in the Bible, but the root shakan, from which it is derived, is of frequent occurrence. It means to dwell or inhabit. In Gen. iii. 24, Jehovah is said to inhabit, or, as some anglicize the verb, shekinize, the cherubim; or, as others suggest, the Divine symbol tabernacled with the cherubim. This may have been "the presence of the Lord" from which Cain was driven, Gen. iv. 16; and "the glory of the Lord," which "appeared in the cloud," in the camp of Israel, Exod. xiv. 19, 20, 24; xvi. 7; xxiv. 16, 17; xxxiii. 9. Compare Exod. xl. 34-38: 1 Kings viii. 11: Ps. lxxx. 1; xvi. 6, 7: Ezek. x. 4, 18; xliii. 4, and especially John i. 14: Col. i. 9; ii. 9, where there seems to be an allusion to the shekinah, the residence of Jehovah being symbolical in the one case and substantial in the other.]

[SHELOMITH. Mother of the blasphemer who was stoned to death. Lev. xxiv. 11.—Also, a daughter of Zerubbabel. 1 Chron. iii. 19.]

SHEM, the son of Noah. Gen. vi. 10. He was born A. M. 1558. It is the opinion of the generality of commentators, that Shem was younger than Japheth, and the second son of Noah, for reasons given under the article JAPHETH. See also Gen. ix. 22-25. He lived six hundred years, and died A. M. 2158. The posterity of Shem obtained their portion in the best parts of Asia. The Jews ascribe to Shem the theological tradition of the things that Noah had learned from the first men. Shem communicated them to his children, and by this means the true religion was preserved in the world. Some have thought Shem the same as Melchizedek, and that he himself had been at the school of Methuselah before the deluge: that he gave to Abraham the whole tradition, the ceremonies of the sacrifices of religion, according to which this patriarch afterward offered his sacrifices. But this opinion has no adequate support. Lastly, the Jews say that he taught men the law of justice, and the manner of reckoning months and years, and the intercalations of the months. All that can be said as to these speculations is, that Noah and all his sons were the depositaries of the knowledge which existed among men before the flood, and were perhaps both specially qualified by God first to attain it, and then to transmit it to their descendants. Shem had five sons, Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram, who peopled the richest provinces of Asia.

[SHEMAIAH. A prophet in the time of Rehoboam, who wrote the history of his reign. 1 Kings xii. 22-24: 2 Chron. xii. 15.—Also, a false prophet in the time of Jeremiah, who called him "the Nehelamite," which means, the dreamer. Jer. xxix. 24-32. Others of this name are mentioned, 1 Chron. iv. 37; v. 4; ix. 14; xv. 8, 11; xxvi. 4, 6, 7: 2 Chron. xvii. 8; xxix. 14; xxxi. 15; xxxv. 9: Ezra viii. 13, 16; x. 21, 31: Neh. iii. 29; vi. 10; x. 8; xi. 15; xii. 6, 18, 34, 35, 36, 42: Jer. xxvi. 20; xxxvi. 12.]

[SHEMER. The owner of the hill on which was built a city, called, after him, SAMARIA. 1 Kings xvi. 24.]

[SHEMINITH. This word, meaning the eighth, is supposed to denote a harp with eight strings, Ps. vi., xii., titles. Others think it means the bass, or the part an octave below the treble, which they suggest is denoted by Alamoth. 1 Chron. xv. 20, 21.]

[SHENIR. See SENIR.]

[SHEPHATIAH. David's son by Abital. 2 Sam. iii. 4.—Others of this name are mentioned, 1 Chron. ix. 8; xii. 5; xxvii. 16: Ezra ii. 4, 57; Neh. vii. 9; Jer. xxxviii. 1.

SHEPHERDS. The patriarchal shepherds, rich in flocks and herds, in silver and gold, and attended by a numerous train of servants purchased with their money, or hired from the neighboring towns and villages, acknowledged no civil superior; they held the rank and exercised the rights of sovereign princes; they concluded alliances with the kings in whose territories they tended their flocks; they made peace or war with the surrounding states; and, in fine, they wanted nothing of sovereign authority but the name. Unfettered by the cumbrous ceremonies of regal power, they led a plain and laborious life, in perfect freedom and overflowing abundance. Refusing to confine themselves to any particular spot, (for the pastures were not yet appropriated,) they lived in tents, and removed from one place to another in search of pastures for their cattle. Strangers in the countries where they sojourned, they refused to mingle with the permanent settlers, to occupy their towns, and to form with them one people. They were conscious of their strength, and jealous of their independence; and although patient and forbearing, their conduct proved, on several occasions, that they wanted neither skill nor courage to vindicate their rights and avenge their wrongs. In the wealth, the power, and the splendor of patriarchal shepherds, we discover the rudiments of regal grandeur and authority; and in their numerous and hardy retainers, the germ of potent empires. Hence the custom so prevalent among the ancients, of distinguishing the office and duties of their kings and princes, by terms borrowed from the pastoral life: Agamemnon, shepherd of the people, Ἀγαμέμνων ποιμένα λαῶν, is a phrase frequently used in the strains of Homer. The sacred writers very often speak of kings under the name of shepherds, and compare the royal sceptre to the shepherd's crook: "He chose David also his servant, and took him from the sheep-folds; from following the ewes great with young, he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. So he fed them according to the integrity of his heart, and guided them by the skillfulness of his hands." And Jehovah said to David himself: "Thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be a captain over Israel." The royal Psalmist, on the other hand, celebrates, under the same allusions, the special care and goodness of God toward himself, and also toward his ancient people. "The Lord is my shepherd: I shall not want." "Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock: thou that dwellest between the cherubim, shine forth." In many other places of Scripture, the Church is compared to a sheep-fold, the saints to sheep, and the ministers of religion to shepherds, who must render, at last, an account of their administration to the Shepherd and Overseer to whom they owe their authority.

The patriarchs did not commit their flocks and herds solely to the care of menial servants and strangers; they tended them in person, or placed them under the superintendence of their sons and their daughters, who were bred to the same laborious employment, and taught to perform, without reluctance, the meanest services. Rebekah, the only daughter of a shepherd prince, went to a considerable distance to draw water; and it is evident from the readiness and address with which she let down her pitcher from her shoulder, and gave drink to the servant of Abraham, and afterward drew for all his camels, that she had been long accustomed to that humble employment. From the same authority we know that Rachel, the daughter of Laban, kept her father's flocks, and submitted to the various privations and hardships of the pastoral life in the deserts of Syria. The patriarch Jacob, though he was the son of a shepherd prince, kept the flocks of Laban, his maternal uncle; and his own sons followed the same business, both in Mesopotamia, and after his return to the land of Canaan. This primeval simplicity was long retained among the Greeks. Homer often sends the daughters of princes and nobles to tend the flocks, to wash the clothes of the family at the fountain, or in the flowing stream, and to perform many other menial services. Adonis, the son of Cinyras, a king of Cyprus, fed his flocks by the streaming rivers:

Et formosus oves ad flumina pavit Adonis.

"Along the streams his flock Adonis fed."

DRYDEN.

Andromache, the wife of Hector, complains that Achilles had slain her seven brothers when they were tending their flocks and herds. Æneas pastured his oxen on Mount Ida, when Achilles seized them, and forced the Trojan hero to flee. Phœbus himself was a keeper of oxen in the groves and valleys of Mount Ida. This custom has descended to modern times; for in Syria the daughters of the Turcoman and Arabian shepherds, and in India the Brahmin women of distinction, are seen drawing water at the village wells, and tending their cattle to the lakes and rivers.

The flocks and herds of these shepherds were immensely numerous. The sheep of the Bedouin Arabs in Egypt, and probably throughout the east, are very fine, black-faced and white-faced, and many of them clothed in a brown-colored fleece; and of this superior breed the ample flocks of the Syrian shepherds consisted. So great was the stock of Abraham and Lot, that they were obliged to separate, because "the land was not able to bear them." From the present which Jacob made to his brother Esau, consisting of five hundred and eighty head of different sorts, we may form some idea of the countless numbers of great and small cattle which he had acquired in the service of Laban. In modern times, the numbers of cattle in the Turcoman flocks, which feed on the fertile plains of Syria, are almost incredible. They occupy sometimes three or four days in passing from one part of the country to another. Chardin had an opportunity of seeing a clan of Turcoman shepherds on their march, about two days' distance from Aleppo. The whole country was covered with them. Many of their principal people with whom he conversed on the road, assured him that there were four hundred thousand beasts of carriage, camels, horses, oxen, cows, and asses, and three millions of sheep and goats. This astonishing account of Chardin is confirmed by Dr. Shaw, who states that several Arabian tribes, who can bring no more than three or four hundred horses into the field, are possessed of more than as many thousand camels, and triple the number of sheep and black cattle. Russel, in his "History of Aleppo," speaks of vast flocks which pass that city every year, of which many sheep are sold to supply the inhabitants. The flocks and herds which belonged to the Jewish patriarchs were not more numerous.

The care of such overgrown flocks, says Paxton, required many shepherds. These were of different kinds; the master of the family and his children, with a number of herdsmen who were hired to assist them, and felt but little interest in the preservation and increase of their charge. In Hebrew, these persons, so different in station and feeling, were not distinguished by appropriate names: the master, the slave, and the hired servant, were all known by the common appellation of shepherds. The distinction, not sufficiently important to require the invention of a particular term, is expressed among every people by a periphrasis. The only instance in the Old Testament in which the hired servant is distinguished from the master, or one of his family, occurs in the history of David, where he is said to have left the sheep, על שומר, "in the hand of a keeper," while he went down to visit his brethren, and the armies who were fighting against the Philistines under the banners of Saul. 1 Samuel xvii. 20. This word exactly corresponds with the Latin term custos, "a keeper," which Virgil uses to denote a hireling shepherd, in his tenth Eclogue:

Aut custos gregis, aut maturare vinitor vee.*

"O that your birth and business had been mine,
To feed the flock and prune the spreading vine!"
WHARTON.

In such extensive pastoral concerns, the vigilance and activity of the master were often insufficient for directing the operations of so many shepherds, who were not unfrequently scattered over a considerable extent of country. An upper servant was therefore appointed to superintend their labors, and take care that his master suffered no injury. In the house of Abraham, this honorable station was held by Eliezer, a native of Damascus, a servant in every respect worthy of so great and good a master. The numerous flocks of Pharaoh seem to have required the superintending care of many overseers. Gen. xlvii. 6. Doeg, an Edomite, was intrusted with the whole pastoral establishment of Saul. 1 Sam. xxi. 7. But in the reign of David, the important office of chief herdsman was abolished, and the vast flocks and herds of that monarch were intrusted to a number of superintendents; animals of the same species forming a separate flock, under its proper overseer. 1 Chron. xxvii.

29. These overseers, in the language of the Hebrews, were called the princes of the flock; they were treated with great distinction, and seem to have been selected in the reign of David from among the nobles of his court. Eumæus, a person of noble birth, agreeably to this custom, was charged with the care of the herds of swine belonging to Ulysses. The office of chief shepherd is frequently mentioned by the classic authors of antiquity. Diodorus relates from Ctesias, that Simma was overseer of the royal flocks under Ninus, King of Assyria. According to Plutarch, one Samo managed the flocks and herds of Neoptolemus, the King of the Molossians. The office of chief shepherd was also known among the Latins; for, in the seventh Æneid, Tyrrheus is named as governor of the royal flocks:

Armenta, et late custodia cretalia campi.*

"Their father, Tyrrheus, did his fodder bring Tyrrheus, chief ranger to the Latian king."

DRYDEN.

And Livy informs us that Faustus held the same office under Numitor, King of the Latins. But it is needless to multiply quotations: every scholar knows that the Greek and Roman classics abound with allusions to this office, which in those days was one of great importance and dignity, on the faithful discharge of which the power and splendor of an eastern potentate greatly depended. The office of chief shepherd, therefore, being in pastoral countries one of great trust, of high responsibility, and of distinguished honor, is with great propriety applied to our Lord by the Apostle Peter: "And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory which fadeth not away." 1 Peter v. 4. The same allusion occurs in these words of Paul: "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will." Hebrews xiii. 20.

[SHESHACH. Babylon, so called, according to Michaelis, because of its gates, the word being derived by him from a root meaning to overlay with metal. Others derive it from a root meaning to sink down, Babylon being in a low position. Others think Sheshach was a deified king of Babylon. Jer. xxv. 6; li. 42.]

[SHESHAZZAR. Prince of Judah: some think he was Zerubbabel; others, Ezra; others, a Persian or Chaldean. Ezra i. 8, 11; v. 14, 16.]

SHIBBOLETH, "an ear of corn," was a word which the Gileadites used as the test of an Ephraimite. For the Ephraimites could not, from disuse, pronounce the Hebrew letter sh; therefore, they said Sibboleth instead of Shibboleth, Judges xii. 6. "The Greeks," says Hartley, "have not the sound sh in their language: hence they are liable to be detected, like the Ephraimites. I was struck with this circumstance, in learning Turkish from a Greek tutor: pasha, he pronounced pasa; shimdi, he called sindi; Dervish, Dervis, etc. Shibboleth he would, of course, pronounce Sibboleth."

SHIELD. See ARMS.

[SHIGGAION. This word in the title of Ps. vii. is derived by some from a root meaning to wander, and is supposed to denote a song of David composed in his wanderings. The Vulgate, following the Chaldee, renders the plural, Shigionoth, Hab. iii. 1, for ignorances. Others think it is a musical term denoting variations.]

SHILOH, Gen. xlix. 10. The Hebrew text is, "until Shiloh come." All Christian commentators agree that this word ought to be understood of the Messiah, that is, of Jesus Christ. The LXX. read it, "Until the coming of him to whom it is reserved." It must be owned that the signification of the Hebrew word Shiloh is not well known. Some translate the clause, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, till he comes to whom it belongs;" others, "till the coming of the peacemaker, or the pacific, or prosperity;" and some, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah till its end, its ruin," till the downfall of the kingdom of the Jews. However, this much is clear, that the ancient Jews are in this matter agreed with the Christians, in acknowledging that the word stands for Messiah, the King. It is thus that the paraphrasts, Onkelos and Jonathan, and the ancient Hebrew commentaries upon Genesis, and the Talmudists explain it. If Jesus Christ and his apostles did not make use of this passage to prove the coming of the Messiah, it was because then the completion of this prophecy was not sufficiently manifest. The sceptre still continued among the Jews; they had still kings of their own nation, in the persons of the Herods; but soon after the sceptre was entirely taken away from them, and a people began to be gathered to Christ, out of the Gentile nations.

SHILOH, a celebrated city of the tribe of Ephraim, twelve miles from Shechem, Joshua xviii., xix., xxi. It was in this place that the tabernacle of the Lord was set up, when the people were settled in the country. The ark and the tabernacle of the Lord continued at Shiloh from A. M. 2560 till 2888, when the ark was taken by the Philistines, under the administration of the high-priest Eli. 1 Sam. iv. Here the prophet Ahijah dwelt. 1 Kings xiv. 2.
